The honorable gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] has just told us that the interference of northern men with slavery has been the cause of the existing war. History repudiates and denies the declaration. This war sprang from the aristocracy of the South in an effort to maintain and to extend a system of servitude on which alone that aristocracy could be perpetuated. For the last thirty years this sentiment has been publicly and repeatedly proclaimed by leading southern statesmen, and their most influential legislators long since declared that in view of the vast increase of wealth and population in the free States, culminating, as finally it would, in political ascendancy, the preservation of aristocracy and of slavery which supported it dictated a dissolution of the ties which bound the southern States to the Federal Union.

This war was conceived more than thirty years ago, and John C. Calhoun was present at its conception; and yet we are told to-day that this war was sprung upon us by the action of the northern abolitionists, and by men interfering with the rights of the southern States. I tell the honorable gentleman from New Jersey that this Government as such never laid its hand upon the institution of slavery. On the other hand, it has yielded, and the people of the North have yielded year after year, and time after time, to the demands of this slave power in order to promote peace throughout our borders. I could go on for hours enumerating the concessions which have been made to this power of slavery; and yet the South has never been satisfied. Were we of the North responsible for this war? No, sir; the South commenced it without cause, and commenced it while they had control of this Government from its head to its foot; while every department was in their power, and while they, through their public men, admitted that it was beyond the power of this Government for the next four years to interfere with the institution of slavery.

Sir, this war was not commenced by the South for the purpose of protecting the rights guaranteed to them by the Constitution. It was prosecuted for the purpose of taking away rights secured by that Constitution to the people of the whole country. And when they attempted to overthrow that beneficent Government of our fathers, I, for one, who had for twenty-five years, in every place where my voice could be raised, defended, so far as I could, what I regarded as the constitutional rights of our southern brethren; I, who had denounced the extreme northern sentiment on this subject, made up my mind that if the South could voluntarily make war on this Government for their institutions and to overthrow ours, it was my duty, as an American citizen, to do all in my power to protect our Government, even at the expense of slavery or of southern aristocracy. Sir, slavery should find no protection and no apology among gentlemen who represent the free States of the North.

Slavery has wrought too much of evil; it has shed too much of innocent blood; it has sent too many of our citizens, our brothers, our relatives, and friends to inhospitable graves; it has held its carnival of blood and death on too many battlefields for gentlemen from the free North to stand here as its advocates and defenders. And yet what I would do would be done in no spirit of malignity, in no spirit of vindictiveness, in no spirit of unkindness. I would say that slavery should die because it is irreconcilable and incompatible with freedom; because it has undertaken to destroy our Government, to subvert our institutions, and to cause desolation and suffering and death throughout the length and breadth of the land.

I am no advocate for the exercise of tyrannic and despotic power. I have no feeling of bitterness toward the misguided and deluded people of the South. I love the Union too well for that. It is for the Union and the Union alone that I plead to-day. For that Union I am ready to give up every resentment, to forget every sacrifice that the North has made, and to ask the people of the South to come back into the Union with those principles of freedom which shall make and which alone can make the Union perpetual. I have known from the reading of history that the exercise of despotic power is always wrong and always disastrous. I would not, then, exercise that power. We have seen it exercised abroad for the purpose of restricting liberty of opinion. We have seen it exercised in Holland where, for more than seventy-five years, the despotism of Church and State attempted to control the minds of men. And yet, through those years of disaster and suffering, the people of Holland adhered to their religious faith and finally maintained the independence of their religious sentiments. We saw it in Spain where the despotism of Charles V and Philip II and III drove from the borders of Andalusia five hundred thousand Moors to the coast of Barbary. We have seen it in England, where, from generation to generation, religious and State despotism attempted to interfere with the rights, civil and religious, of British subjects. And yet, sir, we have never found that the exercise of despotic and arbitrary power produced any good result to the people.

No, sir, we must not proceed in the exercise of arbitrary and despotic power. It is with love, kindness, conciliation, exerted in every channel where love, kindness, and conciliation may be exhibited, that we should proceed. In every way where we can consistently with our duty, consistently with the existence and protection of the Government, show kindness to the South, we are bound to do it for the sake of the Union. I, for one, am willing to wipe out the record of the past, bloody and painful as it is, and to show that we can take back our erring and repentant enemies into the Union, with all the rights which we, as northern men, possess under the Constitution of the country, and with no other. That, sir, in the full enjoyment of American constitutional freedom, gives them everything which our fathers claimed, and which we claim now under the Constitution.

Now, sir, what is this proposition? Is it despotic and arbitrary in its character? Not at all. We propose simply to submit to the people of the States the proposition to amend the Constitution. It requires the assent of three fourths of all the States represented in this Congress. Did they not agree to that when they framed the Constitution? Is not that the principle on which all State governments are founded? When I look at the constitution of the State of New York I find it a government of majorities. If I look to the town and county governments, I find them governments of majorities; and, sir, if we have a national Government under our Constitution which, as I claim, is a supreme Government, that Government is a Government of majorities or pluralities, as fixed by our organic law.

Now, sir, for the purpose of perpetuating our institutions, those who framed the Constitution entered into a solemn compact and covenant that, with certain two exceptions, the people should have the right to change that organic law in every other respect whatever; and therefore when it appears to the people that there exists in this land an institution inconsistent with that Constitution, inconsistent with the principles of our Government, we, as their Representatives, say that we propose to them, in accordance with that Constitution, to determine for themselves whether or not they will amend it, and thereby remove the evil, there is nothing despotic, nothing wrong, nothing which should call forth the animadversions and maledictions of the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] In that we propose nothing which is not constitutional, nothing which is not just.

And I submit to my friends on the other side of the House that the day is come when they should act fearlessly and honestly upon this subject. Is there a gentleman there who does not believe that the American people in their majesty and in their power have decreed the absolute and perpetual annihilation of slavery? Has not the popular verdict, which went forth in November last, proclaimed that that is the unalterable decision of the American people? Is there one who will deny that the next Congress, which according to law will convene here one year from December, 1864, will possess the requisite power to pass the amendment now proposed and submit it to the people? Is there any one who does not know that it will be in the power of the President of the United States, whenever this proposition may be rejected by a vote of this House, to call within sixty days an extra session of that Congress? And although at large expense and at great annoyance to our people, the President can present this one question to their consideration and decision, and then by their act they can announce that this proposition shall be submitted to the vote of the American people.

Gentlemen may talk of slavery, and attempt to keep it in life and being. It is too late for that. This world moves. The American people have found that the institution of slavery is a great public evil and crime, and when this rebellion broke out and evinced its wicked design to overthrow the Government in order that slavery might be perpetuated they went to work with the determination that it should be extinguished. They entered upon the path of duty before them with the old motto of Hampden engraved upon their shield, "nulla vestigia retrosum"—there is no step to be taken backward. We must go on, for the very safety of our nation and of our people, until slavery is obliterated from our land. Then, and then only, shall we possess peace. Then, and then only, when that is a conceded fact, will the powers now in rebellion against the Government lay down their arms and submit to the just authority of the Federal Government.

Sir, this world is after all a progressive world. Its advances are slow but sure. Long before the days of Adam changes were going on, the records of which are to be found in the vestiges of races long since passed away. Age after age, era after era, have swept onward, each with its own order of organic life, flourishing, decaying, perishing, pursuant to the inexorable law of development and progression, and the rocks alone by their fossil remains attest the strange creations of the past.

We see evidences of progress in the institutions of society as well as in the physical world. The despotism and tyranny of old Governments and empires, and the barbaric customs of former generations, are passing away. Other institutions have succeeded, better but not yet perfect, and these in turn must give way to the more beneficent and more perfect creations of a brighter future. And perhaps hereafter some explorer in our history shall find for the astonishment of his times, deep buried in the strata of political geology, a monster fossil more wonderful than the mastodon, and more terrible than the pterodactylus, which shall be recognized as the last vestige of African slavery.

We, sir, are improving, yet we are not perfect. It was not the design of the Creator that this world, either in its physical, in its moral, or in its political character, should assume perfection, except with the passing away of long ages. We have our work to do for this generation. Past generations have been building up their work for us; and, taking advantage of their advancements and of their improvements, we to-day have our duty to perform in opening a wider pathway for civilization and for freedom.

I trust that gentlemen will regard this as no party question. It is with me a question of national life. I have no party feeling whatever in connection with this whole subject. Since the first gun was fired in the harbor of Charleston I have declared always that I would be governed by no political or partisan feeling until this rebellion shall be put down; and then, if it shall be the interest or the policy of the people to raise and to discuss party and political issues, let us meet those issues manfully, firmly, and as freemen. But until that time let us remember that we have sworn to support the Government of this Union. Having taken upon myself that oath, I mean to support it in its integrity, in its unity, in its power; and I care not what institution of the past or of the present may stand in the way of the maintenance of this Government, whether it be the institution of slavery, whether it be party, or anything else, I stand pledged before Heaven to assist to the extent of my power in striking it down.

Let us preserve that glorious heritage which our fathers gave us; and when we speak of civil liberty let it not be that which represents only the blood of a particular race; let it be that which represents man, no matter what land may have given him birth, no matter what may have been his political condition.

I am not, sir, one of those who believe that the emancipation of the black race is of itself to elevate them to an equality with the white race. I believe in the distinction of races as existing in the providence of God for his wise and beneficent designs to man; but I would make every race free and equal before the law, permitting to each the elevation to which its own capacity and culture should entitle it, and securing to each the fruits of its own progression.

This we can do only by removing every vestige of African slavery from the American Republic.

The SPEAKER, (after a pause.) Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ASHLEY. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. No gentleman rises to claim the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] withdraw the motion to adjourn?

Mr. GRINNELL. I withdraw the motion, and yield to the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, the debate upon this question has taken a very wide range. Much of the ground that was occupied at the last session of Congress seems to have been swept over again at this session, as if to remind us of facts and arguments which we as Representatives may have forgotten, or which the people themselves may have lost sight of. Many gentlemen have overlooked in their remarks, and probably have forgotten, what has transpired between the last session of Congress and the present; that the policy pursued by the Administration has been indorsed by the vote of the people; that four hundred thousand majority of the votes of the people was given to sustain that policy; that the proclamation issued by the President of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1863, was indorsed as a part of that policy; that the action of Congress in reference to this question of slavery, since the beginning of the rebellion, was also indorsed; that the action of Congress at the last session in reference to this very subject was indorsed by the people in the reelection of, I believe, every member of the present House upon the Union side who was put in nomination. It will be borne in mind, sir, that at the last session the Senate by an overwhelming majority, far more than two thirds of that body, passed the same joint resolution that is now under discussion; that though this resolution when it came to this body failed to receive a constitutional majority, yet there were nearly or quite thirty more voting in favor of its passage than those who voted against it. These facts were well understood by the people of the nation when they voted at the last election.

And, sir, not only that. The old question is reiterated as to whether we have power under the Constitution. We have heard it to-day. And what is a very singular fact is that those who cannot find power under the Constitution to authorize us to make this amendment come entirely from the free States of the Union, while the voice which comes up from the slave States, those who practically as well as constitutionally understand this question, is in favor of supporting the Union side of the House, and these men tell us that they are ready to favor the proposition of stripping from the Constitution anything that tolerates the institution of slavery in any State of the Union.

But, sir, I forbear to go into a lengthy argument. I forbear to reiterate here the arguments in favor of the abolition of slavery throughout the Union. Slavery has given us lessons; they have been taught in slaughter and fiendish cruelty of every character. Indeed, no nation has suffered for its sins as we have done for slavery. What to-day has been laid upon the desk of every member shows us not only facts in reference to the treatment of our soldiers taken prisoners by the rebels, but there are pictorial illustrations of the men who were literally starved to death. These are only a few of the arguments which arise before us, and a few of the proofs which we have of the evil of slavery. I forbear to reiterate them all.

Mr. Speaker, I would not have risen to say anything on this question, but would have left it in the hands of others more familiar with it, if it had not been for the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who has a reputation for natural gifts and for varied learning, not only of books, but of countries through which he has traveled, and who is listened to always with great attention, but who is extreme and discursive on every subject he attempts to handle. In his thrust backward and forward with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Scofield,] he could not refrain from crossing the continent and bringing in the State of California. New York and Pennsylvania could not settle their difficulty without bringing up something in reference to what transpired concerning California. The gentleman from New York lugged it in entirely out of place, and the singular fact was that he had to misrepresent the facts to prove his case.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of his remarks in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the gentleman from New York spoke of an interview, or, at least, an exchange of words upon this floor he had with a member from Georgia, Mr. Toombs, and he stated that there was one question put to him which he was not able to answer. To understand what he did say, I ask the Clerk to read an extract from his speech.

"Nor has the South here in this House and upon this floor always had its way, even with its able men. I was here in the great struggle of 1850, when the ablest men of the South were upon the floor of the adjoining Hall exercising all their power to bring California into the Union as a slave State, and to extend slavery to the Pacific; and in that they failed. I recollect their arguments. I myself was engaged in a warm debate on that subject with Mr. Toombs, of Georgia; and in the course of the argument, when he was claiming that California should be open to the representatives and institutions of Georgia and South Carolina as well as to those of New York, he asked me a question which I found it easier to evade than to answer. Did not, he asked, a regiment from New York city and a regiment from South Carolina, in the march from Vera Cruz to Mexico, at Chapultepec, I think he said, fight side by side and shoulder to shoulder to conquer the Mexicans; and when the victory was won and the treaty made and the common territory acquired for which these soldiers of New York and South Carolina had fought and paid in common, was it, he asked, just and right and equitable that the son of the South Carolina soldier, or that soldier himself, should be forbidden to emigrate, carrying his institutions with him, into California and the rest of the territory thus acquired, side by side with the citizen of New York? I evaded the question, I must confess, to the best of my ability. I found it difficult to answer. I answered it to the best of my ability, although not altogether satisfactorily to myself.

"I mention this incident, which was but one of the many incidents of that great and prolonged debate, during which the men of the North stood together, I think, for six months upon the floor of the House of Representatives, contending and with great success for the exclusion of slavery from California and from all the Pacific coast, and then the South was fully and ably represented here, never more ably represented than then. The North, and I among the northern Representatives, stood up shoulder to shoulder, and successfully, too, for we excluded slavery from California by its admission as a free State. Slavery was for-bidden by the compromise of 1850 to enter any of the territory which we acquired from Mexico on the Pacific coast."

Mr. HIGBY. Now, Mr. Speaker, a few facts. In 1849 and 1850 the people of California, under a provisional governor, assembled and elected delegates to a convention. The day was fixed and the convention was held. The object of that convention was to frame a constitution for the admission of California into the Union as a State. After long and arduous labors that convention presented to the people a constitution for adoption, and let me say that in that convention there were men from the extreme South, men who are to-day sympathizing with this rebellion, who were just as zealous opposers of the introduction of slavery as any man upon this floor to-day, and who in that convention labored to put down all arguments which could be raised in favor of its introduction. They presented a constitution which did not tolerate slavery, and the result was that the people adopted it and sent it to Congress, with Wright and Gilbert to this House, and Senators-elect to the Senate, for admission as a State under it into the Union.

If there was any question in regard to the institution of slavery in the introduction of California as a State, it arose here upon this floor, and in the other branch of Congress, and came not from any voice of the State of California. She was entirely free, and had driven slavery from the State and the Territory by the unanimous voice of the people. No Territory upon the Pacific coast was ever aided by act of Congress in getting rid of the institution of slavery. The gentleman altogether mistakes the facts, for it was he and those associated with him who raised the question. He misrepresents the facts, and misrepresents those who represented that State on this floor. The people of California owe him no thanks for what he did at that time in this House. The facts are quite the reverse of what he stated, for from what he says I take it that he and others were the parents of that infamous compromise which will always be a dark feature in American history.

The introduction of California as a State into the Union was connected with the passage of that most infamous law which we last session abolished so readily, and California could not come into the Union as a free State unless that infamous law was placed upon the statute-book; and neither the gentleman from New York nor any other gentleman associated with him upon this floor can take any credit to himself or place any laurels on his brow for what he did in that respect.

I rose more particularly to refute the statement of the gentleman, because when one stands upon this floor and makes a declaration as a fact in history, it is expected to go out to the people and be accepted by them unless it is refuted. Hence I assert distinctly that there was no division among the people on the Pacific coast upon this question of the institution of slavery.

And now I come back to the remarks of the gentleman from New York. He found the question was a difficult one to answer. The people of California were unanimous in their presentation of a constitution about which there could be no question as to its republicanism, for it was republican in principle and republican in form; and yet when the gentleman from Georgia asks the gentleman from New York a question he answers it in his own way, but not satisfactorily to himself. Why, sir, when a man brought up in the light of every good principle, one who has lived all his life under their influence, one who could be so firm to the position which he occupied last session, and occupies the present, one whose mind embraces such correct principles as he professes to possess, and such correct learning as he has received from year to year, can, now that he has arrived at ripe manhood, become so warped and perverted by the power of this institution that in the light of truth he cannot answer that simple question, I am furnished with the best evidence why the land should be rid of such an institution as that. It seems to me there should have been no difficulty in answering that question in the light of the fact that the people of the Pacific coast got rid of the institution for themselves; and yet in the face and eyes of the position which the gentleman takes here that the States are sovereign and can settle that question for themselves, when the gentleman from Georgia raises such a question he finds it extremely difficult to answer, and answers it not satisfactorily to himself.

Mr. Speaker, I leave the gentleman and envy him not all the fame he can acquire for himself by arguments of that character. I prefer to be upon the side of right and of truth, where I believe the people are likely to be when such powerful and fascinating influences as arise out of this institution are entirely removed. I hope we shall soon take a vote upon this question, and that it will be a successful one; that there will be a two-thirds vote in this House, and that the question will be sent to the States for them to take action upon, we well knowing, and the people well knowing, that the action we take upon the question here is not final, but that it must be ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States. Then, if it shall so be that they ratify our action, that action will be a binding force and power upon us, become a part of the Constitution, and expel forever from the country the question which has been an apple of discord in our midst for half a century.

So far as the power which the North has had in this Government is concerned in regard to which the gentleman claims that it has had the controlling power, I will leave him to settle that question with the vice president of the confederate States, Mr. Stephens, who reiterated in his speech in the Georgia convention which passed their ordinance of secession, that the South had held the power in this Government from its origin down to the time they were making their complaints. I leave it to the gentleman from New York, who was born, as he tells us, in a free State, whose State of adoption is a free State, and who never has had any direct interest in a slave State, to settle that question with Mr. Stephens. I think that the southern gentleman has given us facts that are true, while the gentleman from New York has been very much mistaken in the facts that he has attempted to present. And here I leave the question.

Mr. ASHLEY. If no other gentleman wishes to go on to-night I desire to say that I will ask the House, perhaps on Monday evening, or on Tuesday morning at furthest, to sustain a motion for the previous question.

I now ask that certain amendments which the committee on the rebellious States propose to offer be ordered to be printed.

It was so ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I propose, when the bill comes before the House for consideration, to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute. I ask that it may also be printed.

It was so ordered.

A bill (S. No. 381) in relation to the swamp and overflowed lands in the State of California.

SOUTHERN REFUGEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have been requested to present a memorial of the Refugee Relief Commission, of Ohio, praying for an immediate appropriation by Congress of $500,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in furnishing poor white refugees of the South with seed and farming implements in time for the cultivation of the soil the coming spring; and also to aid such as are mechanics in obtaining tools, &c., for the prosecution of their employments, for the reasons named in the memorial. I desire to say, before this memorial is referred, that similar associations have been organized in nearly all the leading cities of the Union, and especially along the border. Thousands of refugees from the South, belonging mostly to the families of soldiers in our Army, are in Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, Nashville, Memphis, and nearly all the border cities. Their sufferings cannot be told. I presume there are now one hundred thousand white people who have been driven from their homes by the fortunes of war, many of them loyal people, who are suffering untold miseries in these cities; many of them entirely destitute; many of them without the means and without the capacity to earn their own livelihood. They have been thrown upon the charity of the people of the border States, especially along the borders of the Ohio river. In many cases private charities have been exhausted in their relief.

Whether, under the circumstances, Congress ought to appropriate money for their relief or not, I am not prepared to say; but it seems to me certain measures may be devised for their relief.

There is now a large quantity of land subject to confiscation in the southern States under the laws of Congress, which for some reason the executive officers have not yet seized or taken possession of. I can see no reason why provision should not be made authorizing these loyal refugees to seize and occupy this land subject to confiscation, under the protection of law, and so as to secure to them the benefit of the occupancy and settlement laws which are common and familiar in all the western States. It seems to me that some measure of relief ought to be extended to these people. It is a crying evil, which is pressing especially upon the Senators from the western States. Perhaps, also, some provision might be made to give them employment in the manufacture of clothing for the Army, in the quartermaster's department, and in various other departments of the Government. At present they are thrown upon the charity of those who are not able to bear the burden. They are thrown upon charitable associations who ought certainly to have some aid from the General Government. This condition of things is caused by a state of war, and the expense of this relief, it seems to me, ought to be borne in some way by the General Government instead of by local communities and associations organized along the border.

I do not know to what committee this memorial ought to be referred. I have no doubt that similar memorials will come upon us in great number during next month. Perhaps it would be well to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Several SENATORS. The Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, the Committee on Agriculture. I do not care to what committee the reference is made. The subject is one which I think demands the immediate attention of Congress.

Mr. POMEROY. I am glad that the Senator from Ohio has brought this subject to the attention of the Senate and the country. While I was at home during the fall my attention was called to a great number of this class of our fellow-citizens who were suffering. There came into my own State train after train of emigrants, some of them miles in length, and on every camping ground where they camped at night you could see places where they had to bury their dead. Their children were sick; members of their families were sick. There never has been a more painful subject presented to my own mind than this subject of the condition of the poor refugees from the States of Arkansas, Missouri, and Tennessee, to some extent, who came into my own State. There were five hundred families in one train with their suffering children. I think this subject strongly recommends itself to the attention of the Senate and the country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Ohio indicate distinctly to what committee he wishes the memorial referred?

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, with the hope that they will report some mode by which these people can occupy the confiscated lands of the leading rebels. It seems to me it is a matter that ought to receive the attention of the executive authority without any action of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be so referred.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a resolution as to the propriety of distributing among the officers and men of General Sherman's army a portion of the proceeds of the cotton captured at Savannah, reported that the resolution ought to be indefinitely postponed.

CONSUL AT HALIFAX.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the propriety and expediency of increasing the annual compensation of the United States consul at Halifax, Nova Scotia.

EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire if any further legislation is necessary to enable the President of the United States to call an extra session of Congress, (to meet the necessities of any public emergency,) without the delay of giving sixty days' notice to the members-elect.

CONDITION OF THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not ask to have this resolution passed upon now, but simply to have it referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have had placed in my hands an extract from a letter written by Major Calley, an Indian agent in Colorado, a gentleman formerly from the State of Wisconsin, whom I know very well, and in whose statements I place great confidence, and it brings to light a transaction that has lately occurred in Colorado, which, if it be true, as he has stated it to have occurred, makes one's blood almost chill and freeze with horror. He says, under date of December 20, 1864:

"I was in hopes our Indian troubles were over. I had two hundred and fifty lodges near this place under my protection and that of Fort Lyon. All the chiefs and their families were in camp and doing all they could to protect the whites and keep the peace, when Colonel Chivington marched from Denver, surprised the village, killed one half of them, all the women and children, and then returned to Denver. Few if any white men can now live if an Indian can kill them.

"Fort Lyon is on the direct road from the States to Santa Fé, and the commerce of the plains is millions each year. Chivington took six hundred ponies, which were loaded down with plunder, on his return."

I do not vouch for the correctness of this statement, but I have so much confidence in this Major Calley that I think it is a case which ought to be examined; and I have drawn a joint resolution with a view not only to examine into this, but also to examine into other cases which are brought to our notice, with power in the committee to be raised to send for persons and papers. I now simply ask that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs for their consideration before I press action in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 644) to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (S. No. 367) to repeal the provision of law requiring certain regents of the Smithsonian Institution to be members of the National Institute; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 131) tendering the thanks of the people and of Congress to Major General William T. Sherman and the officers and soldiers of his command for their gallant conduct in their late brilliant movement through Georgia.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 644) to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

FREEDOM OF SOLDIERS' FAMILIES.

Mr. WILSON. If there be no further morning business, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, it was my intention when this resolution was before the Senate the other day, to enter into its discussion somewhat at length. I shall not, however, on this occasion do so, because I think I observe a disposition on the part of the friends of the measure not to argue it, but to pass it. They have the power to pass it, and no argument which I can make, I am sure, can cause them to pause in a work which they believe the public good requires.

The first question which naturally suggests itself to my mind, however, is, what good can result from the adoption of this measure? What necessity is there for it? The resolution purports to be "a resolution to encourage enlistments in the Army of the United States, and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States." How can this resolution accomplish the purposes which its friends say it is intended to subserve? I thought that the Executive of the United States, and the Congress of the United States, assuming to have complete jurisdiction over the subject of slavery throughout the length and breadth of this land, had already set nearly all the slaves free. The President of the United States has assumed, although his armies may not have visited any particular location, to set all the slaves free by proclamation, and he has invited to the Federal standard every slave in the United States, whether his Army has been able to reach that slave or not. It cannot be supposed that the passage of this resolution can have any practical effect where the armies of the United States do not go. If it can have any practical effect at all, it must be in the States of Kentucky and Missouri, and to some little extent in the State which I in part represent on this floor.

But, sir, does any Senator acquainted with the state of affairs in either of those States, or any of them, suppose that the passage of this resolution can contribute to the efficiency of the Army? Why, sir, there is not a slave within the limits of any border State now who is not as perfectly free as any member of this body. Let one of them attempt to escape from slavery, and let that fact be brought to the attention of those intrusted with the military operations of the Government, and there is no master who will attempt to reclaim him; there is no master who to-day has the power to reclaim him. If, in the State in which I reside an attempt was made to prevent a slave from running away, it would be considered an act of great disloyalty to the Government of the United States, and many patriots would rise up and give information of the fact to the power at the other end of the avenue. Many persons who never owned a slave themselves, thinking that some enemy of the country was in their midst striving to deprive a free-born citizen, or if not free born, a person who should have been free born, of a God-given right, would neither eat nor sleep until they had advised the authorities that such a dangerous person was in their midst.

I presume the same state of affairs exists in the State of Kentucky and in the State of Missouri. Indeed, before the mock election in the State of Maryland was held, and before a constitution was forced upon her unwilling people, I saw with my own eyes while traveling in the lower counties of that State, many slaves rushing to the river side to get on board the steamboats in charge of persons in the Army of the United States, and I saw no master daring to prevent the escape of his slaves.

Then, sir, having military possession of every border State where slaves exist, and such being the state of facts in those States, can any Senator tell me where is the particular necessity of a measure of this kind to promote the efficiency of the Army of the United States or for any other purpose whatever? Mr. President, it is not worth while to disguise the fact or to blink it. This resolution, while it is entitled "A resolution to promote the efficiency of the Army of the United States," has an object wholly independent of its name. While I impute no improper motives to honorable Senators, because I must suppose they think they are serving not only their fellow-men but their God upon all occasions by introducing measures of this kind; while I grant you that they are perfectly conscientious, yet it is an unwise species of legislation to have one professed object to accomplish, and to bring in a bill with a name and title calculated to promote that object, when in fact perhaps the real motive is unlike that which is avowed.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. POMEROY] this morning, in the same spirit of practical and universal benevolence, introduced a resolution the object of which I think I saw, and which I think the honorable Senator will avow. He cannot wait until his two thirds of the members of the next House of Representatives shall come to their seats to pass a measure in reference to a favorite object with him, but he introduced this morning into the Senate of the United States, and it passed sub silentio, a resolution of inquiry whether there is any further legislation necessary to enable the President to call an extra session of Congress without sixty days' notice, thus to anticipate the meeting of the next Congress at the period prescribed by the Constitution. What does it mean? This constitutional amendment; that is the object of it, I presume; and if I do the honorable Senator injustice I beg his pardon, because that is not my intention.

But, sir, while it is now very clear that we are to have an extra session of Congress, provided the House of Representatives do not adopt this constitutional amendment, yet some of the friends of all races and all classes cannot wait until such an amendment can be made under what they suppose will be a constitutional exercise of power, but which, as far as I am concerned, I think will be a wholly unconstitutional exercise of power. While that measure is to be forced upon the attention of Congress at a very early day, some gentlemen cannot wait, but they must give universal freedom now. Where is the power, Mr. President? Where do you get it? What right has the Congress of the United States to declare a slave in my State or a slave in any other slaveholding State free? It has been said that it derived the power from the absolute necessity of the case in the first instance; and secondly, from intrinsic justice and humanity; and we, in the midst of a gigantic civil war, are to determine our power, not from the written Constitution of the land, but from intrinsic humanity and from absolute necessity, and every individual member of either House of Congress is to vote, not according to the Constitution which he has sworn to support, but according to his vague ideas of intrinsic humanity and absolute necessity! Where are you when you attempt legislation of this kind? Who defines the limit of legislative authority? Who can accurately tell me what is "intrinsic humanity" and what is "absolute necessity?" Why, sir, a measure of this kind, when viewed in the light of intrinsic humanity, is, and will be, one of the most inhumane measures that could be adopted by the Congress of the United States.

Why do I say so? I prefer to look at a question of this kind in the light of ascertained facts. Fortunately I have handed to me by a distinguished gentleman of this city a letter addressed to a warm bosom and political friend of the President of the United States, showing the character of a proposition of this kind, and the results to which it has led where the humanity of persons who have never been in the midst of slavery is invoked in behalf of the slave. Sir, you unmake and destroy by hundreds and thousands those whom by your legislation you profess to serve. Listen to an extract from the letter of a distinguished gentleman in New Orleans to a personal and political friend of the President in reference to this matter:

"A few days ago I was shown an official report to the military head of this department, General Banks, exhibiting the ghastly return of eighty thousand slaves having perished since the Federal occupation of the smaller moiety of this Commonwealth. This is equal to fifty per cent. of the entire slave population of the section of country embraced in the return."

Sir, that is the blessing which your legislation brings, or proposes to bring. That is the kind of blessings which a proclamation of universal freedom brings to the slave. You take him from a happy and contented home, enjoying all the necessities of life, and you invoke the "pestilence that walketh in darkness, and the destruction that wasteth at noonday," to deprive him of existence.

But, sir, it has been said in reference to the question of power that the Congress of the United States have the same authority to declare the wives and children of negro soldiers free that they had to declare the enfranchisement of the negro soldier. The power to declare even the enfranchisement of the negro soldier has not, so far as this debate is concerned, been attempted to be shown; but the remark has been made that Congress has assumed to do it, and I presume, having assumed to set the negro soldier free, they may justly assume to set free the family of the negro soldier. That, Mr. President, is a mode of argument that never satisfies my mind; because a thing has been assumed to be done, therefore it has rightly been assumed. What I would like is for some friend of this measure, before it passes this body, to show me upon what principle the Congress of the United States have the authority to pass the measure, where they derive that authority. Do not tell me that it is absolutely necessary, because there are as many and perhaps more men in this country who believe that it is not necessary as there are who believe it is. Do not tell me that humanity demands it, because, perhaps, there are more men in this country who believe that your policy is injurious and ruinous to the negro race than believe it to be advantageous.

I deny, Mr. President, that the Congress of the United States has the power to give freedom either to the negro soldier or to the family of the negro soldier. I say that we have not the power, and no nation has the power, as an act of war, to capture slaves. If they do capture them, and put their own uniform upon them, I deny that it is a rightful capture, or that the right is sustained by international law. Upon this subject we have a record, and it may be well to see what that record is. I know that there is an example in history where the attempt was made. I know it was fruitless then; I do not believe that it will be very availing for any practical or useful purpose now. I know that there is an example for it which has been recorded by Mr. Bancroft in his History of the United States. Mr. Bancroft thus refers to the proceedings, in 1775, of the last royal Governor of Virginia:

"Encouraged by the most trifling success, Dunmore raised the king's flag and, publishing a proclamation which he had signed on the 7th of November, he established martial law, required every person capable of bearing arms to resort to his standard under penalty of forfeiture of life and property, and declared freedom to 'all indentured servants, negroes, or others appertaining to rebels' if they 'would join the rebels for the reducing the colony to a proper sense of its duty.' The effect of this invitation to convicts and slaves to rise against their masters was not limited to their ability to serve in the army. 'I hope,' said Dunmore, 'it will oblige the rebels to disperse, to take care of their families and property.' At Dunmore's proclamation a thrill of indignation ran through Virginia, effacing all differences of party, and rousing one strong, impassioned purpose to drive away the insolent power by which it had been put forth."

Mr. President, has it not proved the fact that since the Federal Executive and the Congress of the United States have adopted the policy which now seems to govern them, you abolished all distinction of party among the people with whom you are at war? Have you not united them? Has not the practical result of your policy been the same as the practical result of Lord Dunmore's?

"But in truth the cry of Dunmore did not arouse among the Africans a passion for freedom. For the bondage in Virginia was not a lower condition of being than their former one; they had no regrets for ancient privileges lost; their memories prompted no demand for political changes; no struggling aspirations of their own had invited Dunmore's interposition; no memorial of these grievances had preceded his offers. None combined to join him from a longing for an improved condition or even from ill will to their masters."—Bancroft's History of the United States, vol. 8, page 223.

While, therefore, there has been an example for measures of this kind and even in our own history, it was an example without profit, an example which has met with the condemnation of, I think I can safely say, every historian the country has produced, and until a very recent date met with the condemnation of every man, woman, and child acquainted with the example within the limits of the country.

But, Mr. President, while the example as a fact exists, I deny that, as a matter of law, you can give freedom to the families of these negroes, or even to the negro soldier himself. I deny that you have any right to capture and to carry away the negro slaves, and especially in States where they are being carried off which have never revolted. I refer to the opinion of John Quincy Adams upon this subject; and as much of the doctrine that we have nowadays comes from the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, it is well enough to see what were the opinions of one of Massachusetts' ablest statesmen. I quote from Wheaton's Law of Nations, by Lawrence, pages 495, 496:

"In the discussions, however, leading to the reference, as well as before the arbiters, the principle was maintained by the United States that the 'emancipation of enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate warfare.' (Mr. Adams to Mr. Rush, at London, July 7, 1820.) And in the instructions from the same Secretary of State to Mr. Middleton, at St. Petersburg, October 16, 1820, it is said, 'the British have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves, private property, as a legitimate right of war.' No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners in cold blood, and without special cause, might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate."—MS. Papers of J. Q. Adams cited in Law Reporter, June, 1862, page 485.

That was the law in 1820, as understood by Mr. Adams in his instructions to our ministers at foreign courts. It was the law as understood by the Federal Administration at that time, and it meets the question boldly and distinctly, and denies that one nation being at war with another has any right to capture negroes, private property. A demand was made upon the British Government for compensation, and allowed, adjudged to us by the arbitrator, the Emperor of Russia. The same doctrine is found on page 611 of the same author:

"And as it has sometimes been attempted to impeach the authority of these State papers, by their supposed repugnance to opinion subsequently expressed in debate by Mr. Adams, while a Representative in Congress, (Congressional Globe, 1841-42, volume two, page 425,) it may not be irrelevant to refer to his dispatches from London, the spirit of which fully accords with the instructions to Mr. Middleton. In one to the Secretary of State, dated August 22, 1815, speaking of the conferences at Ghent, he says: 'Our object was the restoration of all property, including slaves, which by the usages of war among civilized nations ought not to have been taken. We considered the proclamations issued by British officers as deviations from the usages of war. We believed that the British Government itself would, when the hostile passions arising from the state of war should subside, consider them in the same light, and that Great Britain would then be willing to restore the property, or to indemnify the sufferers for its loss.' (American State Papers, volume four, page 117, folio edition. See also note to Lord Castlereagh, August 9, 1815, ibid., page 115.) Furthermore, not only was the slave indemnity convention of November 13, 1826, negotiated in the Presidency of Mr. J. Q. Adams, but instructions to propose to Great Britain a convention for the surrender of fugitive slaves were given by his Secretary of State, Mr. Clay, successively to Mr. Gallatin, and to Mr. Barbour."

I cite these authorities to show what were the opinion of these great men, not only in reference to the authority of Congress under the Constitution, but in reference to the rights pertaining to a state of war.

But, Mr. President, we have even earlier authority than that which I have cited, to show what was the judgment of the founders of the Republic in reference to a state of war, and in reference to the power which one belligerent had as against another to take away slaves or private property. On page 1017 of the fourth part of Lawrence's Wheaton, I find this:

"A report was made to the old Congress by Mr. Jay, as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, February 28, 1786, in reference to the violation or non-fulfillment by Great Britain of the treaty of 1783. Among the matters specially enumerated is the carrying off of negroes. While he fails to contend for including in the terms of the treaty such as were in the course of the war captured and disposed of as booty, acts which Mr. J. Q. Adams regarded as contrary to the usages of war among civilized nations, he insists on the validity of our claim, not only as to such negroes as remained with and belonged to American inhabitants within the British lines, but also as to those who, confiding in proclamations and promises of freedom and protection, fled from their masters without, and were received and protected within the British camps and lines. The latter, he thinks, are clearly comprehended in the article, because they remained as much as ever the property of their masters. 'They could not,' he said, 'by merely flying or eloping, extinguish the right or title of their masters, nor was that title destroyed by their coming into the enemy's possession, for they were received, not taken by the enemy; they were received not as slaves, but as friends and freemen; by no act, therefore, either of their own or of their friends, was the right of their masters taken away; so that being the property of American inhabitants, it was an infraction of the seventh article of the treaty to carry them away.'"

It will be observed, Mr. President, that I oppose this measure, both on grounds of policy and humanity, and as repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the laws of war. The policy which we have adopted in reference to this class of people was repudiated by one of the greatest generals that ever lived. I invite the attention of the Senate to the remark of Napoleon as to what was his policy when he entered Russia; I quote from Lawrence's Wheaton, part four, page 1018:

"In the answer of the emperor to the address of the Senate, on his return from Russia, December, 1812, the very wise policy of not embittering the quarrel with Alexander was visibly manifested. 'The war which I carry on,' said Napoleon, 'is a political war. I have undertaken it without animosity, and I would have wished to spare to Russia the evils which she has brought upon herself. I could have armed against her a part of her population by proclaiming the liberty of the serfs. A great number of villages asked it of me, but I refused to avail myself of a measure which would have devoted to death thousands of families.'"—Thiers, Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire, tome 15, p. 168.

Sir, in this day of much-boasted enlightenment, in the nineteenth century, and among the people of the United States, a policy which was abhorrent to the feelings of the great military chieftain of Europe has been adopted. But it may not be improper to cite in this connection the opinion of another great military chieftain, for whom the people of this whole country express and entertain a most profound respect. I have called for the authority for the passage of this measure. I shall be answered, if answered at all, that humanity demands it, and that necessity demands it. These are doctrines of modern origin, however. Although not a very old man, I am too old to recognize them. I would rather have authority than have conjecture. General Scott, who has lately published his autobiography, has expressed his opinion as to the authority of Congress to interfere with slaves in the States. He adds no limitations, no qualifications. He does not consider the question whether humanity demands it, or whether absolute necessity demands it, but he expresses his opinion clearly and boldly in reference to the constitutional authority, and here it is. On page 372 of the second volume of Scott's Autobiography I find this:

"I suppose I scarcely need say that, in my opinion, Congress has no color of authority, under the Constitution, for touching the relation of master and slave within a State."

I should not feel it necessary to support opinions so clear by references to military authority, when we have expositors of the Constitution of the United States and judicial decisions to tell us what that instrument means, was it not for the fact that "military necessity" is invoked for this measure as well as for every kindred measure. Then presuming that the ablest as well as the oldest general in the country, notwithstanding what he is said to have written on the fly leaf of a copy of his own autobiography, knew as much about "military necessity" as any of us, I have taken the liberty of referring to his opinions very recently expressed by himself.

Mr. President, I shall not pursue this question. I have very clearly-defined opinions as to the policy of this species of legislation. I have very clearly-defined opinions as to the constitutional authority of Congress to pass it. Not subscribing to the doctrine that I derive my authority as a legislator from a consideration of what I may deem absolutely necessary, and believing that I do not derive that authority from any supposed principle of humanity, but am bound in my action to be governed by the Constitution of the country, which is the bond of union, the bond by the preservation of which only can the Union be restored, if it shall ever be restored, I could not allow this measure to pass without the brief presentation of my views which I have made. I believe, sir, that when the future historian shall calmly and coolly survey the history of the great struggle between opposing sections of the country, and shall assign for the consideration of those who are to come after us the most embarrassing cause operating against the restoration of the Federal Union, he will say it is this species of legislation. It is a species of legislation which in the early days of this contest scarcely any member of this body avowed himself to be in favor of. It is a species of legislation which the President of the United States himself in his inaugural message did not dare to announce his approval of.

One suggestion further. I will state, not discuss it. Suppose you attract by your specious but false promises a slave in any seceded State to your standard; suppose he enters your Army under the promise that he and his wife and children shall forever be free, and is recaptured: what is his legal status and condition? By the jus postliminii he is a slave, the slave of his former master. Your promise of absolute freedom is a delusion. Be honest. Awaken not hopes that you know must be disappointed.

I hope that, though the fires of civil war are still blazing, it is not too late now for us to retrace to some extent the steps we have taken in our legislative policy, and that in future, knowing that that policy has failed to subserve any great practical or beneficial result heretofore, we shall feel disposed to try a different policy. That hope I sincerely entertain, because I believe that if this policy be continued, if this species of legislation be persisted in, the man is not a member of this body, the child is scarcely born, who will ever see a peaceful result grow out of our distractions.

Mr. DAVIS. I propose to amend the resolution by striking out in line six, after the word "person," the words "that has been or," and inserting the word "who," and after the word "be" in that line inserting "hereafter," so as to make it read:

The wife and children, if any he have, of any person who may be hereafter mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be forever free.

I regard the resolution as unconstitutional, and that it will be utterly null and void if passed. In my opinion, it will not be worth the paper upon which it is printed. I do not hesitate to express my opinion that any court of any intelligence or independence of principle and action would declare it unconstitutional and inoperative; nevertheless I propose this amendment that the resolution may be in harmony with its professed object. That object is to promote enlistments. Of course, to make it operate on enlistments that have heretofore taken place cannot give it any effect to promote enlistments. I propose, therefore, by the amendment which I offer, to confine its operation to the future, to make it prospective, and to give it that degree of vitality and efficacy which those who support it profess to have in view in offering it. I shall vote for the amendment; but whether the amendment be adopted or not, believing as I believe that the main proposition is a most flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States, I shall not hesitate to vote against it.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky will not be agreed to. I do not propose to detain the Senate for more than a moment; but it is well known that we now have in our Army many of these soldiers, black men who were slaves, who have been brought into the armies of the United States, and who have proved themselves very efficient soldiers generally. These men are annoyed continually by the reports and by the knowledge that they have left their wives and children at home slaves subject to the control of masters. If we set free the wives and children of these soldiers, as is proposed by this resolution, we leave them more free to fight the battles of the country, and without much concern for their wives and children they have left behind them.

The resolution is for the purpose of promoting the efficiency of the Army, not entirely for bringing new soldiers into the Army, but for the purpose of promoting the efficiency of the soldiers already in the Army. Hence I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky will not be agreed to, and that we shall not only set free the wives and children of soldiers who may hereafter be enlisted, but the wives and children of those who have already gone into the service of the country.

Mr. DAVIS. If this measure shall prevail, it ought to be added to in this respect: those who pass such a measure should in all humanity and justice make provision for the support of the beings that it will emancipate. Take the case of a slave who has already enlisted in the military service of the United States, having a wife and five or six helpless children. By the laws of the States in which that wife and those children are held as property, the owners of those slaves are bound to support them; it is their legal obligation and duty, and there are remedial legal measures by which they may be made to perform that duty of justice and humanity. What, however, will be the effect of this measure if it be passed? It will wrest from the owners of the slaves these helpless wives and children, and of course relieve their owners from the obligation to support them. What, then, is to become of the negro wife for whom this mock sympathy is expressed? What, then, is to become of the helpless children who are too young and altogether unable to support themselves? Sir, to support a negro woman and three or four children is a matter of considerable cost and expense. Any man who owns that sort of property knows it. I know it. Notwithstanding the charge it is upon the owners, they feel the obligation of humanity and justice to those who occupy that relationship to them, to make a comfortable support to those helpless beings who are unable to support themselves. This measure of justice and humanity in favor of which such a cry is raised, will just leave this helpless population without any means of support whatever. If my principle, my sense of justice, my sense of humanity to the slave urged me to vote for such a measure, they would urge me to offer amendments to it; they would urge me to offer a proposition by which the Government should assume that burden and that cost from which this Government would relieve the owner of the wife and children; they would urge me to propose to the Senate that the cost of supporting these helpless beings should be undertaken by the Government itself.

Sir, this is the first time I have ever ventured to utter a voice in the name of humanity in the Senate; but in the name of humanity, humanity to a degraded and helpless race of beings who are unable to support themselves, I protest that they shall not be deprived of the support which their masters and owners are bound by the laws to afford to them, and that they shall not be thrown helpless upon the world without any means of supporting themselves. If you intend to assume the offices of sacred humanity and justice, if that is the real motive which animates you, if you want to encourage enlistments among the male negro population of the country, do not reduce their families to utter destitution and starvation, as would be the effect of a measure like this in many such cases. If you intend severing the relation between the negro wife and children and their owner, and to relieve the owner from his obligation to support them comfortably, do not leave them altogether without such support, but afford it yourselves. I would vote, as an amendment to this resolution, for a provision that would secure this support. I would, however, still vote against the measure itself, because I believe that Congress is utterly incompetent to pass it. But if the majority entertain a different opinion on this point, and believe that they possess the constitutional power, they ought to exercise that power in accordance with the dictates of humanity, and they ought themselves to substitute a support for that of which they deprive this helpless class of beings by this form of legislation.

Mr. POMEROY. I am very willing to vote on this question, and would be glad to vote now. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate, for I desire very much to have an opportunity of reaching the vote at some time, and I hope it will be taken as early as possible. I only rise now to say that I have noticed that men who are arguing in the interest of slavery always resist emancipation until the very last moment, and then when the moment comes they say it would be a great relief to the owners of this property to get rid of it, that it cannot take care of itself, and humanity comes in and pleads that some appropriation may be made to support this class of individuals, who are so helpless and so inefficient and so worthless. I remember that when the proposition to free the slaves in this District was before the Senate some three years ago, it was then urged that if we abolished slavery in the District we should have to erect large poor-houses or places where they could be gathered in and supported at public expense. The bill was passed, however; the District became free; and I have not been called upon—I do not know if any one has been—to vote for any appropriation to pay for any increased number of paupers that has resulted from emancipation in the District. I think these individuals can take care of themselves measurably in the States as they have done in the District. The class of persons in the slave States who are helpless are the poor whites, who have suffered the loss of all things excepting, perhaps, their personal freedom and liberty; and if such a measure as has been suggested by the Senator from Kentucky could be brought in for their relief it might be well to consider it. But I have seen the effect of abolishing slavery in this District, and on the borders of Missouri where I live, and I have not yet seen any necessity arising for any public appropriation to take care of any paupers that were the result of emancipation. These people have a wonderful facility for taking care of themselves and adapting themselves to any condition. I shall for one vote with a great deal of pleasure for the passage of this bill without the amendment. My only wish on the subject is that the measure introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] could be brought before the Senate instead of this. That Senator, at the last session, introduced a bill which strikes at the root of this poison-tree which has sent its shadows over the country. If that measure could be brought before the Senate instead of this we should not have to begin by lopping off branches; we should not have to begin with bills like this abolishing slavery inch by inch. The measure of the Senator from Missouri, if it could be substituted for this, would put an end, in my opinion, to our temporizing policy and to the abolition of slavery in one district after another by piecemeal. I much prefer his measure to this, but I shall vote for this.

Mr. BROWN. I will state in response to the remark of the Senator from Kansas that I purpose bringing up the measure introduced by me at the last session, for a vote at this session at a subsequent time, but I do not desire to antagonize it at the present time with the measure that has been introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] That is the only reason why I prefer to take a separate vote on the separate propositions. I believe with the Senator from Kansas that the proper mode of dealing with this question would be to deal with it radically and cover the whole case; but I shall be very glad, even if I cannot obtain that, to obtain the relief which is contained in the measure introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, perhaps it is proper that I should very briefly state the reasons which will govern my vote on this measure. I do not consider a vote against it to be a vote in favor of slavery or the interests of the slaveholder. I presume that if the father and husband be taken into the military service of the United States it will be a relief to the slaveholder to take from him the obligation to provide for the family that is left at home. Public sentiment, as well as municipal law would require the master, while the relation subsisted, to make provision for them. But if Congress declares them free, that obligation, if the law of Congress have constitutional force and validity, is removed from the master. Therefore I am not able to see that a vote against this measure is a vote for the slaveowner.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] the other day said to the Senate that he was going to give constitutional grounds upon which members might stand in supporting this measure, and I had hoped that he would refer us to some provision of the Constitution that would justify the vote; but after listening to him with great attention, I was unable to observe that in any single argument he presented he referred to the Constitution at all. I believe he read none of its provisions, referred to none of its language which justified the measure. He did say that at the last session of Congress, by law we had declared the slave taken into the Army of the United States to be free, and that the constitutional power to free the slave taken into the service would support the constitutionality of this measure. Sir, I am not able to see that. The Senator stated it simply, he did not illustrate his proposition so as to make it plain to myself, at least. Upon what ground was the measure of the last session supported? Upon the ground that Congress has power to free the slaves of the States? No, sir. It could be supported on one of two grounds. First, if the master do not have property in his slave, but slavery be a mere relation, and if the slave be regarded as a person, then his personal service may be taken by the Government, and in that case no compensation, perhaps, need be made to the master. There is in the northern States the relation of parent and child, and the relation of master and apprentice; and yet no one questions that either relation for the time being may be disturbed; the power of the parent over the child may be withdrawn, and the control of the master over the apprentice may be withdrawn for the time being, and the minor child or the apprentice taken into the service of the United States without compensation to the parent or to the master. The relation is disturbed for the time being, and the minor child or the apprentice taken into the service of the United States without compensation to the parent or to the master. The relation is disturbed for the time being, but certainly if the child is restored to the neighborhood again during his minority, or if the apprenticeship is restored to the neighborhood and to his master again during his minority, and before the expiration of the term of his apprenticeship, the relation is restored. On the other hand, if we regard the slave as the property of the master, that property, like any other property in the country, may be taken by the Government and appropriated to public use, due compensation being made therefor. When Congress passed the bill at the last session this was the view taken. The slave was regarded by that act of Congress as the property of the master, and therefore, under the language of the Constitution, compensation was provided to be made to the master. I will call the attention of Senators to the provision of that law found on the 11th page of the Acts of the last session:

"When a slave of a loyal master shall be drafted and mustered into the service of the United States, his master shall have a certificate thereof, and thereupon such slave shall be free; and the bounty of $100, now payable by law for each drafted man, shall be paid to the person to whom such drafted person was owing service or labor at the time of his muster into the service of the United States."

That is one compensation to the master; the $100 bounty goes to the master instead of to the drafted slave. Again, the act provides:

"The Secretary of War shall appoint a commission in each of the slave States represented in Congress, charged to award to each loyal person to whom a colored volunteer may owe service a just compensation, not exceeding $300 for each such colored volunteer, payable out of the fund derived from commutations, and every such colored volunteer, on being mustered into the service, shall be free."

In the enactment of the law which I have just read, Congress contemplated the slave as the property of the master, and the property as being taken for public use, and compensation to be made for that property under the Constitution of the United States. Now, sir, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the same reason applies to the family of the slave who is thus taken? The wife is not taken for public use; the children are not taken for public use. In no way are they valuable to the public service. This measure is entitled a joint resolution to encourage enlistments and to promote the military service—I believe that is the substance of the title. I ask the Senator, then, if the freeing of the family of the negro who has been taken into the service is an appropriation of that family to public use? If so, the argument of the Senator is good; otherwise it is not.

The Senator also said that it was mean to take the service for the public use of the head of the family and to leave the residue of the family in slavery. That is his judgment on the subject. What standard governs his judgment I cannot say. My judgment is that it cannot be mean to obey the Constitution of my country while it is in force. I do not believe that Congress has the power to abrogate the laws of the States which regulate the relations of individuals there. From the earliest times of the Government this relation has been recognized; a relation established by the laws of the States; a relation that Congress could not interfere with; laws of the States which Congress could not disturb. Now, sir, how is it that we can go outside of an appropriation of property for public use and free those slaves who are not thus used for public purposes? I am not able to see it. I need not refer to the provisions of the Constitution that recognize the relation of master and servant, and not only recognize that relation but impose upon Congress the duty to protect it. That provision of the Constitution which requires that the fugitive slave shall be returned to his master recognizes the relation as existing under State laws, State laws that cannot be disturbed by Congress. Are the wife and children of a slave who has become a volunteer or is conscripted to be made free, and how? If they are slaves, they are such by force of the laws of the State. Can Congress disturb those laws; can Congress disturb that relation when the persons are not required for the public service? I am not able to see it; and because I think we have not the constitutional power to do this thing I shall vote against this measure.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of entering into any extended argument on this subject at the present time, because to my mind the proposition is so plain, in connection with what we have already done, that I do not conceive that any argument could make it plainer. I think we were greatly at fault when we first enabled the Government to conscript slaves, or to enlist them into our armies, in not passing a bill like the one before us. I think the failure to do so is a reproach to Congress. It appears to me, as it did to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] that it is an act of meanness in us to conscript or enlist the father and leave his wife and children in the hands of the master, subject to all his resentment, consequent on the fact that he has been deprived of that which he calls his property.

It is unnecessary, I think, at this stage of our proceedings, to argue in the Senate the constitutional question, because we have already passed upon our right to conscript and enlist the slave. We have already passed laws on that subject, and I suppose no one proposes now to back out of them. What gave us the right to do so, unless it was a military necessity? I believe we placed it on that ground, and I think it will stand upon that in a great revolution like this, and stand the test of the judgment of the world. Of course there was no Senator here, and there was no individual anywhere in the States that I ever knew anything about, who claimed that in time of peace the General Government had a right to manumit slaves in the States. I know very well that the party with whom I have long acted were charged with such designs, but it was always denied, and any such notion was never attempted to be carried out, was never pretended to be acted upon. But, sir, all that is changed in time of war when the Government itself is put in jeopardy. When that is the case, and we are endeavoring to defend the Government from dissolution and destruction, the necessity of the case, in my judgment, must be the measure of our constitutional right to proceed.

The expediency of this measure, conceding that we have the right to pass it, must be obvious to everybody. Do gentlemen suppose that you can enlist in the service of the United States negroes who are slaves that have any regard for their wives and their children, when they leave those wives and children in the hands of their infuriated masters to wreak on them their vengeance and cruelty? Sir, they will not do it. I know the fact, for I have been down in that country where we are endeavoring to enlist this class of soldiers, and the great objection everywhere is that the negro will not enlist unless you free his wife and children; he will not consent to leave them in this predicament.

But, sir, I did not rise so much to argue the question as to present and have read, in connection with this debate, an affidavit which I have in my possession, and which I think will throw some light upon the matter as a practical question. I send the affidavit to the desk, and ask to have it read as part and parcel of my remarks.

The Secretary read, as follows:

CAMP NELSON, KENTUCKY, November 26, 1864.

Personally appeared before me, Edward B. W. Restieaux, captain and assistant quartermaster, Joseph Miller, a man of color, who being duly sworn, upon oath says: "I was the slave of George Miller, Lincoln county, Kentucky. I have always resided in Kentucky, and am now a soldier in the service of the United States. I belong to company I, 124th regiment United States colored infantry, now stationed at Camp Nelson, Kentucky. When I came to camp for the purpose of enlisting, about the middle of October, 1864, my wife and children came with me, because my master said that if I enlisted he would not maintain them, and I knew they would be abused by him when I left. I had then four children, aged respectively ten, nine, seven, and four years. On my presenting myself as a recruit, I was told by the lieutenant in command to take my family into a tent within the limits of the camp. My wife and family occupied this tent by the express permission of the aforementioned officer, and never received any notice to leave until Tuesday, November 22, when a mounted guard gave my wife notice that she and her children must leave camp before early morning. This was about six o'clock at night. My little boy about seven years of age had been very sick, and was then slowly recovering. My wife had no place to go, and so remained until morning. About eight o'clock on Wednesday morning, November 23, a mounted guard came to my tent and ordered my wife and children out of the camp. The morning bitter cold. It was freezing hard. I was certain that it would kill my sick child to take him out in the cold. I told the man in charge of the guard that it would be the death of my boy. I told him that my wife and children had no place to go. I told him that I was a soldier of the United States. He told me that it did not make any difference, he had orders to take all out of camp. He told my wife and family that if they did not get up in the wagon which he had he would shoot the last one of them. On being thus threatened, my wife and children went into the wagon. My wife carried her sick child in her arms. When they left the tent the wind was blowing hard and cold, and having had to leave much of our clothing when we left our master, my wife with her little ones was poorly clad. I followed them as far as the lines. I had no knowledge where they were taking them. At night I went in search of my family; I found them in Nicholasville, about six miles from camp; they were in an old meeting-house belonging to the colored people; the building was very cold, having only one fire. My wife and children could not get near the fire because of the number of colored people huddled together by the soldiers. I found my wife and family shivering with cold and famished with hunger; they had not received a morsel of food during the whole day; my boy was dead; he died directly after getting down from the wagon; I know he was killed by exposure to the inclement weather. I had to return to camp that night, so I left my family in the meeting-house and walked back. I had walked there. I traveled in all twelve miles. Next morning I walked to Nicholasville. I dug a grave myself and buried my own child. I left my family in the meeting-house, where they still remain." And further this deponent saith not.

E. B. W. RESTIEAUX,
Captain and A. Q. M.

Mr. WADE. I have also the statement of the commanding officer there, Captain Paul, corroborating that statement, and some other documents to the same effect. I do not know that it is necessary to read them.

These people were driven out. They were slaves. They could not go back to their master again without subjecting themselves to worse treatment than they received at the hands of our officers there. The husband of this wife and the father of this family was compelled to travel in search of them, who had no place to go to, in cold, inclement weather, twelve miles, after performing all the duties of a soldier in the camp, and there he found, as he had predicted, that his child had died in consequence of this hard, harsh treatment. He could not go back to his master, I say again, because he had enlisted in the Army, and had incurred his resentment. That is shown by these papers.

In this way enlistments are discouraged. These colored men will not enlist while these things are allowed. They have the same feelings toward their wives and children that white men have, as near as I can ascertain; and where is the white man who would enlist in the Army of the United States and leave his wife and children subject to the taunts, the insults, and the ignominy of a master who had been accustomed to treat them as slaves, and who was fired with indignation and animosity because the father of the family, his slave, had left him?

I will state in connection with this subject that I visited this Camp Nelson last summer. General Burbridge was the commanding officer. I rode there with General Burbridge from Lexington in order to see a review that was about to take place there, and a sight greeted me such as I never beheld in the world, and hope I never shall again. As soon I had arrived in the camp we had scarcely alighted from the carriage before a colored woman, whom I should suppose to be thirty years of age, appeared before us, all bruised to pieces. Her face was all whipped to a jelly. She had a child with her which she said was twelve years old; one of whose eyes had been gouged out, and the other attempted to be, as they stated, by their mistress, the father being in the Army. Her head was all cut to pieces by what appeared to be a sharp instrument; her skull was laid bare almost, and her back perfectly mangled by the torture to which she had been subjected. All this was done, as we were informed, because her husband had enlisted in the Army of the United States, and she and her child were compelled to flee to this camp the best way they could, in that condition.

And yet gentlemen stand up here and talk about constitutional law in exculpation of such infernal acts as these! Sir, I tell you that slavery is an organized rebel, and you can have no peace as long as that relation exists in the United States; and, as God is my judge, I hope you will have no peace until you abolish it. I ask for no peace until slavery is extinct in these United States. We hear men sometimes talk about the object for which this war is prosecuted. They higgie over the idea that it was to defend the United States against the aggressions of the South. That was the fact. It was, in its commencement, a strictly defensive war; but war was commenced, and thank God, I think I see that it cannot end until that which gave rise to it shall have ended, and I hope it will not. If it continues thirty years and bankrupts the whole nation, I hope to God there will be no peace until we can say there is not a slave in this land.

That is the way I view the subject. I have ever viewed it so. I have never higgied about the cause of the war, although I know it was a defensive war in its commencement, and is so even now, because I know you can have no lasting peace until this accursed institution is prostrated to rise no more. I say again, I ask no peace until that is done. I am glad of the stubbornness with which the South hold out. I hope they will hold out in their blindness until they provoke us to do that which the occasion demands, without which being done you ought to have no peace, and you can have no peace.

Sir, I say it is a shame and a reproach to us to invoke the aid of the slave to assist us in working out our own liberty and putting down this rebellion while we deny his right to have his wife and children emancipated. We ought to have emancipated them before; but it is never too late to do right. Let us free all who will enlist into our armies, or who shall be conscripted, and all who stand in any relation to them, and not leave them to be mangled and tortured and murdered by those whose resentment is enkindled at the fact that they have gone into the armies of the United States. It is horribly cruel; it is barbarous; it is as impolitic as it is cruel and barbarous. I hope, sir, that the resolution will pass.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, my constituents are slaveholders; I am a slaveholder myself; and I have my rights guaranteed by the constitution and laws of my State, and by the Constitution and laws of Congress, until those laws are repealed. Here and everywhere I shall stand up in support of the rights of my constituency and of myself under the Constitution of our common country and of our State, and our laws. Gentlemen cannot force me from the occupation of that position by a denunciation of the property and institution that is guaranteed by these constitutions and these laws, a description of property which their own States once cherished, which they established, and which their people did more to disseminate and to sustain by their laws and policy for its protection than any other States.

Mr. President, there is now a crusade against slavery, and it is about as unjust, as fanatical, and as irrational as all the other crusades that have heretofore taken place in the world. I have, time and again, expressed my sentiments upon this subject; I do not intend to repeat them; but there are one or two features of this measure to which I will again ask the attention of the Senate; and my views are sustained by the facts of the case brought up by the honorable Senator from Ohio. That case shows that these women and children, when deprived of the protection and the support of their masters, and their husbands are enlisted in the service, although it be in the neighborhood of the residence of the wife and children, are not able to protect and to secure their proper support.

If I understand the case that has been cited, the husband enlisted in the Army. He was informed by the owner of the wife and children that he would no longer support them if he should enlist. He went to camp. The wife and children followed him to camp, and had the most perfect liberty, if I understand the case, to make provision for their own support. Did they make that provision? No, sir; they fell into that state of destitution, want, disease, and death that is so vividly expressed in that affidavit. The Senator says, and no doubt truly, that these people were abandoned by their owner. In that abandonment he violated the laws of humanity and he acted a cruel and an ungenerous part toward those who had occupied the relation of slaves to him.

Sir, in my own county there have been enlisted into the service of the United States, according to the best estimates we have been able to make, about six hundred slave men. I do not know, nor have I heard, of but one solitary case of abuse, of cruel treatment, or of mistreatment whatever to any of the wives or children of the men who enlisted in the Army. A man owned a slave man. He also owned the wife and children. The husband enlisted; and the master drove, or threatened to drive, the helpless wife and children from his home. He was a Lincoln man, and voted for the reelection of Lincoln. I know of but that solitary case in the county of Bourbon, where there have been an enlistment of at least six hundred slaves, where there has been any threatened mistreatment, none positive and none negative whatever.

But, sir, the position I set out with was this: that there were many cases of slave families where, if the husband was taken from the owner, and in many where he had been taken from the owner, if the wife and children were free, if the relation between the master and these slaves were severed, the wife and children would not be able to support themselves, and would come to that miserable condition of destitution, penury, disease, and death which is described in the affidavit that the honorable Senator from Ohio sent to the desk to be read.

Sir, [Mr. POMEROY in the chair.] you chose to give us some of your experience and some of your instruction in relation to this matter—a matter about which you know nothing at all practically. We understand the subject. It is in our midst. We have seen it every day of our lives. We know it by daily observation and experience. There is not a man living who has this kind of information but what knows this fact well: that in the State of Kentucky there are thousands and tens of thousands of instances of slave mothers and children where, if the mothers and children were freed at once and thrown upon their own resources, they could not make a support, but must come to that state of misery, destitution, and death which the family we have just heard read about came to.

My position was that the effect of this measure, if it is passed, will be to place many families in that position, in that state of destitution, and that it would be cruel and inhuman legislation on the part of Congress so to leave those destitute families. If they have the power, and will exercise it, to free those families, they ought to make a provision that such families as are unable to support themselves should receive the necessary aid from the Government for the purpose of having a comfortable support. Why, sir, there is not a man who ever lived in a slave State but what knows that there are almost unnumbered cases of slave women and slave children who are too helpless and too young to pay for their present support. The consideration that induces the owner to keep them, and to pay the expenses of their support, is the increased age, the growing strength and capacity of the children to work and become valuable to him in after years. If it was not for that consideration, I have no doubt that the interests and inhumanity of men would throw many of these families out upon the world without a proper support at all. Our laws are framed upon that principle of human nature, and for that reason the laws make it the legal obligation of the owners of slaves to support them, to support them in their infancy, in their age, and in their helplessness, whether the result of infancy or of age.

It has been argued again and again that because the husband is liberated therefore Congress has the power to liberate the wife and the children. There is no logic in that conclusion; there is no legal validity or effect in it; but the premises, as well as the conclusion, are utterly false. Whenever the principle is decided by a competent and independent court, it will thus be settled, that neither husband, nor wife, nor children can be taken, even to make the husband a soldier in the Army, until his reasonable value is paid or secured to the owner. That is an invulnerable constitutional and legal truth, and it can be sustained by the decisions of the highest courts of every State in the United States. But, waiving that question, the principle and the provision of the Constitution which authorizes private property to be taken for public use has no application whatever, as was shown by the Senator from Indiana, and as has been shown a hundred times in this body.

Mr. President, I did not rise to add as many words as I have, but merely to protest against the passage of this resolution in its present form, and to remind its friends, and to insist, in the name of humanity and of a degraded and humble race, that if they will throw them upon the world, they shall not throw them utterly helpless and incapable of getting their bread and their raiment; that while the husband and father is carried to the camp, and is away hundreds of miles from the wife and children, the wife and children shall not be thrown suddenly upon the world without any intellectual or physical capacity to support themselves, there to be left to perish from want and disease; but that the humane philanthropists who are commending this measure to the nation and to the world shall make a reasonable provision for the support of this helpless class of beings.

Mr. JOHNSON. The remark made by yourself, sir, [Mr. POMEROY in the chair.] speaking to this resolution, has no application to me. I am not and never have been an advocate of slavery; and as you and the Senate know, I gave my support very cheerfully, and as efficiently as I was able, to the proposed amendment to the Constitution abolishing the institution throughout the United States. Why I supposed such an amendment should be adopted, and why I supposed we had the authority to adopt it, I do not propose now to discuss. I have already presented to the Senate the reasons which led me to conclude that it was expedient and was constitutional.

I voted the other day against referring the resolution before the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary, not because I was in favor of it, but because I was exceedingly anxious that the subject itself should be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. From good motives, I have no doubt, those members of the Senate who feel toward this institution perhaps more strongly than I do thought it their duty to occupy the greater portion of the deliberations of this body during the last session by that topic; and I was satisfied that the questions involved in this resolution had been sufficiently brought before the Senate to enable every Senator to make up his mind as to the vote which he might give. There was no need, therefore, under that impression, of sending it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

But I rise now very briefly to state why it is that I am unable to vote for this resolution. It is not because—perhaps no member of the Senate feels more strongly in that regard than I do—it is not because I desire to see the wives and children, where there are wives and children, of the black men who have enlisted in the Army remain in the condition of slavery, but because I am fully under the impression (and an impression so strongly felt that I am sure no argument will be sufficient to induce me to change it) that we have no authority to pass a resolution of this nature.

The honorable member from Massachusetts, in his speech a day or two ago, placed it upon the ground of necessity. The rebellion, he said, was to be suppressed. In that, I believe, we are all agreed. It became necessary for that purpose to call into the armies of the United States the negroes. As to the power to call them into the military service of the United States I never had any doubt; and I endeavored to lay before the Senate on a former occasion the reason why I supposed there existed no doubt of the authority of Congress to use those men as a means of warfare. But I found it in the authority to raise armies, and in the double character in which, under the Constitution, the negro slave, or the negro man who is not a slave, stands toward the United States. According to my view, whether he was slave or free, he held the relation of citizen, owing an allegiance to the United States; and, owing an allegiance to the United States, was subject to the call of the United States when the United States should think proper to call him to their defense, either in time of foreign war or in time of civil war; that in relation to the negro slave, although he stood in the condition of property, and was, in the view of the Constitution of the United States and of the States where the institution exists, property, to the extent that it was made property by the laws of the State in which he might be, yet he also stood in the relation of person, and was liable to be called upon to constitute a part of the Army of the United States.

The honorable member from Massachusetts, however, said that we were all agreed in thinking that when a negro slave was called into the service of the United States he became thereby free. If he is under the impression that I concur in that opinion he is mistaken. What I said was that, having called him into the service of the United States, as I supposed we had a right to do, it would become the duty of the United States to have him free, but to have him free in a constitutional and legal way; to pay for him whatever his services might be worth; to pay for him for those services to the master, or to pass an amendment to the Constitution declaring him free.

But even if it was true, Mr. President, that the power under the Constitution exists to make a negro slave a free man by calling him into the armies of the United States, it would be a very illogical inference, in my view, to suppose that thereby his wife and his children became free, or that thereby his wife and his children could be declared free by a simple act of Congress; and I was about to say I was a little amused, considering what we have heard in the past, at the grounds upon which the opposite view is placed by some of the Senators of the other side. One of them says, and the resolution upon its face goes to that extent in part, that it will encourage enlistments. Another, the honorable member from New Hampshire, has told us that it will wonderfully increase the efficiency of this description of force. Now, in relation to the first, I think I cannot be mistaken in saying that those who advocated the bringing into the military service the negro slave said, that once authorize it, and not only would all the slaves be willing to come to the standard of the United States, but that thousands and thousands and hundreds of thousands of white men in the eastern States would be seen flocking the highways, rushing to the capital of the United States for that purpose. In the language of an editor who possesses, and justly possesses, as I think, such a controlling influence over the party to which he belongs, three hundred thousand men would at once be seen coming to the standard of the United States, and the rebellion would at once be put down. But I have not heard from the War Department, the Senate certainly has not heard officially, that there has been any difficulty in getting black soldiers. Certainly there was none in my State. There was none in my State because two modes were resorted to. I will not stop to inquire whether both were constitutional or legal. The one was voluntary enlistment, and as that was supposed to fail to a certain extent, it was virtually compulsory enlistment; and they got just as many as they wanted. There is hardly a black man now who was a slave at the breaking out of this war, who was living in Maryland at the time when you authorized the enlistment of black soldiers, capable of bearing arms, who has not been placed in the Army of the United States either by voluntary enlistment or by compulsory enlistment.

Then, as to their efficiency, I have heard some of my friends on this floor say—I hoped then that they were right, and I hope still that they are right, and the whole press that has been advocating the employment of this class of persons in the Army of the United States have said the same thing—that among the most gallant in the Army during the battles in which they were engaged were black soldiers; and yet their wives and their children were not free by any law then passed. Does my honorable friend from New Hampshire wish to make them more gallant than gallant, more efficient than efficient? Does he want to make them more gallant and efficient than the white soldiers?

Mr. CLARK. If the honorable Senator will pardon me for a moment, I wish that such a law should be passed that when those men have exhibited that gallantry, and have bared their bosoms, their limbs, and their lives in defense of the country, they shall not be stung by the thought that at home their wives and children are the subjects of abuse by their masters.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree in that; but that is sentiment altogether. I understood the honorable member to urge the adoption of this resolution upon two grounds: the first was that it would encourage enlistments; the other was that it would increase the efficiency of the Army.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is a little mistaken. I made the remark that it would make the Army more efficient entirely in reference to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, which related to those persons already in the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly. Then they have been efficient, as I understood my friend to admit, and I am not here to deny it. I do not know what the fact is. I believe there are differences of opinion on the question; but how the fact is I am unadvised. They are now efficient, and you are now getting just as many as you want, just as many as you can provide for; and if it be true that you have as many as you can employ, and that those you have are efficient, upon what ground can you place the measure before us that it is demanded because of the necessity of adding to the enlistments, and of increasing the efficiency of the enlisted?

Now, Mr. President, if there was anything settled when the Constitution was adopted, if anything has been settled since by judicial authority, if anything has been settled by political parties in the enunciation of their principles in their conventions from time to time since the existence of this institution became a subject of party politics, I suppose it to be this: that the Congress of the United States in the exercise of its legislative authority has no power to abolish slavery in the States; and with a word upon that subject I shall have done.

My friend from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] whose sincerity no one questions, whose uniform course in relation to this subject is known to all, tells us that he wants this war continued until the institution shall be abolished. He wants battle after battle to occur, and thousands and thousands of the men of the loyal States as well as the men of the rebel States to be slaughtered, and will have those scenes of slaughter continued during a period of thirty years rather than terminate the strife, if it is to be terminated without the abolition of slavery everywhere throughout the United States. That is not my opinion. I dislike the institution just as much as he does or can. I think it is attended with the most dire of evils; that it is disadvantageous to the master, and keeps the slave in a condition in which no man should be placed, demoralizes him, renders him incapable of knowing what moral duty is, debars him of the privilege of ascertaining what Christian duty is, closes the Bible to him, and closes every variety of knowledge from necessity. I know all that; but I am not for continuing the war until the institution shall be abolished if we can terminate the war now: first, because we have no authority, according to my view, under the Constitution, and we are sworn to support it; secondly, because as in the retributive justice of Heaven the institution is mortally wounded now, if there were peace to-morrow it would have no permanent existence, and would be stripped of all political influence.

The South must have seen what an element of weakness it is in war. They must have seen that with such an institution as that in their midst, if they ever get again into a civil strife with the loyal States, disaster and defeat, and, if necessary, subjugation must be the result. And what are we now told, and, I believe, truly told? Their papers proclaim it in Richmond: "If it becomes necessary we will abolish the institution; we will call the negroes into our own service first, and see if with their aid and with the aid of the white men of the South we can make successful resistance to the war upon the part of the loyal States; but, that failing, we will emancipate all; provided," for they attach a provision to it now, "provided we can make an alliance offensive and defensive with England and France." And, as I understand, they have good reasons for believing that if they do abolish the institution they will be recognized by both Governments, and perhaps both will come at once to their aid. Suppose that should be done; that the institution should be abolished by them—they have the same power to do it that we have—will my honorable friend from Ohio want to continue the war then? I suppose he will say not. Then what is the result? The Union dissevered; the work of our fathers gone; our former glory never again to be repeated; and (as is certain to be the result) every ten or fifteen or twenty years a war between the contemnerous countries.

But, Mr. President, I am glad to believe, as I think I see, that the President of the United States is not of the opinion entertained by the honorable Senator from Ohio. As I read his last message, he thinks, and I think with him, with due deference to the honorable member from Ohio, that if the men in arms against the United States throw down their arms the war not only should not be waged, but that there would be no authority to wage it. As we know, during the late political canvass, in a paper that became notorious, and will be notorious hereafter, entitled "To whom it may concern," the President stated, or was understood to have stated, that there were two conditions upon which alone the war could be made to terminate: the one was the continuing existence of the Union, and the other the abolition of slavery. I know that, as far as the last reason was concerned, it made some of his warmest and most zealous supporters exceedingly unhappy; and it was explained away. The majority of the people who voted for him considered the explanation satisfactory. It was said that he did not mean what he apparently said; and such became the fixed opinion of those who disapproved of what they supposed to have been the meaning of what he had stated in that address of his "To whom it may concern." I am glad to see that the friends who saved him from the possible fatal result of such a declaration, or what they thought would be the fatal result of such a declaration, did not misunderstand him; for in his message he says:

That is, Jefferson Davis—

"and as the issue is distinct, simple, and inflexible. It is an issue which can only be tried by war, and decided by victory." * * * * "Although he cannot recapture the Union, they can."

That is, the loyal people of the South, if there are any there.

"Some of them we know already desire peace and reunion. The number of such may increase. They can"—

I ask the honorable member from Ohio to listen to these words, and see what they mean:

"They can at any moment have peace simply by laying down their arms and submitting to the national authority under the Constitution. After so much"—

That is, after laying down their arms and submitting—

"After so much, the Government could not, if it would, maintain war against them. The loyal people would not sustain or allow it."

He is speaking of the honorable member from Ohio as among the loyal. Not satisfied with announcing that opinion in the plain words in which it is given in the part of the message that I have quoted, he deems it necessary to conclude his message by reiterating the same views. He says in conclusion:

"In presenting the abandonment of armed resistance to the national authority on the part of the insurgents as the only indispensable condition to ending the war on the part of the Government, I retract nothing heretofore said as to slavery. I repeat the declaration made a year ago"—

Not the declaration supposed to be contained in this paper, "To whom it may concern," but in a previous message.

"that 'while I remain in my present position I shall not attempt to retract or modify the emancipation proclamation, nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of proclamation, or by any of the acts of Congress.'"

I agree with him as to the last. That is a quotation from the former message:

"In stating a single condition of peace"—

Submission—

"I mean simply to say that the war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it."

I think I am not mistaken in saying that the view taken by the honorable member from Ohio goes a good deal further than that. "I hope," said the honorable Senator, "that it will never so terminate; I pray that it may be waged for an indefinite length of time, until by means of it slavery, as it exists in the States of the Union, shall be abolished." The President says to them, "Throw down your arms to-morrow; recognize the continuing obligation of the Constitution of the United States; submit to the laws; and I will not only not carry on war against you, but the people, if I desired it, would not permit me to do it." I am sure my honorable friend from Ohio, when he comes to reflect, while appealing to our sympathy for the poor black women, the outrage upon whom, as he very properly said, was enough to excite the feelings of the most obtuse, will not forget what would be the scene sure to occur if these people come in and submit to the authority of the United States and they are told, "Go away; you have an institution which we loathe; over which, before the war began, we had no control; in regard to which we expressed no disposition to go to war at all; but we mean to fight you up to the very last moment until you will agree to abolish slavery, or until we abolish it ourselves by force of arms, if, in order to do so, it becomes necessary to exterminate every white man, woman, and child in the South."

Sir, I honor the feeling of the honorable member from Ohio. I know how loyal he has been from the commencement of this war to the present hour. I witnessed with admiration, when there were upon this side of the Chamber men who were dealing improperly with the members of the North on that side, that as against him, at least, all their efforts were unavailing. He stood up manfully for the right of his section, and bearded (so to speak) the lion in his den. But, sir, there is a step beyond which, he will pardon me for saying, loyalty would become barbarity.

The South, God knows, has suffered enough. They have invited it. The people now, as we have every reason to believe, see that they have been misled. They see now that they were induced to go from beyond the protection of the Constitution of the United States and its power into this rebellion through the arts, wickedness, and insanity of the madmen by whom the rebellion was inaugurated. Their States are being overrun; their cities captured; their heart is apparently failing them, even in their leaders. Now, in a moment of desperation, they vow almost the purpose to abolish slavery and call the slaves to their aid, although they pretended to go to war merely because they thought the institution of slavery was in danger. Their lives are in danger from the insulted majesty of the law; they stand self-confessed traitors to the Constitution of the United States and subject to the punishment of traitors; and in order to escape from that doom, there is nothing they will not do; they will make an alliance defensive and offensive with all the nations of the world, and give them any and every encouragement of trade or of commerce that they think will tempt the nations of the world to enter into such an alliance.

Let us, Mr. President, take from them the means of persuading their people to such a course; hold out to them the olive-branch, ask them to come back to the bosom of the Government; live in peace and honor where Washington lived in peace and honor, and again make the Government of the United States what it was at the moment that this rebellion broke out, potentially one of the greatest Powers upon the face of the habitable globe, and now demonstrated even as true of each of the sections into which the war has divided us. There is no nation now living, if this war was ended by a separation, and the South became populated as it would—for slavery there is virtually at an end—by emigration from the loyal States, induced to go there by a better climate and better soil, there is no nation upon the face of the globe that could compete successfully either with what the United States will then be, or what the South will be in ten years after they have achieved their independence, and slavery is abolished.

The honorable member from Delaware [Mr. SAMPSON] and the honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] have both told us that they think the abolition of slavery by constitutional amendment will be found an impediment to a successful peace; I differ with them. The more that I have reflected on the subject since the action of the Senate at the last session, and the more I have seen of the temper of the South, I am persuaded that in the present condition of the strife the abolition of slavery by constitutional amendment would tend to strengthen the Government and greatly increase the chances of an early restoration of the Union. I confess, too, that as the leaders of this rebellion avow a determination to fight it out to the last, and I having no doubt of the result, if we are true to ourselves, I want, when the result comes, that it shall find all the United States a land peopled by freemen alone, that we may stand in the face of Christendom and announce to the world of enlightened and Christian men, "You have upbraided us in the past for our having continued a barbarous institution that the world has long since discarded; you can upbraid us no longer; America is free, and the Union is safe."

Mr. WADE. Mr. President. I did not suppose that we should be led into so extensive an argument upon this subject by the few remarks that I made a short time ago. The Senator from Maryland has very much mistaken me, if he supposed that he could bind me authoritatively to any opinions that the President of the United States might entertain, or that they would have any more effect upon my mind upon these questions than though they emanated from any other respectable source. The Senator thought also that on due reflection I probably might alter my opinion upon some of the sentiments that I advanced. In that, too, he was altogether mistaken. I have reflected long upon these subjects. My mind has long since been deliberately made up upon them. I have endeavored to reflect upon them in all their bearings, both proximate and remote; and I have nothing to abate of the sentiment that I advanced in regard to slavery.

Sir, all these bugaboos that the gentleman raises in his own imagination to frighten us from our purpose, do not have the least effect upon me. I fear nothing with regard to the United States but injustice. As long as the people of the United States will ground themselves upon the rock of eternal justice and right, I am willing to stand the contest; and if it must be so, defy all those nations of the earth. Let us clear our own skirts from injustice and wrong, and when that is done we shall have but little to fear from any other quarter.

The Senator would make peace without abolishing slavery; and yet he has drawn, in about as strong colors as any man can draw, the evils of that institution. He has told us that it is every way wrong, demoralizing, and anti-Christian, closing the Bible and, he said, the means of salvation, or something like that, from a great portion of our people; and yet he fears to walk up to the principle of its abolition. I could not exactly see, after he had in such clear light and such glowing colors depicted the terrible evils of this institution and its great wrongs, how he was going to argue right off after that that there was a way to leave it, root and branch, all standing, and make peace before we eradicate it.

He told us that the President of the United States did not agree with me. Sir, if the President of the United States is an honest and honorable man, as I take him to be, he does agree with me; for the convention that nominated him laid down the only principle upon which he should be supported by the people of the United States, and that was, that this evil of slavery should be eradicated. That is the word, sir. And when those principles were put forth to Mr. Lincoln as the nominee of that convention, he assented to them, and said peace could only be made on the terms of eradicating this institution. That was said at Baltimore. I have not the platform in my pocket, but that is what they said, and that is what Mr. Lincoln consented to. Will the Senator tell me that he has backed out of it; that now that he has induced the people of the United States to vote him into the Presidency he will turn round and say that whenever the rebels will lay down their arms they may have their institution of slavery as they had before, and they are to come back into this Senate recking with treason? Are Toombs and Davis and Benjamin to come back here merely because they lay down their arms? Is that the position that I understood the Senator to contend the President of the United States was in favor of, and he himself was in favor of?

Mr. JOHNSON. I have said no such thing, and did not think of any such thing. If Toombs, Davis, and the others should come here, I should hold that they ought to be indicted for treason instead of being admitted to their seats; but the South is not composed of Toombs, Davis, and Benjamin. But while I am up, I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, suppose every man in the confederate States should lay down his arms; who is going to fight them? How are you going to carry on the war if there is nobody to fight?

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, if they will throw down their arms, we will govern them until they do right.

The Senator tells us in one breath that they will sacrifice everything; they will become mean colonial dependents of foreign nations before they will do the meed of justice to abolish slavery; and in the next breath he tells that the rebels will abolish slavery themselves for the purpose of forming these alliances. Sir, if they can dispense with this institution in order to get down beneath the despotisms of Europe, and become their base, colonial vassals, I would compel them to do it in order to be the honored associates of us here. They have committed a crime by which they have forfeited, on every principle of international law, every right, if rights they had, to privileges under the States as States as they formerly stood. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that war breaking out between two nations abolishes every treaty arrangement or agreement existing between them? They are all prostrate at the election of either of the belligerents. I do not suppose it differs between a foreign and a domestic war. If they have raised their arms against the Constitution of the United States, and waged flagrant war with us, have we not the right to treat that as a war, and say that any agreement detrimental to us, or dishonorable to us, shall be entirely abrogated, and that before they resume their position again they shall overthrow and dispense with such an institution? It is no more than nations always claim, one with another, who have been at war, and finally make peace.

Will the Senator tell us that the French and English will combine to bolster and hold up the people who have held this institution until they are dying with weakness, with starvation, and with all the evils consequent upon a subjected people? Will he tell us in one moment that they will be so strong that we are to dread the alliances they may make, and in the next that they are so conquered that they are about laying down their arms, and that we have nothing standing up to wage war with, because they cease to war with us? Sir, when they lay down their arms and cease to war with us, they shall also cease to make war against the rights of human nature; and while they pray for mercy at our hands, we will say as courts of equity say, "Come with clean hands; do justice yourselves, and then we will do justice to you; but as long as you attempt to hold your fellow-man in bondage, as long as you tread upon his neck and reduce him to slavery, can you look us in the face and beg for mercy?" Sir, can we look to God Almighty and beg for mercy or prosperity to the nation if we make peace and permit a conquered people to enslave men quite as good as themselves?

Sir, that is not the way I suppose this controversy is to terminate. I say to the people of the South, "There can be no peace while slavery exists; it is at war with free institutions." As I said when I was up before, it is an organized rebel. Its arm is at war with every free nation in the world. Every free nation must necessarily be diametrically at war with slavery; and so long as slavery exists there can be no peace. I do not think it will take thirty years to terminate this war; but I say, let it go on indefinitely, thirty years or more, if it be necessary to conquer this institution, and compel these men when they ask for justice at our hands to do justice by their own people. We have paid too dear already for what we are to gain to permit this root of iniquity, this antagonism to all right, justice, and liberty to exist a moment, and it shall not exist.

I am not singular in all this. I say with those who laid down the platform upon which the President was elected, that when peace comes slavery shall be no more in the United States, and by my voice and by my vote there shall be no peace as long as there is a slave in the United States or its Territories. I say it again, and I do not fear Great Britain or France. Sir, when these glorious and godlike sentiments are promulgated to our people and echoed across the Atlantic in France and England, the despots there will have enough to do at home instead of coming to fight the principles here. God knows the great principles we are contending for are already taking root on the other side of the Atlantic, and they will give these despots trouble enough before we have any difficulty with them. Let us stand honestly by our principles and trust in God that we shall come out all right, as we shall. I do not fear France and England. I know very well that we have nothing to expect from their clemency, nothing to expect from our own cowardice. They stand upon their rights, and they are in opposition to us. I mean to say they stand upon their power, not upon their rights; they are only limited in their aggressions against us by their fears, for they know, as I know, that the reflex of the great principles that we are contending for is already shaking the continent of Europe to its very center, and no wonder despots turn pale when they look across the Atlantic and see what this war is for, and see how it is about to terminate. I tell you, sir, despots may tremble. In waging this war the loyal United States stand up in defense of the great and godlike principles announced by our fathers, and which, in my judgment, are yet destined to pervade the whole earth. There is no step to be taken backward. I know when we threw down the glove and took up arms in this case we not only made war with the revolted South but we raised our arm against every despotism on God's earth. We have no favor to expect from any of them beyond what we can defend by our right arm. There is not a king, aristocrat, or despot on the face of God's earth but what is violently at war with all the sentiments for which we contend.

Talk not, then, of stopping short of our true principles in order to conciliate France and England. I tell you, sir, France and England are looking more how they shall defend themselves against our principles than how they shall wage war in behalf of the old principles of the middle ages that they see, as we see, are gone forever. Half-way measures will not save the people. As I stated before, I want no peace, and as far as my voice and my vote can go, you shall have no peace, until slavery is no more in the United States; and I believe the President of the United States is with me on this point. I know that there was a good deal of higgling about the President's proclamation "to whom it may concern," but that proclamation contained the pure doctrine upon which he was put to stand and to be voted for. He announced it boldly like an honest man, and he never, to my knowledge, has taken back one jot or tittle of it. I know you can pick his message to pieces, and make something plausible out of it in the direction the Senator attempted; but I do not read it so, because I am bound to understand that the President is a straightforward, honorable man, who will live up to the principles that he announced to the people who gave him their votes, and he told them plainly that there should be no peace until slavery is abrogated. That is the platform upon which we put him, and he said that he assented to it; he put out his declaration in exact accordance with it, and the people elected him.

The Senator tells us that some whiffing, higgling politicians whom I might name have undertaken to show that the President did not mean what he said. Sir, it was a very impertinent thing for them to interfere with him in that way. I know that we have men among us who do not believe in the principles of justice and right, who do not believe that we can trust the people upon this great subject, and who wish to misrepresent the position of the President because in their short-sightedness they were led to suppose that the President would receive more votes by having it understood that he would make peace upon almost any terms and save slavery, than he would if he declared, as he boldly did, that it should be abrogated. I know that there were such men; I read their speeches and I read their comments in their newspapers on the President's proclamation. I despised them. They had no effect upon the people, who treated them with utter contempt and stood by Abraham Lincoln, who had put up the true milk of the word, and they stood upon it and voted for him, understanding that he stood upon it, and it is too late for him to back out of it, and he will not do so, but if he would, he would be the most infamous man that ever obtained the confidence and votes of the people by false pretenses.

Whatever some men may say, Mr. Lincoln stands upright on the principle that I avow, that slavery shall be abolished before there can be peace. I know who they are that have commented on this position, and have endeavored to explain it away, and their comments go to Europe and the ruling classes there are quick to seize these commentaries on the President's proclamation in order to deceive their own people, if they possibly can, with the idea that Mr. Lincoln is backing out of the great principles of liberty which endeared him to our people and secured his re-nomination and triumphant reelection, and without which he would have had a millstone around his neck and could by no means have succeeded. Conservative gentlemen always suppose they are more numerous than the elections show them to be. They are about the poorest reliance a man ever found to lean upon at election time. For nearly ten years past no man has received any considerable promotion unless he won it at the hands of those who are called radicals. The radical men are the men of principle; they are the men who feel what they contend for. They are not your slippery politicians who can jigger this way or that, or construe a thing any way to suit the present occasion. They are the men who go deeply down for principle, and having fixed their eyes upon a great principle connected with the liberty of mankind or the welfare of the people, are not to be detached by any of your higgling. The sternness of their purpose has regenerated as it were this whole continent, has revolutionized it, at any rate.

Sir, the principles that I stand here to-day to contend for I contended for ten years ago in such a miserable minority in this body that those who concurred with me were not strong enough to be able to order the yeas and nays, and as we traveled up and down the streets of Washington we were in danger of being beset by the myrmidons of slavery. But where are you now, ye conservatives, that then stood with your heads so high? The radicals have their feet upon your necks; they stand now upon the principles they avowed at that day, and they are determined that their feet shall rest on the neck of this monster until he breathes his last. In the hour of victory, when we have the solution of the great question which we have so long contended for within our grasp, within our reach, do you suppose we are now to back down and to permit you to make a dishonorable pro-slavery peace after all this bloodshed and all this sacrifice of life and property? It cannot be. Such revolutions never go backwards, and if God is just, and I think He is, we shall ultimately triumph. Those who undertake to misconstrue the position of the President of the United States are acting without authority, I feel certain. If, however, the President does believe as they say, and dare take the position they would ascribe to him, it is so much the worse for the President. The people of the United States are greater than the President. The mandate they have sent forth for the death and execution of this monster, slavery, will be persisted in. The monster must die, and die he shall.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I hope that we shall now be able to take the vote on this question, and therefore I shall not go into this general discussion in regard to slavery. I desire, however, to say a single word in regard to a remark made by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis], who has offered the pending amendment. He says that we are to turn these poor wives and children out on the world without any one to support them. The Senator forgets that we pay the husband and the father sixteen dollars a month to support his wife and his children. We clothe and feed the colored soldier, and we pay him sixteen dollars a month, and with that pay he can support wife and children. Make them free, and not only will his wages go to their support, but the labor of their own hands will go to their support. Therefore, sir, the question of humanity raised by the Senator from Kentucky disappears in view of the facts. We have in our service a great number of men from Delaware, West Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Tennessee, whose wives and children are held in bondage. It is estimated by those who know something about the number of men we have raised in these States that the passage of this joint resolution will make free from seventy-five to one hundred thousand women and children.

It will certainly be an encouragement to men to enlist that thereby their wives and children will be made free. It will give contentment, it will fire the heart and nerve the arm of the soldier already in the service to know that his wife and children are free. It will add to the strength and efficiency of the men already in the field. Therefore, sir, to encourage colored men to enter the service—and we want every one we can get—and to add to the efficiency of the colored men already enlisted, we propose to make their wives and their children free. That is the simple proposition before the Senate to-day. That the master will come hereafter and ask of this Government to make compensation to him I have not a doubt, and I am willing to trust to the justice of Congress and to the justice of the nation.

I will simply add that I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, which would confine the operation of the resolution to the soldiers hereafter to be enlisted, will not receive the sanction of the Senate. It is a sad thought that brave men who are dying for their country, men who are periling their lives in front of rebel legions, men who are in the trenches before Richmond under the fire of rebel cannon, men who are bearing your flag in various parts of the country, men who hold the Mississippi river, men who are serving the country with fidelity; it is a sad thought that such men are troubled by the consideration that their wives and their children at home are left to the tender mercies of men who do not believe that they ought to be in the service of their country. It is wrong; and, sir, justice, humanity, and patriotism all demand the passage of the measure before the Senate in order to remedy that wrong, and I hope that we shall now have a vote.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I offer the following amendment by way of a proviso:

Provided, That no slave shall be emancipated by virtue of this resolution until the owner of the slave or slaves so emancipated shall be paid a just compensation.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] says he has no doubt that the matter of compensation to the owner will hereafter be considered by Congress. Now, sir, I do not think we can pass a bill or resolution like this, if we act in obedience to the Constitution, unless we declare in the enactment itself that compensation shall be granted. When at the last session the law was passed to enroll negroes and place them in the Army, Senators would not consent to pass it until a provision was inserted in it that the master should be compensated. To be sure, the compensation then provided was a very inadequate one; and inadequate as it was it has never been paid. The amendatory conscription law, as it was called, of the last session, required a commission to be appointed to hear the claims of slave-owners, and provided for paying to the owner of every slave who volunteered a sum not greater than $300, and $100 to the owner where the slave was drafted. Senators put in that provision, I suppose, to allay their conscientious scruples before they could vote to take slaves for the Army. That was the sole object of the provision. It was a kind of salvo to the conscience. Now, sir, it is plainly written in the Constitution of the country—I read from the fifth article of the amendments—that no man shall "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." I do not see how Senators who regard their fidelity to the Constitution, who are disposed to obey the oath they have taken to support it, can vote for this resolution, taking men's property without providing for any compensation to them.

But without regard to that question, I can find no warrant in the Constitution for passing the joint resolution itself. When this question was last under discussion, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Sumner] undertook, as I understood him, to give reasons why the proposed law was constitutional. He made a most singular speech for a lawyer, and especially for a constitutional lawyer, as I believe he claims to be. The thing really looked funny. If it had not been the utterance of a grave Senator I should have thought it was all twaddle and bosh. He made a speech to prove to the Senate that this measure was constitutional, and he never referred to the Constitution at all; never cited a single letter, line, sentence, or clause in that instrument, and he sat down as if he had proved to the Senate that the act was constitutional. Is not that a most singular kind of argument to be made in this body, to prove to the Senate of the United States that a proposed law is constitutional, which does not suggest a single provision of the Constitution to sustain it? If we had been a set of crazed idiots he could not have treated us differently.

I have been taught to believe that the Federal Congress has no power except that which is conferred by the Constitution, and, indeed, that is the express language of the instrument itself. The Senator, however, not only failed to show that there was warrant in the Constitution for the exercise of this power, but he made no effort to do away with those express provisions which forbid it. That is the kind of constitutional argument we had from the Senator!

The other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] who introduced the joint resolution, had the good taste not to indicate that he would make a constitutional argument upon it. That Senator's sound practical good sense taught him that any constitutional argument of the question would but subject him to laughter; he knew that there was no provision in the Constitution authorizing such a measure, and hence he did not undertake to sustain it upon constitutional grounds. He merely announced that he thought the power existed, but his colleague rose gravely in the Senate to discuss a constitutional question, and he made the kind of argument which I have indicated. He said that Congress has passed a law for another purpose, and hence that it settled the principle. In all my life I never heard such a constitutional argument before!

Then comes the worthy Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] with the blunt honesty and candor which always characterize him, and he makes a speech in which he does not pretend to say that the measure is constitutional. He rather scouts those who talk about the Constitution, and he says that he supports the measure upon high principles of right. He proclaims, however, that it is constitutional, and to prove that he reads the affidavit of a negro on another subject. That affidavit disclosed a hard kind of case about a poor negro, but it did not disclose that his former master put his wife and children in that camp. I dare say that if the Senator would go among the camps of our soldiers he would find white women and children hanging about their husbands and fathers, and he must know that a good soldier, one who preserves discipline in his army, would put them out, and that is all that there was in that matter. Then he says that there was a lamentable case which he saw himself of a woman and child who were battered and bruised. I have no doubt that the Senator saw just what he tells us he saw. I have no doubt that the persons who inflicted that injury on that poor woman and child were bad persons. But if the Senator takes the trouble to look at any daily newspaper in his own State, he will find as harsh cruelties inflicted on children by their parents all of whom are white. That proves nothing except that there are bad and wicked persons who are cruel to slaves, and bad and wicked persons who are cruel to their own offspring.

But, sir, that kind of sickly sentimentality is not to govern this body in the exercise of a constitutional power. The Senator from Ohio goes further, and tells us openly and boldly what I have known to be the fact for more than two years, that the object of this war is to crush the institution of slavery, and not to restore the Union as it was. I am obliged to the Senator for his bold utterances. I like truth, candor, boldness; I abhor from the bottom of my heart your sickly trimmers and dodgers. They are unworthy the confidence of the country, unworthy the confidence of their associates, unworthy the confidence of men animated by the principles of manhood. The Senator from Ohio, however, comes up boldly to the work, and he wants this war to continue for the purpose of bringing about the, to him, most cherished of all objects, the destruction of the institution of African slavery; and he tells you that he is glad that the rebels stand out stoutly and fight with heroic valor. It is well for that Senator that he is enrolled among those who are counted par excellence loyal men. If a poor Democrat had uttered that sentiment he would have been denounced as disloyal, and perhaps ere this time some Senator would have offered a resolution to expel him from this Hall. The Senator from Ohio rejoices that the rebels fight with heroic valor and with staunch courage. He says he is glad of it, and he expresses his great gratification because that will prolong the war.

The Senator's position is just this: until he can accomplish the, to him, most desirable of all objects, the abolition of slavery, he wishes the war fought on for twenty or thirty years, or indefinitely. He proclaims to the Senate—and that he believes every utterance he has made no man can doubt—that he is glad that the southern people fight with such desperate valor, because it tends to prolong the war and to cause this institution ultimately to be abolished. The logic of the Senator's propositions then is, that he is willing the war shall go on for thirty or more years, and he is glad that the southern people exhibit desperate valor; he is willing that thousands and tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of the people of the adhering States, his own constituents in Ohio in part, shall die by the steel of those in arms in order that the war may be prolonged to set free a few miserable Africans! That is the Senator's proposition, to me a monstrous proposition. The idea that a Senator should be delighted at the heroic valor of the southern people, when his own kindred, his own constituents of the white race, are falling beneath their steel by hundreds of thousands, and perhaps, as will be the case if the war continues, (as the Senator wishes it may in case he cannot effect the object sooner,) by millions! He rejoices at it because it tends to effect this object.

The Senator's proposition, if logically carried out, would clothe this whole land in mourning and woe; it would bring lamentation to the hearthstone of every family in this broad nation; a father slain here, a son there, and a husband yonder; and at all that the Senator rejoices, because by bringing such desolation into the families of the land he thinks he can free these poor, miserable, downtrodden Africans. Sir, I have more sympathy for my own race than I have for any other, for my own people, and for my own household, and for the household of my neighbor. I do not wish to see mourning and sorrow carried to any family. I would to God that the weeds of mourning could be banished from my vision forever; but if there is to be mourning, I prefer that it shall be by others rather than by my own people.

But, sir, such are the principles and such are the sentiments of the Senator from Ohio, and I verily believe he is right when he says that the President of the United States affirms the same principles. I think the message of the President, as they say out West, was riding on both sides of the sapling. I know that the New York Tribune construed it as the Senator from Ohio does, and the New York Times construed it as the Senator from Maryland does. I thought when I read it, to use the language of a rather grandiloquent friend of mine in Kentucky when he wanted to express the word "doubtful," that the President intended to leave every person in a state of dubiosity as to what he did mean on that subject. I thought he was muddy upon it purposely. I thought he wanted to get recruits from both wings of his party in that way. I considered the message to be uncertain and indefinite on that subject. The Senator, however, is right when he says the President's platform was that way. But there was another platform, and I hope they will not repudiate it before the term of service for which this man was elected expires. I refer to the Chicago platform, upon which Mr. Lincoln was elected for the term which he now serves. That platform declared emphatically that Congress had no right to interfere with slavery in the States, and I hope that until the presidential term expires the Senator from Ohio and others will confine the President to that platform, and not put him on his new platform until he is sworn in on the 4th day of March next. I do not think it is right to swap horses in this way. The President is not across the stream yet, and you know he said on a memorable occasion that it was not well to swap horses while crossing a stream. Let him get across, let him enter upon his next term before you apply to him the platform on which he was recently elected.

But, sir, to come back to the question, there is no warrant in the Constitution for the passage of the joint resolution now before us. The Senate refused to pass a law conscripting negroes and taking them into the service until they put into the law a proposition for compensation to the master. Now, I ask Senators to point me to the clause in the Constitution that authorizes the passage of this law. There is no Senator here who will contend that by virtue of his office as a Senator he is clothed with any power except that which is derived from the Constitution of the country, that Constitution which you and I and all of us swore to support when we took our seats here. We have no power except what is conferred by that instrument. Point me to the clause of the instrument that authorizes this legislation. It is not in the wit of mortal man to do it, because the Constitution has no such warrant; and the learned Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] who made that constitutional argument of which I have spoken, well knew it. He is learned in the Constitution, I admit. I know that many of his constructions are very heretical; but he knows every line and letter of the Constitution, and he would have pointed to the clause authorizing this legislation if there was one.

These slaves are private property. If they are not private property, why legislate to make them free? If they are property, what becomes of the clause of the Constitution which provides that private property when taken for public use shall be compensated for? You do not here even take it for public use, but you take it, you say, to animate the soldiers who are in the field, and to induce men to go into the service as soldiers. Those whom you want to enlist are considered as property. You treat them as property. They have been considered from the time of the adoption of the Constitution to this day as property. They have been so regarded by all political parties. Your courts, both State and national, have adjudicated it over and over again. There has been one concurrent, unbroken series of authority of political and judicial opinion on that subject, and there is none to the converse. How, then, can you take that property from the lawful owner without giving him compensation? It is impossible that you can do it unless you violate the Constitution. But, Senators, I am aware from what I see about me that this resolution is going to pass. I know there are many able constitutional lawyers who will vote for it; and I would be delighted if some one of them would kindly condescend to point to the clause of the Constitution that authorizes it. My friend from Delaware called for such an exposition of the Constitution, and the Senator from Massachusetts undertook to give it, and never referred to the Constitution at all.

Mr. President, it is manifestly just, if you pass this law, depriving these people of their property, that you shall give them compensation, and the amendment I propose simply declares that compensation shall be awarded. I shall not take up further time on this question; but before I take my seat, allow me to say a word in regard to the war. In the course of the debate, a great deal has been said about it. My views in regard to the war are very well known to the Senate. I have, from the beginning, viewed it as a thing that would result in incalculable evil to both sections of the country. I believe to-day that you will never restore our constitutional Union by war. I believe the result of the continuance of the war will be that the constitutional liberties of the people both North and South, which our fathers gave us, will be destroyed. We actually live to-day under a military despotism; and in my judgment you will have it entailed upon you permanently, unless this war is speedily closed. Train this army and keep up its numbers to what they have been heretofore and are now, for a few more years, and I tell you, sir, men with swords will dictate your legislation. There can be no doubt of that. History in all times is full of such precedents.

Some call this a war for the negro, but, in my opinion, those who look upon African slavery as the cause of the war are greatly, sadly mistaken. That is but the distempered, fanatical idea of those who had "negro on the brain;" who thought of nothing else; who spoke of nothing else; who had no other political capital to build upon. They are the men who got up that twaddle; men who were prominent among the old maiden ladies who get up societies, and those white cravated creatures who go about, and instead of preaching Christ crucified, preach Sambo in chains.

This war was not designed by the large slaveholders of the South; they did not want the war. I will tell you the cause of this war. It is not a war of the negro; it is not a war of tariffs; it is not a war of any particular line of policy; but it is a war of politicians who were faithless to their constitutional obligations, and there the responsibility will be placed by the philosophical historian in all after time. If I were to describe it in a sentence, I should say that it is a war of politicians both North and South, a war of ambitious fanatical zealots, and they existed North as well as South. They existed in both sections, and they were regardless of their constitutional obligations. It is that class of politicians who are faithless to the law, who are faithless to their oaths of office, and who claim to be governed by a law higher than and above the Constitution. Any people who are led by such men will be wrecked and ruined. There is not a man who has a thimbleful of brains but knows that there is no liberty save in the supremacy of the laws. They lose sight of this wise maxim and take a tilt in any direction that gratifies their whims and their enmities. This war was not brought about by a majority of the American people in either section. There were fanatical, higher-law abolitionists in the North who disregarded their constitutional obligations, which wise, honest, and just men were bound by; and there were in the South a class called fire-eaters who were fanatics too. Both parties were ready to take up any bone about which they could make the fiercest quarrel. They had the tariff bone at one time, and they came near wrecking the Union on that. If the bone of contention had been the spinning-jennies of New England, and they thought that issue would have more aggravated the people than any other, they would have seized on that bone. The slavery question was caught hold of by these designing men, men faithless to their constitutional obligations, as the one best calculated to excite the people. What the fanatics of the North said, the fanatical fire-eaters of the South echoed to their people, and the hard things which they said would be catered back to the North. I have seen speeches in Congress made by men of both sections, filled up with long strings of quotations of harsh sayings by men of the other section of the people of their own. The historian who will write the cause of this war truly and philosophically will say that it was a war of politicians North and South, and of politicians who were faithless to the obligations to the Constitution of their country. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment I have offered.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 7, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bucknaw, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, and Saulsbury—7.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I offer this amendment as a proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this resolution shall not apply to or be operative in any State that has not assumed to secede from the Union.

It is not my intention, sir, to continue the discussion of this measure by any remarks on the resolution. I will, however, take occasion to say that I am sincerely glad that the honorable Senator from Ohio has made in the Senate to-day the speech that he has made. The country now will understand from an authoritative source (because he speaks not only for himself but for the President of the United States and for the Republican party) what is the object of the present war; what we are fighting for. We understand further that if that object and purpose cannot be obtained under thirty years of bloodshed, the land is to run red with blood thirty years longer. I think the thoughtful people of this country will pause and think.

Mr. President, John Randolph, in his last will, said that Nathaniel Macon was the wisest and best man he ever knew. I will conclude what I have to say now by reading an extract from a letter of Nathaniel Macon, dated February 9, 1833, It is this:

"When confederacies begin to fight liberty is soon lost, and the Government as soon changed. A Government of opinion established by sovereign States for special purposes cannot be maintained by force. The use of force makes enemies, and enemies cannot live in peace under such a Government."

The spirit of this debate on the part of the friends of this measure illustrates the truth of this saying.

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be read before the question is put on concurrence.

The amendment was read. It was in lines twenty-two and twenty-three, to strike out the words "during the continuance" before "of any such marriage."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS. I now renew in the Senate the amendment which I offered in committee, and ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose it is not necessary. The Senate well understand the effect of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask to have the amendment read.

The Secretary read the amendment; which was in line six to strike out the words "that has been or" and insert "who," and after "may" to insert "hereafter."

Mr. CARLILE. I did not intend to open my mouth again in the Senate of the United States during the brief remnant of the term which yet remains to me; and I would not now say a word if I did not believe that possibly it is but justice to myself to explain the reasons that govern me in voting as I shall vote upon the pending proposition. I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] providing for payment to the owners of the slaves referred to in the bill in the event of its passage. I did it from a conviction upon which I have acted ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this Chamber. In my humble opinion Congress has no more power to buy negroes and appropriate the money for their payment out of the public Treasury to set them free, than it has to liberate them. Entertaining that opinion, I could not, however much I might have desired to do so, support the amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] nor shall I vote for the amendment of his colleague making the bill prospective. I shall, of course, vote against the bill upon its passage. Denying, as I have ever done, the power of the Government of the United States to conscript slaves or anybody else into its armies, I have no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that you have no right to pass any such bill as this now under consideration. The power of raising armies is given, it is true, by the Constitution of the United States to this Government, but it cannot raise them by conscription without destroying that other provision which recognizes the right of each State to its own militia. You must raise your armies in another and different way than that which you have undertaken by the passage of your conscription bill. I deny all power to put a negro, the property of his master, into the service of the United States in any capacity, with the power to you to liberate him. It is beyond your jurisdiction, according to my reading of the Constitution, and upon that I must act as a Senator in this body. It was contemplated by the framers of this Government that the militia of each State should be its protection, not only against other foes, but against the encroachments that might be made upon the rights of the States by the agent which they constituted in the formation of the Federal Government.

But, sir, if I believed that you had the power to conscript a negro slave and place him in your Army and thus profit by the service which he would render in a military capacity, I would, with the Senator from Ohio, say that you should not only liberate him but all connected with him. I can understand the consistency of gentlemen occupying the position of the Senator from Ohio, but I cannot understand the consistency of gentlemen who denounce the institution of slavery as sinful, inhuman, unrighteous, and the sum of all villainies, but at the same time will not go with the Senator from Ohio. Men who believe that under this war power, or this power to raise armies, you can conscript negro slaves and put them into the service of the United States, it seems to me would not have to go far to believe that you have the right to liberate them. He who spills his blood in the defense of his country is entitled to his freedom, and all who are connected with him by blood or otherwise. If I entertained the opinion that you could conscript negro slaves, and believed with gentlemen who have asserted the power on the part of this Government to conscript them and put them into the military service in defiance of the laws of the States, I would, with the Senator from Ohio, advocate the passage of this bill; but I deny the power; neither do I admit that the institution of slavery is inhuman, unchristian, or immoral. I believe to-day what I have ever believed, that the best condition in which the negro can be placed is the condition occupied by him in the slave States. God made the negro inferior to the white man; he belongs to an inferior race. I look upon what you call slavery as a mere system of government, best suited to the condition and capacity of the people subject to it. No man will say that there are any universal principles in government. That form of government is best for any people which best promotes their comfort and happiness, which best tends to the advancement of their physical and moral being, and there is no other form of government that has ever been devised since the foundation of the world that tends so much to promote the comfort and happiness, the physical and intellectual improvement of the negro, as the system of slavery as organized in the States of the Union. Deprive him of the protecting care of his master and he will disappear more rapidly than the Indian. He cannot contend with the white race. This you have admitted in your freedman's bill, and many legislative enactments at the last Congress and this.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, resulted—yeas 6, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bucknaw, Davis, Hendricks, Powell, Saulsbury, and Trumbull—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Doolittle, Harding, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—11.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. POWELL. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I should be very glad if I felt at liberty to vote for this joint resolution; but as I do not, I will briefly state why I cannot vote for it. If I were to follow the inclinations of my mind I should vote to free every human being where my vote would have any tendency to accomplish the object. I am as decidedly opposed to slavery, I presume, as any member of the Senate. But, sir, we hold our seats here by virtue of a written Constitution. We are here to make laws under that Constitution. Every one of us when we came here went up to that desk, and, appealing to the great Author of all to help us in the oath we were to take, solemnly swore that we would maintain that Constitution. I can, therefore, give no vote which I believe violates that Constitution. I am glad that others can see their way clear. I do not expect to make an argument here to change anybody's opinion, nor to combat what has been said by any member of the Senate, nor to call forth any reply.

I can agree with all the appeals which may be made for humanity's sake in favor of this measure. Sir, if my vote and voice could do it, and I could utter the word or give the vote consistently with the oath which before Heaven I have taken, I would free, as I have said, every human being upon God's earth.

What is this measure? It proposes to free the wife and the children of any person who has been mustered into the service of the United States. We all know that for many years past the cruel practice has prevailed—nobody condemns it more than I do—of selling negroes from the northern slaveholding States into the southern. They have gone from Delaware and Maryland and Missouri and Kentucky and Virginia into the more southern and southwestern States. Now, sir, take a case. Here is a negro man who was sold, if you please, in the State of Delaware, twenty years ago, and he is found down in Tennessee or Louisiana, not having seen his family for nearly a quarter of a century. Inhuman and barbarous it was, I know; that it was so. He has now entered the military service of the country in the State of Louisiana. The children that were his were left in Delaware, and they belong now to some person there under the laws of Delaware. He does not know them; he has not seen them for years; and you propose to do, what? You propose to say by law that because he has entered the service in Louisiana, therefore slaves in Delaware shall be free; and you do that for the purpose of promoting enlistments! Why, sir, the man has already enlisted. This resolution is not prospective in its operation; but it declares that the wife and children of those who have enlisted shall be free. If you have power to do this, why have you not power to free every slave in the land? I believe my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] thinks you have. If I thought so, nothing would give me greater pleasure than to vote for it, but I do not so understand our powers; I do not understand that the men who made the Constitution, and who have construed it from the day it was made to the present time, so understood the powers of the Federal Government; and therefore I have been in favor of the constitutional amendment changing the Constitution so as to make all slaves free, and to make them free in such a way as would forever put it beyond the power of any State afterward to reenslave them.

I had hoped that this constitutional amendment would pass, and end this thing forever; I hope so still; but this joint resolution is only partial in its application. It, however, contains a principle which would authorize the passage of a bill abolishing slavery by an act of Congress; for if in the case I have put you can declare the slave of a loyal citizen in the State of Delaware, or in the State of Kentucky, to be free, because the father of that slave in some distant State has entered the public service, you may declare free all the slaves in the State of Virginia, or in the State of Delaware, and you can end the thing at once by act of Congress. Believing, however, that we have not the power to pass such a law, with the greatest desire on my part to pass it if we had the power, holding myself bound by the Constitution which I have sworn to support, believing that there can be no genuine liberty except liberty regulated by law, believing that we can have no Government worth preserving unless we stand by the Constitution as it is till we change it in a constitutional mode, I must vote against the passage of this joint resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 27, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hicks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Powell, Saulsbury, and Trumbull—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Doolittle, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Wilkinson, and Wright—12.

So the joint resolution was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SUMNER. It is important that there should be a brief executive session, not more than two or three minutes, in order to act on a matter that must be acted upon to-day. I move, therefore, that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 9, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports for reference only, not to be brought back by motions to reconsider, when no reports were made.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to report from the Committee of Ways and Means an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that any business reported during the morning hour to-day would have to go on the Calendar without debate, this being the alternate Monday. The morning hour will not expire until a quarter past one.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had indefinitely postponed the bill of the House (No. 586) to drop from the rolls of the Army unemployed general officers.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, communicated to the House sundry messages in writing.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the business in which the House was engaged at the adjournment on Saturday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

LOYALTY.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, our Government being based upon the idea of the right and the capacity of the people to govern themselves, and the whole scheme being but a mean to ascertain and execute the will of the people, it follows as a necessary sequence that this will, when legally expressed, must be submitted to. I do not mean we must surrender opinions and principles, nor abjectly submit to the edicts of a majority, but I mean acquiescence in the legitimate result of the governmental compact, loyalty to the Government, reserving, of course, the right, at the stated constitutional periods, to change our governors. Observance of this rule would have saved us this war, and an observance of it now will carry us and the Government through it in safety. Faction, heedless, and exaggerated opposition to the Administration and the verdict of the people will only complicate the evils we complain of. I am not of those who have abandoned all hope of saving this country and our Government. I am full of hope. I have confidence in the American arms to overthrow the military power of the rebellion; and that being done, I have confidence in the hearts of the American people that they will deal justly with a defeated and fallen enemy who has proved himself so worthy of our steel; confidence that the American mind must see the advantage of restoring several millions of civilized, Christian, intellectual, and polite people to citizenship, rather than degrade them or exterminate them or strip them of their possessions and political franchises; and confidence that we will not forget the lessons of twelve centuries of the history of our blood, which has never patiently and permanently submitted to the undue power of executive heads or capricious majorities. Many and great departures have been made, as I conceive, from the letter of our Constitution and the spirit of our institutions, and these I have not failed to deplore and condemn in their time. But I must say that these departures from rule and precedent in our trouble have not been so frequent or so great as has been common with other Governments and other peoples in times of emergency. There is to be found no example where so much force has been arrayed in so great a revolution, and the conduct of that force so much governed by law and the traditions of the past. In their political resources our people are the most elastic and the most fertile in the world, and they will soon overcome the minor evils that have attended the struggle, if they can only first overcome the greater one of the secession rebellion.

THE WAY OF PROGRESS.

The silent, flinty, scorched, and tangled history of the physical earth is a history of progress. The blood and tears of mankind that record the sufferings of men and of nations point the way of the progress of the race. The history of the earth and its several creations, demises, and successions of animal and vegetable life, as written in the pages of the great stone book, is a history of change, of progress, of violence. In the political and moral, as in the physical world, nothing is accomplished without somewhat of pain and violence, and he who has taught the "Philosophy of History," affirms that "every revolution is a transient period of barbarism." It would seem that in the moral and political world it ought to be different, as these are the provinces of mental exertion and dominion. But it is not so ordered. There is so much of the physical and animal in all of us, our modes of thought and our conclusions are so much connected with and controlled by our habits and conditions of existence, that great changes in our convictions of right, of duty, and of interest, and changes in the form or purpose of our governments, are nearly always attended by such breaks, heats, irregularities, upheavals, and subsidences as may, in politics and war, be compared to the plutonic convulsions of the leading geologic eras. The causes may be gradual, that is, may be preparing and accumulating a long time, but their defouement will generally be violent, whether among religions, as creeds and confessions of faith go down or up, and martyrs are burned or sainted; or among Governments, as monarchies, republics, democracies, anarchy, succeed each other in rapid rotation. This is because the bulk of mankind travel in a circle, repeat history, and learn nothing from the past. Our Government was framed to prevent the recurrence of these paroxysms in our politics by affording a constitutional and organized way of peaceful change and progress, and this path would have been the path of peace had it been observed. It has been departed from; can we return to it? If we cannot, how long must we or can we fight?

OTHER EXAMPLES.

The States of Greece fought twenty-seven years on a question of dominion and leadership in their confederacy, and the great historian of the conflict, in recting the violence, suffering, and irregularity that were suffered, says that the same things will always happen under like circumstances so long as human nature remains the same. The Romans bled twenty-one years to settle questions of leadership among parties and men, and in the end the empire triumphed over the republic. From the beginning of the contest between Charles and the Parliament to the establishment of William and Mary on the throne under the ancient constitution somewhat improved was forty-eight years, embracing the civil war, the Commonwealth and Protectorate; the beheading of one king, the flight and recall of another, the abdication of another, and the fortunate but kind semi-usurpation of a foreigner. From the troubling of the waters in 1789 to the overthrow of Napoleon and the reestablishment of the Bourbons in 1815 was twenty-six years; and if we embrace the revolutions of 1830 and 1848, and the coup d'état of 1851, as among the remote but legitimate consequences of that great tragedy, it was sixty-two years from the first trouble to the final development of the most democratic social order in Europe, under the most imperial monarchy of Napoleon III. Hannibal sustained himself for seventeen years in the heart of Italy, was at last compelled to return, and was overthrown at the gates of his own city.

The Romans and Samnites fought fifty years for the dominion of Italy; and Germany bled thirty years in the contest between orthodoxy and reformation, between infallibility and the insurrection of free thought. Are we to have troubles as long as other nations in the past? Shall the picture of Hungary and Transylvania in the beginning of the seventeenth century—"far and wide the land lay waste, while the injured serf had to complain equally of his enemy and his protector"—be repeated all over this land? Or the condition of France before Joan of Arc defeated the English at Orleans, and while the country, in a state of anarchy, was subject to the brigandage of Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Burgundians? It is related:

"There appeared nothing but a horrible face, confusion, poverty, desolation, solitariness, and fear. The lean and bare laborers in the country did terrify even thieves themselves who had nothing left them to spoil but the carcasses of these poor miserable creatures, wandering up and down like ghosts drawn out of their graves. The least farms and hamlets were fortified by these robbers, English, Burgundians, and French, every one striving to do his worst; all men of war were well agreed to spoil the countryman and merchant. Even the cattle, accustomed to the alarm bell, the sign of the enemy's approach, would run home of themselves, without any guide, by this accustomed misery."

While I am for a vigorous use of force, I am for trying some of the "arts of statesmanship" to prevent these bitter calamities; and this brings me to a subject upon which I hope the House will indulge me a few minutes. We must have a practicable policy of

RESTORATION.

If we can detect the quantities, numbers, and relative proportions of the forces involved in this problem we may find a proper solution in statesmanship sooner than others have found an unfortunate one in brute force and sheer exhaustion. There has to be an end of all wars, and I am not afraid to begin to look for an end of this one. And as we are determined not to end it except on the basis of our nationality, had we not better begin to devise a way for the return of disaffected and rebellious citizens, and if there is a disturbing cause in our politics remove that cause, and then on other questions mark out a way plain and easy for the return of States and citizens to duty and to loyalty? If the greatest temporal Power that has held dominion over men deemed it wise and politic in conquering her barbarian enemies, rivals, and neighbors, to destroy as few of them as was possible to accomplish her purpose, and, having conquered, admitted them to citizenship with as many of their former laws and customs as were compatible with their new relations, how much more should we pursue that line of policy with our own people! The country has rejected the impracticable scheme of "reconstruction" contained in the President's amnesty proclamation of December, 1863. The President rejected the bill passed by Congress at the last session, and now the same scheme, somewhat modified, has been reported from the committee on rebellious States. I cannot go for that bill. If there were no other objection to it I would fear that its extreme complication would prevent its ever being executed, and I think I may now safely predict that not one State government will ever be organized under it. And believing as I do in large national powers, I cannot for the life of me see where this Congress gets power to abolish slavery in the States by statutory enactment, and punish slaveholding in the future. If gentlemen really believe that can be done I see no use in the constitutional amendment. Then the mode of organizing the State governments, and the form which the bill requires them to assume. If the first convention does not do the job according to pattern and order, they are prorogued, and a second called, and so on until a convention of free men can be found obediently to offer up on a silver waiter a piece of parchment written all over just according to the copy set for them by this bill. If Congress can do that, why can we not in the first instance prescribe, establish, and put in motion a State government just to our liking? And if they can do that why can they not abolish one that is obnoxious and set up another in its stead? Should that bill pass and be sustained by the courts I should feel very uneasy about the preservations of our institutions of government.

No, Mr. Speaker, the case needs a simpler plan, a juster plan, which the people can take hold of and act upon without too much complication and oppressive overseeing. If there is one thing which the American people study more and understand better than any other, it is the erection and running of the machinery of representative government. Give them an opportunity, rely on them, on their resources, on their ways and means, their interests, and the work will be done in due time and in much better order than under the direction of Congress or military governors.

I believe I was the first one to propose in a formal manner to leave this whole thing to the people and the courts. Very early in December, 1863, I introduced into this House the following joint resolutions:

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: 1. That a combination of persons, in the name of a State, or an assumed confederation of States, for levying war against the United States, or for withdrawing such States from the Union, does not alter the legal character of the act done, nor excuse those engaged in it, nor does any such combination, levying of war, or attempted withdrawal amount to any destruction, forfeiture, or abdication of the right of those who at any time acknowledge allegiance and render obedience to the United States, to administer, amend, or establish a State government.

"2. That a formal return or readmission of any State to the Union is not necessary. It is sufficient that the people, or those who are loyal in any State, and qualified by the election laws thereof in force before the rebellion, shall at any time resume the functions of a State government compatible with the Union and with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and doing this is sufficient evidence of loyalty for the purpose of doing it.

"3. That all questions touching property rights and interests arising out of confiscation and emancipation, and the effect of any law, proclamation, military order, or emergency of war, or act of rebellion, upon the title to any property, or upon the status of any persons heretofore held to service or labor in any State, are left for the judicial determination of the courts of the United States.

"4. That the whole power of the nation is pledged for the suppression of the rebellion, the execution of the laws, the defense of loyal citizens in any State, the territorial integrity of the Republic, and the nationality of the Constitution.

"5. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to abridge or lessen any valid defense, or as waiving the right of the Government to inflict punishment; the purpose being to declare the nullity of secession as a State ordinance, to define the objects of the war, and to express the sense of Congress as to the proper mode of restoring harmonious relations between the Government and certain of the States and the disaffected people thereof."

The House never came to a vote on them, and it was somewhat indicative that they were not promptly negatived. In September last, Mr. Seward made a speech at Auburn, in celebration of the fall of Atlanta, and in advocacy of Mr. Lincoln's reelection, in which the following passage occurs:

"When the insurgents shall have disbanded their armies and laid down their arms, the war will instantly cease, and all the war measures then existing, including those which affect slavery, will cease also, and all the moral, economical, and political questions, as well as questions affecting slavery as others, which shall then be existing between individuals and States and the Federal Government, whether they arose before the civil war began or whether they grow out of it, will, by force of the Constitution, pass over to the arbitration of courts of law and to the councils of legislation."

This was the only part of the speech which its distinguished author thought it necessary to italicize in the pamphlet edition. Coming from the premier of the Administration this was hoped to be a long stride in the right direction.

Soon after the result of the election was known General Butler made a speech at New York, which most people thought was made on purpose and with an understanding, and to prepare the public mind for the things which it was supposed to foreshadow. And lastly, the President in his recent message, though not quite coming up to the pattern set by General Butler, which embraced general and complete amnesty, and an offer of the olive-branch, yet very well says "abandonment of armed resistance to the national authority on the part of the insurgents" is the "only indispensable condition to ending the war on the part of the Government," and "in stating a single condition of peace, I mean only to say that the war will cease on the part of the Government whenever it shall have ceased on the part of those who began it." Barring a little mixture with other matter found just in that part of the message, I do most heartily and thoroughly approve of the sentiment. As it is natural for me to think I have been right all the while, I do most cordially congratulate the President and his Secretary on their conversion to my views. Though a little late in seeing it, there is time yet for them to indorse and encourage the plan of restoration embodied in the bill I introduced on that subject at a former day of this session:

A bill to provide for the restoration of the civil authority of the United States in certain States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever a civil government, republican in form, and compatible with the Union and the Constitution of the United States, shall be established by the people, or administered as it existed on the 6th day of November, 1860, in any State, now or since that day not represented in the Congress of the United States, such State shall, in all matters, be held and treated as a State of the Union, and its government guaranteed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, in organizing or administering any government in any such State, no person shall be entitled to vote except citizens having the qualifications prescribed by the laws thereof in force on the 6th day of November, 1860.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no law or usage of any such State shall be held to defeat or abridge the right to freedom which any person or class of persons may be adjudged entitled to, under any law of the United States, or any order or proclamation of the President thereof, by a court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all questions touching the status of persons in such States and the titles to property are remitted to the courts of competent jurisdiction.

This is an appeal to the people, and a way offered to them; and it is the peace which will ultimately be adopted out of necessity.

I regret that the provisions of the committee's bill compel me to vote against it, for I do desire to support, in some form, that clause of the bill which recognizes the State government of Louisiana. But if the bill meets its deserved fate that can be done by a separate resolution. The only objection I have heard to my bill is that it allows everybody to vote. And what if they do vote, just so they first lay down their arms and vote to organize and carry on a loyal State government? It will come to that at last. Those people cannot be forever disfranchised and held as conquered colonies. I would not vote a man nor a dollar to execute such a policy. This House is less practical—I had almost said less wise and less just—on that one point than any other organ of opinion on the continent. I affirm that the President, the Secretary of State, the American press, nine tenths of the American people, and nearly the entire Army, would to-day stop this frightful war if it could be done on the President's condition of the rebels laying down their arms, and on my plan of allowing the people to form their own governments, with no restrictions except loyalty to the Constitution and Union.

DUTY OF CONSERVATIVES.

What consistent course is left for those who have at once opposed the rebellion and many of the measures of the Administration? Our duty and our interest alike demand a proper answer. The contest is between nationality and voluntary disintegration. If in that contest the old order of things has already been lost, there is a tendency toward an issue between central power on one hand and local and personal license on the other. We have tried to avoid these two extremes and to hold the State in the deep water of the middle channel of the Constitution. We have failed. It is possible that one of these two extreme ideas will for a while succeed. That is historical. It is equally historical that in such contests the middle and conservative men are destroyed by the hostility of both extremes. What now is our duty to ourselves, to the country, and humanity? Shall we retire absolutely from the contest, or adopt the lesser of two evils and reluctantly accept one of the two antagonistic and extreme ideas of government, or continue so to discharge the duties of citizens and legislators as to deal with facts as we find them, and not with theories as we would have them; make the best of events and circumstances as they overtake us or fall in our way; round off the angular points of a transition period, and restrain, if possible, the current of revolution when it would involve all in a common ruin? The latter seems to me the part of wisdom, of duty, and of interest. We cannot retire from the contest if we would, and I am persuaded we ought not if we could. As to voting, writing, and speaking, we could; but as to fighting and paying taxes we cannot, any more than Union men within the lines of the enemy are able to avoid fighting us. When society is so exerting itself as to demand and develop the maximum military and financial strength of a people, all the members do, by consent or per force, take part in the struggle. This is a law of social existence. If conservative men have to fight and pay taxes, either in a war upon the rebellion or in a rebellion against the Government, though the war be not conducted after their liking, I am sure they will not hesitate a moment which course to pursue. For my part my position is well known. I have never hesitated to proclaim that the war against the rebellion must go on to a successful termination although in its progress slavery may be utterly subverted, and to declare most explicitly that if I must choose between secession and slavery on the one hand and universal emancipation and nationality on the other, I would embrace and cling to and defend our nationality, and profoundly rejoice over every victory of the arms of the Republic and over every discomfiture of its enemies on the field and at the polls.

Secession is the essence, concentrated power of anarchy, and that is the sure precursor of absolutism. We are fighting for the idea of a nation, and though we may, and probably will, come out of the contest with some of the practices if not the characteristics of monarchical power, we will yet come out of it with a nation, a country, a theory of government, an idea of order as opposed to disorder, of protected rights as against lawless brute force; and the temporary abuses of administration can and will be corrected by time, good sense, and legal remedies in the days of peace.

THE AMENDMENT.

After much hesitation and earnest reflection, I have concluded to vote for the resolution submitting to the people of the States the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which, if successful, will forever settle the vexed and distressing question of slavery. In doing this I beg to assure gentlemen that I have come to this conclusion, viewing the subject from a national, and even from a Kentucky stand-point, and have derived little or no assistance from those views common to the members of what is termed the radical party of the North. Being among those who were defeated at the last presidential election I would not now render "a reason under compulsion, if reasons were as plenty as blackberries." And as they are nearly as plenty, and as they are found in great numbers on my own side of the river, I will offer a few. Without any extended argument the vote could be justified on any one of these grounds:

First, the passage of this joint resolution does not determine the matter, but only refers it to the people, the source of all power.

Second, that a man with an earnest respect for the people, and a profound regard for our system of government, might very consistently vote for its submission, and then in his State vote against its ratification.

Third, seeing the people have determined to do it, it becomes the part of wisdom to let it be done as quickly as convenient and with no unnecessary opposition. Let the agony be over and the rubbish cleared away.

If I wanted to justify it as an anti-slavery measure it would not be hard to find great authority in my own section. No two names are more worshipped throughout the South than Washington and Jefferson. Washington was a practical emancipationist, and it would not be doing any great injustice to Jefferson to call him an abolitionist. No name is more ardently loved in Kentucky than that of Henry Clay; and Mr. Clay never omitted a good opportunity to express his convictions of the great evils of slavery.

In 1822 the members of the Kentucky Legislature nominated Mr. Clay to the people of the United States for the Presidency. A committee appointed to correspond with the members of the Ohio Legislature, in urging the fitness of Mr. Clay's nomination said, "We apprehend that no mistake could be greater than that which would impute to him the wish to extend the acknowledged evils of slavery; for we are persuaded that no one entertains a stronger sense of its mischiefs than he does, or a more ardent desire, by all prudent and constitutional means, to extirpate it from our land," and proceed to state that for more than twenty years he had been in favor of the gradual abolition of slavery. This letter is signed by William T. Barry, R. C. Anderson, J. Cabell Breckinridge, J. J. Crittenden, G. Robertson, John Rowan, and B. W. Patton, and is found on pages 148-49, of Judge Robertson's excellent "Scrap Book of Law and Politics, Men and Times."

And shall a man be told that it is wrong or disgraceful to hold opinions that have been sanctioned by the minds and hearts of such men?

But I put my action upon none of these grounds. I go boldly to the practical question and put it and justify it upon the ground that it is wise and is required by the facts and circumstances by which the people of Kentucky and of the nation are surrounded, and which have been called into being and power by the war, and which they must deal with and cannot avoid. It is thrust upon us by facts and agencies not of our procuring, and for which we are in no way responsible. Kentucky is being depopulated by the ills of this strife. Her sons and daughters are leaving her soil and their paternal roofs to find safety and peace elsewhere. The exodus is frightful, and if her people borrow trouble by fighting fate and making a stand for slavery after it is overthrown, our State will be hopelessly ruined. In the last six months I have often heard men of both parties in Kentucky wish that the President would issue his supplemental proclamation covering the whole ground, Kentucky included, rather than longer be held in doubt, uncertainty, and confusion. I have never wished him to do it because I have never wished him to do an illegal thing. Those who have thought this would be a good thing now have a legal mode presented for their approval.

THE ISSUE—DIPLOMACY OF EMANCIPATION.

The perpetuity of slavery is not the issue. That issue was made up four years ago, and the case has been decided against the institution, one half the jury being its own friends. Were we to do nothing and say nothing, Mr. Davis and General Lee, Mr. Stephens and Mr. Seddon, Governor Smith, Porcher Miles, and the Richmond press, would soon overturn slavery on their present line of thought and conduct. Indeed, it is notorious they have resolved to put the negro in the fight; and we in Kentucky all know what that means for slavery. When these men turn practical abolitionists by offering the negro his freedom for his services as a soldier, it is high time for conservative men here to cease halting and doubting on the subject. Shall we debate whether slavery can be preserved, and make a stand and submit to an overthrow for its sake, when the people of the loyal States have pronounced against it, and when the leading spirits of the rebellion have fully made up their minds to abandon it, and even to strangle it in the house of its friends in their frantic efforts to save the one point of secession? Is slavery in Kentucky worth the misery, the blood, and the desolation of such a contest as must ensue upon any serious attempt to preserve it? Our children would say "it was worse than a crime, it was a blunder." Those in authority and influence with the rebellion have fully made up their minds that they would purchase European alliance, and even accept colonial vassalage under European protection at the price of an edict of universal emancipation. It is notorious and undisputed that they would be glad to improve their diplomatic and military relations with foreign Powers by this movement. We will checkmate them at this game. We will save them the degradation of "colonial vassalage" by beating them at war, by beating them at foreign diplomacy, and by beating them at emancipation, and treating them justly and kindly the moment they return to their allegiance to the supreme law of the land. And since it is settled that slavery must die, and that this amendment will pass in a few months, if not now, why keep the country in a turmoil, or have any fierce contest over it, contending about that which is practically settled? If it must and will be done, let it be done now and have done with all suspension, uncertainty, and excitement about it. Events have taken the place of arguments, and stern facts that place of doubtful conclusions. The disturbing forces are greater than we can control. Shall we manfully yield this one point, already of no practical value, or childishly resist and be overthrown with an institution whose fall is literally crashing in our ears, and whose ruins may need to be and ought to be prudently and kindly guided through the transition period, that worst of all conditions of society? Seeing the change is now inevitable, shall we invite violence in its development or secure peace to those involved in its swift rushings? My judgment literally compels me to the position I have taken in this matter; and if I lose friends I will at least save my conscience. Some whose best interests I am now subserving will quarrel with me for the act. I ask them to hold their judgment one year and they will begin to see it as I do, and if in five years they do not openly admit I was right I may then agree I was wrong.

"DO NOTHING AND LEAVE IT TO ITS FATE,"

says one. The do-nothing and say-nothing policy is not often the right way to treat great questions. It generally springs from a lack of courage to act or a lack of perception of the right action. "Masterly inactivity" may be adopted when your adversary is unwittingly working for you or hastening to his own destruction. If my house is falling over my head I will either prop it or get out of it. I will not fold my hands and be whelmed or entangled in the ruins because it is my house, because it was a good house, because I love it, and because I denied the justice and resisted the means of its destruction. I will deal practically with facts as they exist. The people of Kentucky have been conserving slavery ever since this war commenced, and I have helped them do it in my feeble way out of regard for all vested rights and established customs, and because I am naturally averse to revolutions. But we must now either remove the rubbish of an institution or engage in the vain attempt to mend that which was never mended when once broken, or be annoyed and impoverished by a population in the worst possible condition, being neither slave nor free.

THE OPPOSITION.

To gentlemen here who think of voting against this amendment let me suggest that since slavery must shortly cease to be a question of national politics, may you not make your party more powerful for good in the great work of defining and restraining power, which, if you will excuse me, has been the principal vocation of your party, by cutting loose from a dead carcass, and declining to make a party fight for an institution which is already condemned? By clogging yourselves with such an issue you may make yourselves powerless on the great questions of personal liberty, national finances, freedom of the press, and a just measure of State rights in which you would then have the cordial cooperation of many northern Democrats and southern Whigs who will go for this amendment. It is said you ought to vote against it but not speak against it. Is not that an untenable position? Is it ever wrong for a man to give a good reason for his conduct; or right to do that for which he can give no good reason? You are freer on this question than I am. I have interests, prejudices, feeling, and arguments to combat that are unknown with you. Have you found it very clearly among your convictions of duty to vote against this bill? Do you feel very clearly convinced it would be wrong to remain silent if you cannot give it a positive support? Gentlemen, there is a power, a beauty, an eloquence, and a majesty in the living, moving judgment of letters, of arms, of poetry, of science, of democracy, of all modern civilization, which it is idle and sacrilegious to trifle with. That movement is in the direction of this amendment. Our children may regret that passage of history which shows that the American people were the last to join in this grand march; let them not read that resisting the column it crushed us beneath its mighty tread! It is a serious thing for each man to consider whether he shall place himself in the negative here.

OTHER AND FUTURE QUESTIONS.

When this amendment is passed and ratified, and the people of the South lay down their arms in a useless contest, let us go before the country on the questions of universal confiscation, of territorial governments for the States, of parceling out the lands of the southern people among free negroes, of raising the negro to citizenship, and suffrage contrary to State laws, and lastly of continuing this war one hour to accomplish these hurtful and malignant ends, and those who advocate such abominable schemes will be swept from power with a tornado of indignation and a unanimity of will that have never yet occurred in the history of the Republic. Then can I go before the country with my bill for the restoration of civil authority, and carry it by the acclamations of the American people. If it be criticised that the bill proposes to leave the slavery question to the courts, and by this amendment it is proposed to cure all doubt about the slavery question, I only reply the bill is adapted to the present condition of affairs, and would be well adapted after the amendment is ratified, because there are several interests, which I conceive to be more vital than that of slavery, which must in the end be adjudicated by the courts, and that I urge this amendment, not as a condition, but as a means of union and peace. When the whole people can stand united on this amendment as an accomplished fact and not as an exciting topic, they will speedily abandon or indignantly reject the other dangerous schemes that are now associated with this in the public mind as incident or necessary to its accomplishment.

IT IS THE REAL CONSERVATIVE POLICY.

All great movements are advocated by some fools and some bad men. All great parties have in their midst a dangerous faction. The great mass of the northern people are anti-slavery in sentiment. In this they are honest. It is natural, and sensible people do not quarrel with them for it. But there is a Jacobinical, power-loving, law-defying, plunder-hunting, blood-thirsting faction there whose strength must be broken. They were secessionists before the war commenced, and now, in the midst of a war for the Union, they would rather expel a slave State from the Union than to readmit one with a single slave in her borders. They must be overthrown. Their power is the power of the anti-slavery sentiment of the people and of modern civilization. The tide of that opinion cannot be resisted, and is so strong that it is carrying with it several dangerous and vital errors, such as the enlargement and intensification of executive power, the reduction of States to Territories, the denial of the common law and constitutional writs of freedom, the suppression of the press, the banishment of untried and unaccused citizens, and other things, admitted by the dominant party to be evils, but supposed to be temporarily necessary and incidental to the one great purpose of overthrowing rebellion and slavery.

In passing this amendment we do make sure the final extinction of slavery, but so far from indorsing the radical abolition party, we rob them of their power. And it will rob the secessionist of much of his power, for without this element of excitement and power of cohesion, the rebellion could neither have been organized nor held up for one year on any other question. And I may here as well admit, and put the admission on record, that while I have constantly contended that slavery was not the cause of the rebellion, the very intimate relation which that institution has from the beginning maintained with the deadly assault on my Government has not increased the little love I ever had for it. Then seeing that slavery is already practically abolished, so disorganized that slave labor is no longer of any value; seeing that violent and irregular abolition is more offensive and irritating than constitutional and legitimate emancipation; to bring to an end the name and legal existence of that which no longer has a practical and a useful existence, and to disarm and lay powerless the two disturbing factions in the country's politics, it seems to me wise to meet the issue fairly and fully, and to make an end at the earliest possible day of this great element of disturbance. Then indeed are the Jacobins and fanatics shorn of their locks and their strength departed before the pillars of the temple have fallen under their mad wrenches.

STATE ACTION AND CONDITIONS OF EMANCIPATION.

I long hesitated whether this thing ought not to be left to the action of the States, and if they could all act as promptly as did West Virginia, Maryland, and Missouri, that would seem to answer. But there are difficulties in the way of many of them of a constitutional character; and this is particularly so in Kentucky. My course has been influenced partly by the conviction that the interests and the judgment of the people of Kentucky demand more prompt action than can be had through State agency, and partly from other considerations of a national character which I hope will sufficiently appear in the course of this argument. Five years ago, with no predilection for slavery per se, but dealing with it as a fact and a vested legal interest, I would have favored emancipation only on the three conditions of graduation, compensation, and deportation. The events of the war have made these conditions either unnecessary or impossible. Viewing that population as a part of the labor of the State, it seems the general opinion that the graduated scale would deprive the State of what little advantage may yet be derived from them; their salable value is so lessened, or I may say destroyed, that compensation is an item of little importance, and if it were of more importance the finances of the country could not stand it; and as to colonization, that is a question of the future, and I will always favor it to the extent that our State and national finances can afford. And yet I apprehend that the next census will show the beginning of a process of declension with that race that will greatly relieve the anxiety of many persons on that score. When they are all emancipated they will have a natural but unwise desire to leave the regions of their former toils and emigrate North and West. There they will come in competition with white labor; white labor at the South will be in demand and many estates for sale, probably in small parcels, which will induce a large white emigration from North to South, so that if there are disadvantages in emancipation they will not fall entirely on the South. And I have an opinion that from these causes will occur a natural, but not painful and violent, diminution of the race that will relieve the next generation of much apprehension on their account.

Some gentlemen of the North think that by this measure they will break down what they are pleased to term the slave aristocracy. They talk idly about aristocracy. There is as much aristocracy at the North as the South, and a few years hence there will be more. So far as aristocracy exists without being based on worth or governmental institutions, it is based on land and money; and so far as these can erect a social aristocracy they will do it, regardless of the form of labor that works the land and plies the machinery of the capitalist.

INSTITUTIONS.

Institutions are ideas. Slavery is the idea of the right of one to claim, and the duty of another to render, involuntary service. Institutions reach their maximum, whether of territorial extent or of ideal development, and then decay or go off in a paroxysm. Slavery had reached its maximum in the United States when it was boldly preached that the thing was divine, and that cotton was king. And I remember when a mere lad to have expressed the opinion that slavery was coming to an end in Kentucky, when in 1849 the convention took occasion to retard and complicate the process of amendment of the constitution, and to avow a wholly untenable ground in relation to the rights of property. I will here beg leave to quote from an article of mine communicated to the Frankfort Commonwealth last spring:

"One clause seems to recognize the right of the people at any time to change their Government; another makes amendment impracticable under seven years. Another clause declares 'the right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction'; and the right of an owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatever." To a candid lawyer, or to any one at all versed in the elements of the governmental compact, this is a remarkable declaration. If it was designed as an attempt to express the familiar idea, that the notion of property, quod est tuum, is natural with man, and precedes written law, it was a very awkward attempt. No one doubts the primary maxim. But here, in order to assert the inviolability of an interest that was in no danger, a false principle is assumed, that the right of property is not only before but higher than any constitutional sanction. A right that is higher than constitutional sanction is beyond constitutional disvestment; and that this is the meaning, is shown by the asserted inviolability in the same context. The right of eminent domain, inherent in all sovereignty, and the right of organized society to control the use of property, and even to declare, in the fundamental law, what shall be property, are here swept away at a dash of the pen.

"Whatever is higher than constitutional sanction is independent of it, and such sanction would not avail it in the day of trouble. The natural elements, or foundation, of property are labor, discovery, possession. It is recognized and secured, and transmitted, by civil institutions—constitutional sanction. But, as every man by nature owns his own labor, which creates value, or property, under this declaration, the right of property being higher than such sanction, the slave becomes free at the death of the master. Of course no respectable court would decide thus, the palpable intention being so contrary. The strong man who first enters the demesne, or seizes the slave, on the death of the master can hold against the devisees who claim under the will, and against the heirs who claim under the descent cast, coolly telling them that devise, descent, inheritance, conveyances, records, are mere trifles of legal invention and constitutional sanction, but that his right is before and higher than these, for he is in by possession, control, dominion. It is a lawless, revolutionary doctrine. Instead of settling, it unsettles everything. It is now only referred to as one of the many mistakes of those who would quiet their own apprehensions by unsound and severe legislation."

This looked as if there were a dread abroad in the land, and in the convention, that the institution needed extra propping against a silent undermining process that was going on against it in public opinion.

Whatever agency the institution may or may not have had in producing the war, the events and consequences of the war, both North and South, have placed the institution on the descending plane, and this tendency is one never overcome in the history of slavery. Let proclamations be withdrawn, let statutes be repealed, let our armies be defeated, let the South achieve its independence, yet come out of the war, as now seems certain, with an army of slaves made freedmen for their service, who have been contracted with, been armed and drilled, and have seen the force of combination. Their personal status is enhanced. Their self-respect, their confidence, their rights are increased. Many of them are heads of families. They will not be returned to slavery. They will leave the whole mass. The fact, their mere presence, the idea, if their mouths were padlocked, would soon have this effect. Then slavery is doomed. The southerner is infatuated who would fight for it, especially with negro soldiers, and the northerner is crazy who would make a point (beyond the suppression of the rebellion) of fighting against slavery, especially at the price of the blood of white men. The Union men of the border States predicted these results to slavery when the secession movement commenced. We do not feel it our duty now to turn rebels because our prophecies have been fulfilled.

THE WHITE MAN'S INTERESTS.

I go now for saving a Government of constitutional and regulated liberty for the white man. I am interested more for him than about the negro. The President recommends this amendment. I would have liked his message better if he had urged some others; and if I thought I could pass them I would be tempted to offer them here. One to declare that no State can, for any cause, secede, leaving the case on the old and well-understood doctrine of revolution; one that no State shall nullify any act of Congress, or otherwise impede its action than by judicial inquiry and judgment; one drawing with more precision and clearness the line between State and Federal powers, for it is upon this point I think our Constitution less aptly expressed than upon any other; one that Congress may, and the President shall, not make a general suspension of habeas corpus; one securing the liberty of the press against military and executive interference, except for treasonable offenses, to be defined by law; that no man shall become an elector of any State against the laws thereof, and dispensing with military governors for States beyond the ordinary and necessary provost marshal system in time of war, which would save the necessity for the more specific declaration that a military governor, especially when a candidate for the Vice Presidency, shall not assume to prescribe the qualifications of voters. These are some of the political interests of the white man which I now am striving to secure, and I think these ideas will be more potent when dissociated from the idea of slavery, and not subject to the damaging suspicion of being in league with it.

MY OWN EXPERIENCE.

It must not be ill-naturedly said of me that I make no sacrifice of slave property in this matter. I never had much of any kind; and if I had today all the money that negroes have cost me in different ways I would be much obliged to them. I owned two. One I found it good to send off for the safety of my children, and the other thought it a good thing to run off just in time to save me the expense of supporting her the balance of her life. And I had two hired. One was stolen away by a northern substitute agency, who wisely preferred a direct personal interview with Joe to a formal correspondence with General Sherman on the subject, and the other went to the Army, (I hope he is a better soldier than he was a farmer,) leaving me minus some things which I had innocently supposed were mine and not his, leaving my place in the weeds and my hire note outstanding and unpaid. And now that they have all gone I feel so much better that I deem it but polite and neighborly to invite the whole world to try the experiment.

THE NEGRO AS A SOLDIER.

There can be no doubt of the legal power of the Government to use the negro. Slaves are either persons or property, or both combined. Whether they maintain to the Government either relation solely, or both combined, the relation implies duty and liability. As persons they may be called into the service; as property they may be taken, subject in both cases to the question of the liability of the Government under the Constitution to compensate the owner for the service and labor as for property taken for public use. I opposed their use on the grounds of expediency, sound policy, and public safety. From my own stand-point some of my arguments and apprehensions have been answered by the event and some have not. But the rebellion is answering them all. The South will put him directly in the ranks, and have long been doing it indirectly by putting him to such uses as would enable a larger proportion of the whites to carry arms than otherwise could do so. If he may be used to fight in the cause of the rebellion, and anarchy, and violence, and to fasten the chains upon the remainder of his own race may not we who fight for order and a nation cease our objections to using him on our side? The spectacle of an army of slaves, to be emancipated at the end of their term, if they survive the perils of war, arrayed in deadly conflict against the sons and soldiers of the Republic, fighting, bleeding, dying, to effect the double object of establishing a government of which the fundamental principle is the right of a part to destroy the whole, and of which one of the chief aims is to perpetuate the slavery of the race now called to its help; a man, a father, standing amid the fires of war to rivet bonds upon his own race and blood, and kindred, it may be forging chains that shall hang forever upon the limbs and clank forever in the ears of his own offspring, is a sight so offensive to Deity, and so revolting to humanity, that I would prevent it by all the means allowable to a Christian people. I would do it by inviting the slave to fight for a Government that would secure freedom to him and his race forever, depriving him of all motive and interest for fighting for our enemies, imbuing him with the highest motives to fight for us, and with every motive and reason to doubt and distrust, and it may be to abandon with arms in his hands a dynasty that proposes to do so great a wrong. But the matter may adjust itself. The result of all the examples of the use of servient classes in war, and they have been used freely in nearly all the Governments where there have been dominant castes, show an entire incompatibility between military service and servile labor. To the slaves of Greece and Rome, the serf of Russia, and the villain of England, the South will now add the other example of the African slave in America.

NOW AND THE FUTURE.

We will accept the inevitable meaning of passing events, look destiny in the face, deal with facts as they are, smooth the rough points on a new road, and not kick against the pricks. Twenty years, or much less, after slavery is gone, the country will be more prosperous without it than with it, and while many will continue to condemn the illegality of some of the measures that led to its destruction, few, I think, will then be found to deplore the fact of its death. It is the process of change that irritates and really injures the community. But the change is coming without and against our seeking. Then if it be possible let us order it for the best in a political and economical view. Emancipation is now the true economy in Kentucky. Right or wrong the Government has taken her able-bodied slaves for the service, and will continue to take them, leaving the women and children on our hands for support. Being deprived of the benefits of the system must we cling to its burdens? If there is a part of that population yet desirable as laborers, consider whether emancipation is not now the only means left of securing their services, and whether this being refused or deferred they will not all leave, with the hope of procuring freedom elsewhere, and whether upon the whole a reasonable hire is not better for both parties, the negro feeding and clothing himself, paying his own doctor's bills, with all the stimulus to industry and economy springing from the compensated labor system?

Labor is like any other thing of value; it is worth what it costs, and will cost what it is worth, and will find its commercial level. It is therefore impossible in the nature of things that slave labor can be cheaper than free. An able-bodied man in fair times would readily command $1,200. The interest on that at ten per cent is $120. His food, clothes, and medical attention would not be worth less than $120 more, in all $240. How much more would free labor cost? With the disadvantage on the part of the master, that the slave may die or run off, and will surely wear out, while his cash value might have been made a permanent investment in something else.

Our lands will increase in value, our roads will multiply, and we will have a great commercial emporium in our own State. I will not stop to argue these advantages, but only point to other States, and younger States, to verify the belief. I repudiate the absurd doctrine that slave labor is the foundation of a higher type of civilization. Commerce, roads, manufactures, agriculture, science, arms, the census do not say it.

LEGALITY OF THE AMENDMENT.

It has been urged that as slavery was in existence when the Constitution was framed, and was by that instrument recognized and guaranteed, it thus became a vested interest, and that it is incompetent by subsequent amendment to divest that interest, especially in States refusing to adopt the amendment; and that it is incompetent for the General Government in any form to regulate domestic and State institutions. To my mind this is a singular misapplication of legal reasoning. The argument is based on the extreme point of State rights, State sovereignty, compact, league, &c. It is well known I do not belong to that school. It is applying to the constitutional, fundamental legislation of the people, acting in their sovereign capacity, the same rules and limitations which do apply to statutory enactments and to the legislative powers of Congress as delegated and limited by the people. This is in the nature of an original compact of government, springing from the source of all power, the people. It is competent for them to construct a Government as they please. Surely, in the original instrument or contract, they could have declared all slavery abolished. The contracting power is inherent in them, and they have pointed out the mode by which the instrument may be amended. It is equally competent to do by amendment what might have been done by original compact. If it was competent to declare that three fifths of the slaves should be represented in this House, it was equally competent to declare that none of them should be or that they all should be. It is not a question of construction or of legislative power. The argument I am combating would limit the power of the people in framing a Government. It would deny to the people of a State the power to alter a fundamental law once made and interest acquired under it. I have not a particle of doubt as to the competency and binding effect of the amendment when ratified by the requisite number of States. The Constitution is but a law, the law of original institution by the people, as distinguished from an enactment of Congress. They made it, and they can change it. If they can change the tenure of office or enlarge or restrict the elective franchise, they may prescribe what shall be property and what shall not. Is it not better to satisfy this demand for this one amendment than by the aggravation of a refusal provoke the calling of a convention that may overhaul and remodel and possibly disfigure our entire constitutional fabric?

PEACE BETWEEN THE RACES.

The system of slavery, as I have observed it in Kentucky, wears none of those traits of cruelty and brutality that have been pictured on the northern mind. The household of kind master and contented slave has something of advantage and attractiveness in it. But the content, the quiet, and the mutual confidence have passed away. I need not stop to tell why. We all know. It is palpable that so long as the war continues slavery will continue to tumble to pieces. When the war is over and the freed slave returns to intermix with the others, the institution could only be preserved in the form of a modified state of war, resulting at last in open war between the races. Who so simple as to want for a slave a man who has borne arms as a soldier under a promise of freedom for his services? Who would undertake to keep in subjection a family of slaves constantly exposed to the influence of the returned freedman who had learned confidence, sagacity, and boldness in the school of war? It cannot be, it will not be, and we had as well prepare to preserve the peace between the races. I look for the large slaveholders who have had numerous and expensive families left on their hands soon to become the most urgent emancipationists from motives of economy and justice to themselves. I will not now stop to discuss the final destiny of the black man. I expressed myself clearly and at length on that subject last session, and have seen no cause to change my mind.

Mr. Speaker, I have done what I deemed best for my immediate constituents, for my whole State, and for the nation. If I am condemned it will be with the proud consciousness and sweet satisfaction that I have emancipated myself from the unmanly fear of censure and saved myself the embarrassments of a false position. If my vote be the means, in this close contest, of determining this great question, and thereby in some measure assisting in the restoration of peace, I will be more than compensated for any sacrifice I may have made. If it be a virtue to emancipate four million slaves, I claim not the credit. Their bonds were broken by the blind rage of their masters; and if it be a crime or an error, I say we have only smoothed the pillow of a dying man; and substituted law for violence. And when it is ended it will be written of the institution and its mistaken friends, as one of the most glaring historians has said of one of the greatest disturbers of the peace of Europe in the seventeenth century, who fell in his own house, under the halberds of his own men, who so lately were obedient to his every nod:

"Thus Wallenstein fell, not because he was a rebel, but he became a rebel because he fell. Unfortunately in life that he made a victorious party his enemy, and still more unfortunately in death that the same party survived him and wrote his history."

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, if the vote on this question had been taken on Saturday, I should have said nothing, and to-day I intend only to occupy a few minutes in what may prove a fruitless attempt to obtain something more than a mere party vote in behalf of a measure which will mark an era in our history, and should enlist the cordial favor of every lover of the great principles upon which our Government was founded. It is no occasion for passion, but the times call for direct and unequivocal action. Every vote will explain itself, with no aid from any other, and will admit of no commentary.

There is a reluctance upon the part of a portion of this House to even propose, for the subsequent action of the people, this amendment to the Constitution of the United States, that to me is surprising. There is not the smallest doubt of the constitutional power or of the legal regularity of the proceedings contemplated. Any objection must, therefore, apply to the merits of the measure and not to the measure itself; to the end and not to the means. How can any man, educated in any of the schools of party to be found in our country, be opposed to the utter and complete extinguishment of slavery? There is no party whose creed is not fundamentally thoroughly hostile to this most deservedly hated institution, and none which could not, consistently with all its theories of good government, hail with joy its final obliteration, unless it be within the now contracted limits of the so-called confederate States. Can it be that gentlemen are unwilling even to allow the people of all the States to pass upon this proposition? For that will be the whole extent of our action, or merely to give the people an opportunity to show whether two thirds of all the States will decide that there are reasons of sufficient gravity to induce them to adopt the amendment.

This question will come up. It is only a question of time. When it does come before the people will gentlemen then be prepared to take the stump against it? If not, the harmony of the record had better now be provided for.

I remember a party, existing in the North as well as the South, who were but recently not afraid to tamper with the Constitution, but were clamorous for an opportunity by which further guarantees were to be secured to slavery, and can such a party now logically refuse to concede the same opportunity by which further guarantees to liberty shall be secured and by which the question of slavery may be forever put at rest? I ask that the people shall have the right to reach this question once and, as I hope, forever. Let us take the chances even with all the votes of the former slave States included. Do gentlemen of the free North intend to do battle for slavery after the slaveholders themselves have abandoned or are ready to abandon it? I do not believe that is the attitude they desire to assume here or on the page of that remarkable history we are now making, wherein it should be the ambition of all, if they cannot obtain honorable notice, at least to escape the scorn of posterity by a voluntary disappearance from the public gaze.

But it is said that this question of slavery is one of the reserved rights of the States which we must not touch. It may be a proved traitor, pirate, and murderer, but is still too sacred to be touched by military or even civil authority! I concede that there are many rights reserved to the States, yet if it were the conviction of two thirds of the States that any one of these rights would be more safely or more wisely exercised by the General Government, who shall deny their power to surrender any such right to the control of the United States? But slavery is a wrong; so recognized by the whole civilized world; and cannot claim immunity as a right. There is now practically but one amendment to the Constitution which we are not at liberty to make, and that relates to a wholly different subject, namely, "No State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Anything else than this is as much an open question as it would be if we were now at work framing a Constitution for the first time for a free people.

In all the agitations which the question of slavery has from time to time forced upon the country, the lustiest upholders of the domestic institutions of the South, while denouncing what they styled unconstitutional interference, have claimed for themselves the extreme doctrines of democracy, according to the philosophy of Jefferson; and also that, if living in slave States, they would be abolitionists; and if they could constitutionally reach the question they would not fail to maintain the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence. Now, the time has come when the sincerity of these declarations will be tested. Now, the time has come when we shall see how many wear a name having no valid title to it. Here is a chance to show whether we are for or against slavery in the abstract. I feel sure some at least will stand the fire and come out like refined gold. There are some who will set aside party and vote according to the dictates of the manhood with which God endowed them. These will not keenly calculate whether a little more sacrifice is necessary in order to endear them to some party now in rebellion by which the ascendancy of their own political associates may be hereafter secured. They may believe that for such an object no party in the North is in a condition to make further expenditures for such an object. That course has proved a very exhausting process, and the most extravagant demand ever made in this direction, being a vote against this amendment, if complied with will prove bootless, and may much better be declined. It is by no means certain that the dominant party of the South, when the repentant rebels are again brought under the old flag, will be of the malignant States right or secession stripe, and in that case the conciliation proffered here in behalf of slavery would prove stale and unprofitable. The true Union men and the poor whites of the South will hereafter prove a power that will be heard from.

A rebellion that fails leaves no place for its leaders. These, if not banished by Government, are driven into obscurity by the people they have unworthily misguided.

However ready gentlemen may be to welcome back such chiefs as Davis, Slidell, and Mason, they will never have the opportunity, for these and all such as these will be kept in strait-jackets at home, or they will more likely skulk away to such congenial courts as that of Maximilian I or Pedro II.

If it had not been for the disclosure of the diabolical purpose of slavery to destroy our Government, the people of the United States would doubtless have tolerated the institution wherever States chose to continue and shield it until the density of population should have made the soil too valuable to support anything but freemen.

But since this disclosure we should be cowards, after having witnessed its power for evil, after the countless treasure and priceless blood we have expended in the struggle, for our own preservation if we were to surrender our grip upon the throat of the monster and thus permit him to recover strength to repeat the atrocities of the last four years upon those who will succeed us. We owe it to ourselves and the world to close up this quarrel so that it can never be reopened.

If it can be closed by a constitutional provision, what fairer mode can be devised? Certainly rebel slaveholders who have waged a war of unexampled inhumanity and ferocity to break the Constitution cannot complain that we should by peaceful and proper means attempt to mend it.

It is sometimes asked whether the Constitution as it was could have been adopted if it had been foreseen at the time an amendment like this would ever be proposed; and in reply it might be asked, if the growth and the past and present history of slavery could have been foreseen, whether in that case the Constitution as it was could have been adopted? This proves nothing, save that the world moves and is not precisely in the condition now it was then. Then slavery was expected speedily to die out, and Madison, and many other southern men in Congress, sought to cripple it by taxing the introduction of slaves, which, under the Constitution, could not be prohibited until 1808. When 1808 arrived the law was already on the statute-book to interdict the further introduction of slaves at the first possible moment. We all know Madison, in drafting the Constitution, studiously avoided any words that would furnish to future generations evidence that slavery had ever existed in the young Republic. He at least honestly looked forward to the time when it would all disappear, leaving no blot behind. Nobody foresaw how it would disappear, and perhaps no one expected in the hour of its most colossal growth, and protected by fresh and impregnable securities, that it would commit suicide. But that is its fate. It leaped into the Red Sea, and, like Pharaoh and his host, it will be drowned—a fate that would make the morning stars of our Constitution sing for joy; and shall any of us mourn and refuse to be comforted?

To what end should slavery be continued? Manifestly only that one half of the slave States may breed and sell their slave stock to the other half. In one half of the slave States that was the only way in which slavery could be made productive. I may be mistaken, but I believe this to have been so; and it has been far from creditable to us as a nation. I do not wish to deprive any State of legitimate prosperity, and there is not one slave State which, ten years after slavery shall have been abolished, will not have more taxable wealth than they ever dreamed of before.

It is urged with some vehemence, if not eloquence, by the gentlemen from New York [Mr. Brooks] and from Ohio [Mr. Cox] that we should first send commissioners South offering terms of peace on the basis of the Constitution as it was, and then, if that shall be refused, as they know very well it would be, they do not exactly promise a homogeneity in the North, but they intimate that the rebels would be very naughty to reject such a proposal, and they might venture to tell them that their project of independence would fail. They do not say that even then they would continue Grant, Sherman, and Thomas in the field, or vote for this amendment. In all seriousness, did not the rebels break with us when they had the Constitution as it was? How, then, could they come back and accept now what they girded up their loins to fight against? This would sadly militate against the idea of the gentleman from New York, that eight million people could not be conquered. But the signs of the times show that this proud people have been humbled and more than half conquered. They would now give up slavery to save their own necks from the common doom of rebels. General Sheridan has quieted the rebel army of the Shenandoah; General Thomas has annihilated the army of the Tennessees; General Grant bides his time, abundantly sure of his prey; and General Sherman marches where he pleases through the empire State of the South, and the people of Savannah, twenty thousand strong, not more wise or more ready than the people of scores of other southern cities, under the call of their mayor, have resolved that the war, so far as they are concerned, is at an end. They urge the State to follow its example.

Let me record the voice of the citizens' meeting in Savannah:

"Whereas by the fortunes of war and the surrender of the city by the civil authorities, Savannah passes once more under the authority of the United States; and whereas we believe that the interests of the city will be best subserved and promoted by a full and free expression of our views in relation to our present condition: We therefore, the people of Savannah, in full meeting assembled, do hereby—

"Resolved, 1, That we accept the position, and in the language of the President of the United States, seek to have 'peace by laying down our arms and submitting to the national authority under the Constitution,' leaving all questions which remain to be adjusted by the peaceful means of legislation, conference, and votes."

"Resolved, 2, That, laying aside all differences and burying bygones in the grave of the past, we will use our best endeavors once more to bring back the prosperity and commerce we once enjoyed."

"Resolved, 3, That we do not put ourselves in the position of a conquered city asking terms of a conqueror, but we claim the immunities and privileges contained in the proclamation and message of the President of the United States, and in all the legislation of Congress in reference to a people as we are; and while we owe to our part a strict obedience to the laws of the United States, we ask the protection over our persons, lives, and property recognized by those laws."

"Resolved, 4, That we respectfully request his Excellency the Governor to call a convention of the people of Georgia, by any constitutional means in his power, to give them an opportunity of voting upon the question whether they wish the war between the two sections of the country to continue."

"Resolved, 5, That Major General Sherman having placed as military commander of this post, Brigadier General Geary, who has, by his urbanity as a gentleman and his uniform kindness to our citizens, done all in his power to protect them and their property from insult and injury, it is the unanimous desire of all present that he be allowed to remain in his present position, and that for the reasons above stated the thanks of the citizens are hereby tendered to him and the officers under his command."

"Resolved, 6, That an official copy of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, the Governor of Georgia, General Sherman, and to each, the mayors of Augusta, Columbus, Macon, and Atlanta."

There is no halting about this. They are willing to come back now and upon the terms proclaimed by the President. The leading rebels will have a different and more selfish policy, but one far less acceptable to the people.

The organs of Jeff. Davis at Richmond announce that the time has come for them to save themselves by giving up slavery. They propose to put the negro into the last ditch rather than go there themselves. They will throw this Jonah overboard if France and England will only guaranty to them a separation from us. If the people of the South do not at present love us, they have at least learned to respect us. There is little danger to be apprehended by us from foreign rivals who having risked their hate will not risk their love.

To show that the rebels themselves are at last conscious of being on the road to ruin, I give an extract from a late copy of the Richmond Sentinel, as follows:

"We think that our late reverses have done much toward preparing the minds of our people for the most extreme sacrifices if they shall be adjudged necessary to the success of our cause. And in truth they are not sacrifices at all when compared with our situation. If subjugated, it is a question simply whether we shall give for our own uses or whether the Yankees shall take for theirs. Subjugation means emancipation and confiscation."

"All our servants and all our property yielded up to assist in the defense of our country would mean no more, but it would be far more glorious to devote our means to our success than to lose them as spoils to the enemy. Our situation, too, stripped of our property but master of the government, would be infinitely better than it despoiled by the enemy and wearing his bonds."

That this is not the sentiment of a single editor only, I will give a portion of the comments of the Richmond Enquirer upon the article, a part of which I have just read, showing that even in the rebel capital they are almost persuaded to be Christians, but not quite. The Enquirer says:

"If we have given to our contemporary a broader interpretation than the writer designed, we do not believe we have misrepresented the determination of our people. The consequences of emancipation would fall upon the unfortunate negro, and God would hold responsible those who had forced upon us the act. It is one of necessity, not choice; an act taken against our judgments and our convictions, but to save us from the horrors of a prolonged war and the disgrace, ruin, and destruction involved in the success of our enemy.

"If France and England will enter into a treaty with these confederate States, recognizing our nationality and guarantying our independence upon the abolition of slavery in all these States, rather than continue the war we should be prepared to urge the measure upon our readers. We believe such a proposition would be favorably received and acted upon by those nations, and it ought to be made to them."

Will it be any greater hardship to ask them to give up slavery and remain with us, possessed and possessing all the rights which we claim for ourselves? This is all we propose to do. They do not now even ask any other nation to assume a protectorate over them until they have rid themselves of the loathsome institution, and are we so accustomed to its vile contact that we are willing to exhibit less self-respect, less fear of being crooked, than is claimed by and accorded to the dynastic Governments of the Old World?

Gentlemen need not fear that there will not be subjects enough for party differences if the subject of slavery shall be forever extirpated. They may, however, make up their minds that the proslavery party of the world is past all resurrection. Its leaders have made it ignominious, and it is in a minority that will diminish without pity at every successive rally. When the heat of the tropics is no longer able to warm it into life the North will nurse it in vain.

What a spectacle do we present! Here the Congress of the United States are debating whether slavery shall have a longer lease of life or not, when it has only just been barely frustrated in the attempt to take the life of Congress itself, and would do it now if its power equaled its will. Can it be that the last Swiss Guard in the defense of slavery shall prove to be from the free States in Congress assembled? Here men from free States, always freemen and theoretically abhorring slavery, see the slaveholders of West Virginia, Missouri, and Maryland, (to say nothing of Kentucky, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee,) abolishing slavery, and yet hesitate to allow the question to be placed before the people lest they should be stigmatized as abolitionists! If a vote in favor of the amendment to the Constitution, by which slavery may be forever abolished, secures to any man that stigma, it can have no terrors for those who have been Republicans, for such a vote is expected of them as an ordinary duty, and, if feared by any one who has not been a Republican, let him find courage to adopt the badge of distinction, and he may, to the discomfiture of his revilers, use and wear it as a most trusty weapon to cleave his way through the world to honor and troops of friends.

MR. ODELL. Mr. Speaker, the interest I feel in the important measure now under consideration is my apology for occupying the attention of the House at this time. My belief is that no question of equal importance has ever occupied the attention of the country. I am certain that during the period I have been honored with a seat upon this floor no question has arisen in which my constituents have so deep an interest. The eyes of the world are now turned in anxiety to see the result. If the proposed amendment to the Constitution as it passed the Senate shall receive the vote of two thirds of the members of this body, as required by the fifth article of the Constitution, and shall then be ratified by the people, its immediate effect will be to liberate from bondage three million seven hundred and forty-eight thousand three hundred and ninety-three human beings, as shown by the census of 1860, securing to them the blessings of freedom. Its influence will not only reach the negro, but will affect for good the future destiny of the white race North and South. The material interest of three hundred and forty-five thousand five hundred and thirty-four slaveholders will be of course affected, and it is a statistical fact that of this number two hundred and seventy-five thousand six hundred and eighty-one persons own less than ten slaves, and of this latter number seventy-six thousand six hundred and seventy own a single slave, showing that the interest is not of such extent as many at the North have heretofore been led to suppose. I cannot but conclude, from the best light I can obtain, that the operation of this measure will be most beneficial to the non-slaveholding white population of the southern States. When these poorer laboring classes shall no longer have to contend with and struggle against and be degraded by slave labor, then, and not until then, will they come into the enjoyment of blessings such as are now fully enjoyed by the honest, toiling, working men of the North.

When labor shall be free at the South, then will it command and have the respect which is its just due. Then will millions of the white men of the North participate and share in the blessings thus secured. The masses of our native and foreign-born laborers, now toiling in the severer climate of the North, will be invited to enter upon these newly opened fields for their industry and occupation. The now hidden resources of the States south will be developed by the brain and muscle of the northern laborer.

The existence in our country of antagonistic systems of labor has brought upon the nation the terrible calamity of a wasting civil war, with all its desolations. It has cost the country the lives of hundreds of thousands of its best and bravest sons, and has wasted her material resources.

The day has come when this conflict of labor is to end and the question is forced upon us by the South. They alone are responsible for it. The question of the world now is, shall the great free North, with its higher and more widely extended civilization, yield to the South and its evils growing out of its system of labor? The day is past and forever gone when more than twenty million northern born freemen, represented upon this floor now, will be controlled by the men of the South with not one third their numerical strength.

As certain as the North and South are now engaged in a struggle for military supremacy, so certain is it that slavery must fall and die.

The destruction of slavery is the legitimate fruit of the rebellion. It was predicted by leading minds both North and South before the war began.

Its death-blow was inflicted by the South when it opened its rebel batteries upon Fort Sumter. When the national flag was assailed, then began the overthrow of slavery as a natural consequence.

That slavery is dead is an admitted truth. So said my friend and colleague at the last session of Congress. Others upon both sides of this Chamber have admitted the same fact; and the press of the land has been reiterating the same statement since the rebellion began.

It is an accepted truth, both North and South, that the peculiar institution is gone, with or without restoration.

Now, I am in favor of giving it a constitutional burial; not by the irregularity of a proclamation by the President, of doubtful constitutionality even in his own mind, as he has frequently admitted, and which was conceded by the late Baltimore convention that renominated Mr. Lincoln, when they proposed this amendment to the Constitution as one of the planks of their platform, which was accepted by him in his letter of acceptance of their nomination. He and they both have thus expressed doubts as to the proclamation. And hence we have this more legal way of disposing of the evil before us.

Again, it cannot be put out of the way by the uncertain and irregular Army orders of our generals in the field in command of our armies. They all deal with slavery in harmony with their own peculiar views.

The Constitution gives to the two Houses of Congress the only legal and certain authority, the only constitutional method of ending and putting away forever an institution that has only brought us trouble and discord at home and reproach and dishonor abroad.

Let the evil now be removed in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. Then it will be done effectually, legally, and in a manner to command the respect of the nation, of the men that are directly interested, and also of the civilization of the world.

I am aware that able men upon this floor have objected to this action, they claiming that the provisions of the fifth article of the Constitution does not admit of this construction. In my mind I find no difficulty. The power referred to I am satisfied is ample.

Story on the Constitution, volume three, page 688, says:

"A Government which, in its own organization, provides no means of change, but assumes to be fixed and unalterable, must, after a while, become wholly unsuited to the circumstances of the nation; and it will either degenerate into a despotism or, by the pressure of its inequalities, bring on a revolution. It is wise, therefore, in every Government, and especially in a republic, to provide means for altering and improving the fabric of government as time and experience, or the new phases of human affairs may render proper, to promote the happiness and safety of the people. The great principle to be sought is to make the changes practicable, but not too easy; to secure due deliberation and caution; and to follow experience rather than to open a way for experiments suggested by mere speculation or theory."

If I were in doubt upon the subject I have only to refer back a short period in our national history and there see the record of my own party upon this question of amendment, and upon the subject of slavery, and in the light of this record and history my way is plain.

Much has been said and written in regard to the compromise measures introduced by the distinguished, patriotic, and lamented Mr. Crittenden in the Senate. We have been wont to charge upon the Opposition the responsibility of the failure of these resolutions; we have affirmed if the Republican members of the Senate had accepted them we would not have been involved in this unhappy struggle. I am not quite sure of that. I incline to think that at that time treason was deep down in the hearts of the southern leaders. But it might have been even so. I refer to it only to show that at that time it was not thought by the men of my party that the Constitution could not and ought not to be amended upon the subject of slavery. Reference to the action of the Senate will show that every Democrat North and South voted for these resolutions, which provided for several amendments relating to this vexed question of slave labor.

Again, the House will remember the famous Corwin resolution, which in its provisions was to amend the Constitution, fastening slavery upon the country for all coming time. That passed by the required vote in both Houses, after weeks of debate, the Democratic members all voting for it. That amendment was as follows:

"No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."

This clearly recognizes the right to amend; if not, why was such action recommended, and why did Democrats vote for it?

If gentlemen will refer to the debates of the Thirty-Sixth Congress they will find there recorded very many resolutions offered by Democrats, and voted for by them, proposing to amend the Constitution, and all referring to slavery.

With this party record my conclusion is, that if it was constitutionally right for the men of the true faith in that day to thus vote for an amended Constitution upon this subject, it is highly proper for me to do so now in the light of the experience of the past four years. If the Constitution could be amended legally continuing slavery, it surely may be for its destruction. The action of the South in their rebellion has not commanded them to me for any special acts of grace or forbearance. Their treason to their country is only equaled by their treachery to the Democratic party. Personally I have feelings upon this subject toward the men of the South for their treason as a Democrat that no men of the Opposition have a right to indulge in.

The Democratic party had been their faithful defenders. We were and had been their friends through evil and good report. We had stood by them in all their interests. More than this, we have yielded our own convictions and prejudices to theirs. As we met them from time to time in our national conventions it was only to submit to new demands made upon us to favor, strengthen, and extend their system of slave labor. To secure peace and harmony these demands were acceded to. The steadily increasing pecuniary interest of the slaveholders gave them power, and led them, in the love of gain, to depart from the teachings and principles of the fathers upon this subject. With the modern slaveholder it was no longer an evil to be endured for a while, but a blessing to be perpetuated through all future time.

From our present stand-point the error of thus having yielded to the slave power of the South is clearly seen by the nation and more keenly felt by the Democratic party. I need not say to the intelligent men who surround me that if the party North had resisted this encroachment upon the religious belief and northern sentiment forced upon us by the South the war now waging would never have been inaugurated. Better far for our country and the race had we exerted our power and manhood at an earlier period in our history.

By many it is believed that a time of war is not opportune for amending the Constitution under which we have had such unparalleled prosperity. Upon this point I have a clear, unerring guide in my conscience, which tells me in a clear and distinct voice that in war or peace, in sunshine or storm, in prosperity or adversity, it is best for individuals and nations to do right. My inquiry upon this point is simply in that direction. I have ever believed slavery wrong. The North have always believed it. None can scarce be now found who will claim that slavery is now, or has ever been, other than an evil. Hence, with these convictions, if I live until the day when the vote upon this measure shall be taken my name will be recorded in the affirmative.

The past history of our country clearly illustrates the effect of the system of slave labor. We have but to contrast the growth and advancement of the States South with the North, to mark the progress of each section, as shown by the census, in religion, education, agriculture, mechanical arts, and especially in material wealth. The results given are most conclusive.

The South by rebellion has absolved the Democratic party at the North from all obligation to stand up longer for the defense of its "cornerstone." They are now using the very system which this amendment proposes to abolish for the overthrow of our Government founded on the broad principles of right, justice, and humanity.

In their prosecution of the war against us, the master is compelled by the laws of their congress to place his slaves at the disposal of the military authorities for our destruction. The time is at hand when in far greater numbers this class will be used against us as indicated by the discussions now going on at the South.

We have information that is credible and must be believed, that the authorities at Richmond are now ready to liberate their slaves, and are willing to abolish an institution for which they began this war that they may the more certainly insure our overthrow and destruction by securing foreign aid and recognition.

Shall we consent to present the strange spectacle to the world that we of the North have no interest in the question of freeing the slaves when the men most interested are willing to do it?

With these facts before me I have no question as to my duty. We had better far at this time break down the force and physical power of an institution that is being used for our destruction by our enemies.

Again, why should northern men, representing upon this floor northern constituencies, hesitate to permit such constituencies to vote for the freedom of slaves, when southern men, representing slaveholders, ask us to rid them of this evil?

Another objection urged against the passage of this initial measure is that the slave States are not represented upon this floor. It is no fault of mine that their seats are vacant. The North has no responsibility in that matter. Their seats are vacant because they were occupied by men faithless alike to their country and their party; who represented States which chose rather to rebel against their Government than to enjoy the rights and blessings it guaranteed to them. The country and the party have a just cause of complaint against the treason and the traitors that have vacated these seats. Had the representatives of the South stood firm in their allegiance to the Government and submitted to its laws and been governed by its wise provisions, we of the North would have been spared far greater evils than will ensue to the South as a consequence of the proposed amendment if it should be constitutionally adopted. I fully believe that the debts due from the South to the North alone, which by the legislation of the southern States it has been made a penal offense to pay, are more than equal to the value of all the slaves held in southern territory. In addition, let the blighted hearts, desolated homes, and the debt-burdened people of the North vindicate this statement.

Mr. Speaker, the effect of this action by this body is only in its operation to submit to the people, to your constituents and to mine, sir, the proposition of amendment of the Constitution. It remains for them to decide it by their suffrage. We shall then all have with them an opportunity of expressing our opinions upon the question at the ballot-box. I know of no good reason why I, as a Democrat, believing in the right of the people to rule, should arrogate to myself, in my position as a Representative, the exclusive right of a voice upon this subject. They have, under our Constitution, an equal right with myself; and I will not deprive them by my action of the privilege of exercising it.

Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the fact that my position and intended action upon this all-important question will not be in accord with my friends upon this side of the Chamber. I yield to none of them in my attachment to the party with which I have ever acted. I cherish as fondly as any the memories of the great and good men that have been its standard-bearers, and many of whom have passed away; and I have as much confidence in its future, as a power for good in the government of this great nation, as any man in the country. Yet I believe this thing of slavery has lifted its hydra head above the Government of my country. It has been for years a dead weight upon our party. And the time, in my humble judgment, has now come when as a party we ought to unloose ourselves from this dead body. We ought no longer to consent to be dragged down by its influence. We ought to accept the facts of history as they are transpiring around us, and march on with the world in its progress of human events.

The times now favor, and the way is open for the great Democratic party to turn its back upon the dark-past and its eyes upon the bright future.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting to Congress a copy of two treaties between the United States and Belgium for the extinguishment of the Scheldt dues, &c., concluded on the 20th of May, 1863, and the 20th of June, 1863, respectively, the ratification of which was exchanged at Brussels on the 24th of June last, and recommending an appropriation to carry into effect the provisions thereof, relative to the payment of the proportion of the United States toward the capitalization of said dues.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, with an accompanying report of the Adjutant General, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of December 7, 1864, requesting him to communicate to the House a report made by Colonel Thomas M. Key, of an interview between him and General Howell Cobb, on the 14th of June, 1862, on the bank of the Chickahominy, on the subject of the exchange of prisoners of war.

The communication and accompanying documents were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the report of the expenditure of the contingent fund in the Treasury Department, for the year ending June 30, 1864; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866; and asked that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Tuesday, the 17th of January.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire that the right shall be reserved to raise points of order on the bill when it shall be taken up for consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Tuesday, the 17th of January, after the morning hour.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS also, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means the Senate amendment to an act (H. R. No. 597) making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1866; and asked that it be considered at this time.

There being no objection, the amendment was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the present fiscal year:

For the payment of pensions under the acts of March 18, 1818, May 15, 1828, June 7, 1832, the third section of the act of July 4, 1830, July 7, 1838, June 17, 1844, March 3, 1843, February 2, and July 29, 1848, and the second section of the act of February 3, 1853, $65,000.

For the payment of pensions under the first section of the act of July 4, 1836, act of July 20, 1848, the first section of the act of February 3, 1853, June 3, 1858, and July 14, 1862, $3,500,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI MILITIA.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to place the soldiers of the Missouri State militia on the same footing with other volunteer soldiers in the United States service, with reference to bounties and back pay; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TAX ON IMPORTED SPIRITS.

Mr. WARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refund the taxes collected on spirits imported prior to March 7, 1864, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY—AGAIN.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss at this time and place the causes which have inaugurated the terrible rebellion which has already cost the Republic such a frightful waste of life and treasure. It is enough for me to know that a death-blow has been aimed at the heart of the American Union to feel indignant at the outrage and solicitous to avert it. It is enough for me to know that a sacrilegious attempt has been made to break up the wisest form of government that human wisdom ever devised, to feel it my duty to join in the effort to chastise the perpetrators of so great a crime. I have not approved of all that has been done under the sanction of the war power. I have deemed it proper to protest, in the name of the loyal and law-abiding constituency I have the honor to represent on this floor, against certain acts of the Executive and Congress, which, in my opinion, have been the means of prolonging this sanguinary war, but I am settled in the conviction that secession is treason, and that as such it must be put down at all hazards and at any cost. If secession succeeds, republican liberties are lost forever, and the Government, failing to vindicate its power, would forfeit the consideration and respect of every civilized nation on earth. If the heresy of secession were to be recognized as a canon of our political faith there would be an end to our government. Let Louisiana secede unhindered, and then, when that act has been accomplished, what is to prevent her from handing that State over to England or any other Power, commanding as she does the mouth of the great Mississippi? This she most assuredly has a right to do if she has a right to secede, thus closing up the "father of waters" and excluding all the States on its borders from a market. The same rule would apply to any other seceded State. Hence the duty of every American patriot, whatever his station or condition, to uphold the Government in its efforts to compel the seceded States to respect the Constitution and the laws of the country. Upon this conviction of duty I have ever acted since the first insult to our flag was offered. The same abiding sense of the responsibility which rests upon me as a Representative of the people in Congress will, I trust, carry me unflinchingly through whatever phase may yet remain undeveloped in the fearful drama which has been so long in process of action. If the conduct of the war had not been marked by some of the most startling usurpations of power that ever made a free people tremble for their liberties, my voice should never have been raised except in the way of encouragement and of sympathy.

Much wonder has frequently been expressed, Mr. Speaker, that in this fearful crisis through which our bleeding country is now passing, in the awful presence of the grand and sublime uprising of the people of this nation, no master spirit has yet risen in the midst of our assemblage capable to stay the uplifted hand and gifted with that peculiar sagacity which employs the acquired light of yesterday in the selection of a path for to-morrow. Whatever may be the cause, it cannot be denied that the present crisis has most signally failed in the production of those towering intellects whose impress never fails to mark itself deeply upon the mold of their times, and which during all our former trials as a nation have been wont to direct the destinies of the Republic triumphantly through the fiery paths of sedition and conspiracy. Hence the blunders and mismanagements which have characterized the conduct of this war. The spirit which was wont to kindle the voices of former statesmen as if with a coal from the altar is no longer manifest in the places of power. Under these circumstances, and in view of the obstacles which we may yet have to contend with before the blessings of peace can be restored to our distracted country, it behooves every man in the position I have the honor to occupy, however humble his pretensions or capacity, fearlessly to present his views on the great questions now at issue, in order that out of the very multitude of counsels some good and practical result may be attained.

I have observed that the more entirely the objects which stand in the way of the execution of any purpose are ignored the more easy it becomes to lay down plans for the perfect management of the affairs of the country, military and financial. Overlook the rivers and the mountains, the distance and the atmospheric phenomena, the reluctance upon one side and the resistance upon the other, and to construct the most infallible programme for the suppression of the rebellion is one of the easiest of undertakings. To overlook the laws of trade, the limits of the popular power, and the propensity of mankind to prefer their own to any other interest, and to prescribe a financial policy which shall carry the country safely through the war and its consequences, is a work not above the powers of the most ordinary capacity. Individuals entirely able at a single effort or less to solve all the problems of our condition are easily to be found. The country is rather redundant of them than otherwise. They cross us on all sides, in the newspapers and on the street corners. But that which alike marks all their solutions is the omission of more or less and sometimes of all the real elements of the calculation. "On to Richmond" is easily said. "Order a levy en masse and advance all along the line" is a suggestion so magnificent as to give an air of pusillanimity to the inquiry whether its execution is practicable. Issue legal-tender notes ad libitum, tax without measure, and borrow without limit, are pieces of advice which are all the more acceptable, perhaps, because they who propose them refrain from disclosing that there are points beyond which neither of these sources of revenue can be made available. For my own part, sir, I shall not take upon myself the invidious task of attempting to solve the perplexing problem of the war, nor yet of suggesting any panaceas for the cure of existing evils. I simply desire to offer a few remarks which are forced upon me by the constantly recurring deviations from the avowed object for which this devastating war was originally and authoritatively declared to be waged. I feel that I am somewhat entitled to the indulgence of the House when I venture to raise my voice as a warning to those in power that the mass of the people no longer recognize them as their representatives in a glorious struggle; that they no longer consider the war as a war for the salvation of the country, but as having degenerated to a strife about a collateral issue utterly foreign to the cause which they entered so heartily to sustain.

Sir, when the rebellion first broke out I had the honor of being a member-elect of this body, and from the day that I took my seat on this floor I have never sought to embarrass the Government in its efforts to bring back the seceded States under the glorious flag of that Union which had protected them all so long and so well.

In the extra session of 1861 Congress declared by a solemn act "that the war was not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired." Had the noble and patriotic sentiments enunciated in that resolution been made the rule of action by both branches of the Government the war would, I believe, before this time have been terminated, for whatever may be said of the proud and indomitable spirit with which the people of the South have carried on the war, and of their attitude of haughty defiance, I am fully convinced that if the olive-branch had been tendered in that spirit of magnanimity which becomes a dignified Government after it has vindicated its power, the repentant rebels, at least the greatest portion of them, seeing the folly of their ways, would long ere this have returned to their allegiance.

This Government did not begin the war. The seceded States, at the time the rebellion was inaugurated, had nothing to complain of; no overt act had been committed by the Government, none of their prerogatives had been interfered with, none of their citizens had been burdened by taxation, all their rights and institutions were under the protection of the United States. They have gone out from among us under the false pretense that they foresaw in the future that they should lose their just political power and influence in the Union, and acting upon this self-imposed delusion they have drawn the sword wantonly and willfully upon the Government and loyal people of the United States.

What I mean by the term olive-branch, sir, is the exhibition of a generous and conciliatory spirit, which I regret to say has not hitherto characterized our invitations to the people of the seceded States to come back and be restored to the inestimable privileges of American citizens. All our legislation on the subject, whether we look to the confiscation bill, or to those other severe enactments which have called forth so much bitter acrimony on this floor, have been marked by a spirit of vindictiveness and oppression utterly unworthy of a great and a Christian nation. Even the proclamation of amnesty of President Lincoln fails to hold out any hope of satisfactory results, because its provisions are not in accordance with the fundamental principle of self-government, that the majority must rule.

There is in this plan for restoration so triumphantly heralded by the friends of the Administration an attempt at usurpation so offensive to the people that no mind regulated by the usual dictates of sanity and guided by the wisdom of the Constitution could ever have elaborated. The proposition made by the sole authority of the President to constitute one tenth of the citizens of a State the whole State, is so preposterous that it can scarcely be regarded as serious. Were such a proposition to be acted upon, the Government would find itself placed even in a more awkward position than it occupies now, for it would have to maintain a standing army in each of the States thus surreptitiously brought into the Union, in order to protect the dominant minority from violent acts, on the part of that overwhelming majority, which by this anomaly in legislation would be totally disfranchised.

Sir, I am as strongly opposed as any of my colleagues on the other side of the House to the readmission into the Union, with the right of slave property, of any State where slavery has been swept away by the onward march of our armies. Whatever may be the object of the war, the practical result is the same, and that is the overthrow of slavery in all those portions of slaveholding territory which our armies subjugate; in these the relation of master and slave ceases to exist. The masters retreat as our forces advance, and carry with them a portion of their slaves, but the greater part remain behind and take refuge within our lines; and the question is, what shall become of them, and what are our duties in regard to them? The American people have behaved admirably since this war broke out. They have shown an energy and elasticity of spirit, a power of organization and combination, a readiness to make sacrifices, a patriotic devotion, worthy of the highest praise. Let us not forget the claims of those unhappy freedmen whom we have deprived of their masters, their natural guardians and protectors.

The war is no longer waged for the purpose of restoring the union of all the sovereign States that are and ever were in our great national communion, with all the purity and strength of our precious Constitution undimmed and untarnished, but for the newly-avowed object of subjugation, extermination, and emancipation, until every Southron shall be reduced to the most crouching and abject submission, not to the Constitution, but personally to those who hold the sword and the purse of the country. Sir, I am not prepared to join in any such crusade. I occupy the same platform to-day that I did on the breaking out of the rebellion. I am in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, by all constitutional means, for the purpose of destroying the military power of the rebellion; but I am not willing to prolong this war a moment longer than is necessary to effect its legitimate object. The consequences of a mistaken policy are too serious to suffer me to be governed by the spirit of faction on the one hand or influenced by subservience to power on the other. We have now arrived at that stage in the progress of the war when we should consider the question of offering to the people of the rebel States such conciliatory terms as are constitutional, just, and practicable, and most likely to lead to the reestablishment of the national authority over the whole country. The terms and conditions offered to the insurgents in the President's proclamation of amnesty are only calculated to inflame their hatred of the North and impel them to renewed resistance. They are flagrantly at variance with the declarations voluntarily made to the people of the loyal States and published to the world. I desire to see such terms offered as a proud and already chastened people can accept without positive degradation to themselves—terms which shall recognize the existence of the States with constitutions and forms of administrations—terms, in short, calculated to divide our enemies and draw the hearts of the repentant people of the decaying confederacy toward our Government. When these honorable terms are rejected, then I shall be willing to leave events to the harsh and cruel necessities of the justice which is vindicated by the sword.

But, sir, although the beneficent spirit which pervaded Mr. Crittenden's resolution, to which I have referred, was not allowed to exercise its healthy influence over the deliberations of this body, its provisions were tacitly adopted as a governing principle in the conduct of the war; so much so, that when Generals Fremont, Hunter, and Phelps, issued their proclamations of emancipation, the President revoked them all, declaring again and again that he had no right under the Constitution to emancipate the slaves. Those who spoke in behalf of the Executive, and in elucidation of his views, stated everywhere—in the public streets, in conventions, and in the Legislatures, that the President was determined that the seceded States on reëntering the Union should be protected in all their rights. Governor Stanley, who traveled five thousand miles, it is supposed at the express request of the President, that he might try to persuade the people of North Carolina out of the rebellion, stated in his speech of June 17, 1862, delivered at Washington, North Carolina, that Mr. Lincoln was no abolitionist, that he was the best friend the South had, and that all the Administration wanted was peace. THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 12.

ernor Stanley spoke according to instructions, as many others had done before him in every section of the country, which had the effect of producing a strong feeling of reaction throughout the border States, and of adding thousands upon thousands to recruiting lists.

These assurances, Mr. Speaker, concerning the alleged objects of the war were of so broad and distinct a character that no man of well regulated mind could avoid confiding in them. For my own part, I relied as implicitly upon these solemn pledges as the magistrates of ancient Rome did on the sibylline books when danger pressed the eternal city. I should frankly have despised myself had I suffered a doubt to rise in my own mind as to the integrity of purpose which governed the action of the President. All that I paused to consider was, that when he took his oath of office he swore to maintain the Union and enforce the laws; that had he attempted to trifle with the sacred rights of the people, and allow a Government to be broken up which he had sworn to preserve, he would have acted contrary to the requirements of the Constitution, and deserved to be impeached upon these solemn convictions. I rallied all my feeble strength to the support of the Government, the Constitution, and the Union, looking upon secession as eternal war, and recognizing this great principle: that we are one people, that one we will remain, and one we will die.

I am well aware, sir, that my course in sustaining the war policy of the President has subjected me to considerable animadversion, and that my motives of action have frequently, and sometimes wickedly, been misconstrued by those who either could not understand the emergencies of the occasion or who preferred seeing this great Republic split up into fragments rather than yield one iota of their prejudices. But, sir, there is one tribunal to which I appeal with feelings of pride and confidence from the judgment of disunionists: it is the tribunal of my conscience. The verdict which I find recorded there will sustain me under all calumnies and vituperations. When the day shall come for me to render an account of my stewardship to my constituents, I shall be able to show them that in denouncing treason and in sustaining the Government in its efforts to put down rebels in arms I have been true to myself, to my country, and to the sternest requirements of the Democratic creed. How much the Democratic party, acting as a party, through its organization will do to bring back peace to the country, it is impossible to predict. It will depend upon the steadiness with which it adheres to what are admitted to be Democratic principles. To expect to return to sound practices in the Government through the medium of a party which, from any suggestions of expediency, however plausible, departs from its principles, is, of all expectations, the most irrational. Peace will return; the war fury is a passion which exhausts itself. But however desirable peace may be, we ought to be united in the determination that when it comes it should bring with it the union of the States under the Federal Constitution. Those who fail to recognize this national exigency are not imbued with the true spirit of Democracy; they have read the signs of the times to very little purpose. The Democratic party is essentially a party of progress, and those who aspire to be its leaders ought at least to have common sense enough to know that we are in the midst of a great revolution and that revolution is progress.

The only issue before the people at this time is the issue of Union or disintegration. I admit that the country needs peace, and I am anxious to secure it; but I do not want to get it by indirection. In my judgment, the only feasible plan of restoration is a vigorous prosecution of the war, or the proffer of conciliatory terms to those who are willing to renew their allegiance to the Federal Government. These are the only paths which lead to peace, and I want the people to understand the stern reality of the fact. It is a great mistake, sir, to suppose that political truth and naked fact are meat too strong for their digestion, and that the reality must be largely diluted with romance in order to render it palatable to them. I sincerely believe that the best way to deal with the people, in order to secure their support to a just cause, is to place before them the true issue in the distinctest manner. I believe, furthermore, that good causes have failed more frequently through the cowardice and double-dealing of professed politicians, under the presumption that the people could only be made to do right by deceiving them and playing upon their prejudices, than from all other causes combined. In the hurry and spirit of the hour men are a little too apt to think doubt and consideration evidences of disloyalty, and caution and patience vices rather than virtues. This error has been made several times since the war began, and has resulted in great depression among the people, when the truth dispelled the brilliant anticipations of enthusiastic hopes.

It would seem to a superficial observer that rapid advances are being made in the overthrow of popular liberty, that the people are supine and indifferent on the subject, that one essential requisite after another of a popular Government is being swept away in the mad vortex of fanaticism and passion, until hardly the form of our grand old fabric of constitutional liberty remains as a mournful memento of the glorious past. To those, however, who more critically analyze public events, it will be seen that all grave questions outside of the restoration of the Union have been merely postponed until the termination of the war. The people have been taught to revere the Constitution and the Union. The conviction of their judgment is that the structure of our Government is well adapted to develop the commercial, agricultural, and industrial resources of the country, and to promote the general prosperity and happiness. The Constitution in its operation prior to the rebellion contained every safeguard requisite for a prosperous career. The history of every nation demonstrates that its citizens will accept the form of government best calculated to give protection to person and property, and to promote the general welfare. Trade, commerce, agriculture, and all the industrial pursuits, thrive under a stable Government and languish and perish under the opposite one. Under the Constitution the equilibrium is well preserved. The passage of a law requires the cooperation of this honorable body, the Senate, and the Executive. If we pass an unconstitutional measure, the Senate operates as a check; if both bodies pass such an act, the President can veto it; if all cooperate, the Supreme Court can interpose its decision and declare the act void. I know of no nation in which the rights of the people are more carefully and admirably guarded. In addition, this is the only country in modern times that has thus far successfully demonstrated the capability of the people for self-government. This problem is now on trial. For these reasons, when the rebellion began, the people with great unanimity rallied to the support of the Government without respect to party; such unanimity continued until the prosecution of the war was diverted from the original object, the restoration of the Union, and a series of measures was inaugurated, such as confiscation, abolition, emancipation, suspension of the writ of habeas corpus in the loyal States, and others of a like character, which divided the North and united the South; abolitionism abolished slavery in the District of Columbia; confiscation merely enabled property to be confiscated in such parts of the country as have been recovered from the rebels; the emancipation proclamation has done nothing more, as yet, than the legitimate operation of the war power would have achieved, that is, liberated slaves where the Army has secured possession. It is evident, in my judgment, that the whole policy of the Government has been, since the adoption of the Crittenden resolution, to postpone indefinitely the close of the war. Entertaining these views, I deemed it my duty to oppose all these collateral issues, such as arbitrary arrests, confiscation, suspension of the writ of habeas corpus and the freedom of the press in loyal States, and emancipation, as having a tendency to retard a successful issue to this most deplorable war.

Many honorable members of this House for whom I have great respect supposed that these measures, great in themselves, and especially that of arbitrary arrests, were paramount in the public mind, and would overshadow all other questions. I concede the gravity of the point involved, but still, great as that and the other collateral issues are, the people regarded the life of the nation and the problem of self-government as paramount, and desired these issues first settled before permitting others to engross their attention. The Union restored or separation accomplished, these grave questions will then become a subject of serious inquiry, and the culpable parties be held responsible for the inroads made upon personal rights and liberty.

In addition to the series of measures to which I have referred, we are now called upon to sanction a joint resolution to amend the Constitution so that all persons shall be equal under the law, without regard to color, and so that no person shall hereafter be held in bondage. I might object to this amendment, sir, upon the ground that to prohibit the establishment or continuance of slavery as a legal relation would be virtually to admit that it may exist as such legal relation, and that such an admission in the Constitution would leave that instrument, in respect to human liberty, in a worse state than it is at present. Upon this point, however, I do not intend to enlarge; for, as I understand it, the fact of servitude among a people will be little affected by any provision which their constitution may or may not embody.

Sir, it would seem to me that the sum total of the wisdom of the ruling party is contained in the dogma that the negro is exactly like the white man. To some it may seem that this is not very much, hardly enough to constitute the foundation of a political system and an administration policy for a great nation and a numerous people; but this is a matter of opinion. Some may suppose that the basis of a political system ought—observing the uses of science in general—to be laid upon some fact the existence of which is capable of demonstration; but, sir, we, the people of the United States, are trying great and sublime experiments in politics, and if we can succeed in making something stand upon nothing, will it not show that we are justly entitled to that reputation for political sagacity and adroitness which we have been considerably more ready to claim than the benighted statesmen of Europe have been willing to accord? So far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, in any form of civilization resembling our own, servitude will always exist; and servitude rendered necessary by circumstances which the servile party cannot control, is bondage. Bondage will differ in form, as it is modified by the character of the parties between whom it exists, and it will differ in intensity as it is affected more or less by external conditions. The relation of master and servant in the South is natural to this extent: it is the relation into which the white and black races, being brought together, naturally fell under the influences of mutual necessities for personal security, social tranquility, and subsistence. The relation of master and servant in Great Britain is affected by the pressure of a costly Government, which draws from labor, through capital, the means to defray its annual expenses. Servitudes differ in degree and they differ in kind, but the most important difference of the two—the one that is at once the most significant and the least changeable—is the difference in degree; a man may be nominally free, but if he is a workman without capital, and lives in a state of society of which it may be said “once a peasant always a peasant; once a factory operative always a factory operative;” if the constant labor of his body when in health is only just sufficient to provide him with food and clothing, and if old age, or a few days of illness, inevitably reduce him to pauperism or starvation, he has little to boast of his freedom, and would find it hard to discover wherein it ministers to his elevation or his happiness.

The freedom of a British working man consists in a limited liberty to change his employer. He is descended from ancestors who toiled as he toils, all their days for food, clothing, and shelter, and these scanty in quantity and poor in quality. He begets a posterity to whom he transmits his poverty and his hopelessness, and his whole life, from his cradle to his grave, is one long desperate struggle against starvation and nakedness. This is British liberty to a majority of the people of England. This is what it has been for hundreds of years, with no prospect of change but for the worse. Legislation has been tried abundantly, with a view to work improvements, and with worse than no avail. England has always had, and now has her theorists who have labored to create imaginary Utopias, but that vast war debt which like a millstone is grinding the people to powder, and pressing them into the earth, is a thing that cannot be lifted by constitutional clauses or parliamentary expedients. That legislator will do well, Mr. Speaker, who can devise an amendment to the Constitution which shall relieve the people of the United States, without regard to color, from the pressure of a war debt larger in proportion to their resources than that of Great Britain. The debt is inevitable, it already exists, it is being increased with giddy rapidity. There is nothing in our institutions to prevent national indebtedness from producing the same effects upon the people of the United States that it has produced upon the people of Great Britain. Here is a thing, sir, which may well enlist the wisdom of the wisest statesmen of the country. If Nature has made the negro different in any respect from the white man, all the constitutional clauses in the world will do nothing toward obliterating that difference. If it has made the negro like the white man, that likeness will at the proper time assert itself without constitutional assistance. Nature can neither be hindered nor accelerated by legislative contrivances, and no more than the European can the African be elevated to any valuable purpose by the will of another.

It was declared by me at the last session that for generations to come the laboring men of the United States would be required to work one or two hours in each day more than at present in order to pay off the debt contracted by this war. Now, sir, under all the advantages afforded by a new country and circumstances, in many respects favorable, to an extraordinary degree, the average laboring man of the United States has hitherto done little more than live. Impose upon him the necessity of two hours or of one hour additional labor per diem to support himself and his family, and he is, call him by what flattering title you may, a bondman. Against this bondage, the most hopeless and inexorable of all servitudes, no constitutional amendments, however cunningly devised, will afford security; it will descend from father to son, engraving, as it does in England, its characters, revolting and indelible, deeper and deeper upon each succeeding generation.

Mr. Speaker, if at a time when no causes of excitement were disturbing the minds of the people, a despot had arisen over us to decree and enforce upon the operative population of the United States two hours per day of additional labor for the remainder of their lives, what a cry would have gone up from all parts of the land against an act so tyrannical! What protest would have been entered by such, if any there were, who were permitted to discuss and condemn! What exhortations there would have been to combine for resistance, and what citations of principles against a domination so heartless and destructive! What pictures, at once true and revolting, would have been drawn of the degradation of the people broken in spirit and pressed to the dust, by excessive toil and intolerable exaction, and what fiery indignation would have been felt and expressed against the unnatural monster by whom the wrong was devised and executed! The result is not altered because we happen to reach it by a process less direct. The evil will be the same, the wrong the same, the same the suffering when the excitement has passed away and the fact remains, and we see it in its nakedness; but then, if it is not so now, it will be too late to permit the discovery to be of much avail.

Without pursuing this point, I would say that slavery has always been, and is, regarded as a domestic question. The right to abolish it does, and ought to, rest with the States in which it exists. Since the organization of the Government the law of climate and soil has controlled the subject, and has caused the abolition of slavery in six of the original States, and either abolished or prohibited it in all but nine of the new States since admitted. This Government is one of delegated powers, and those not conferred are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. In regard to slavery the Constitution is silent, and therefore no power exists to amend it in the respect indicated; and in addition, in my judgment, that instrument contemplated that all the States should participate in any amendment thereof. Sir, I do not stand here as the apologist of slavery, but merely to insist that we have no right to incorporate the proposed amendment, and that even if the right exists it is a most injudicious time for the exercise of the power when we should desire to bring back the seceded States to loyalty and obedience. Our action in this respect cannot fail to add fuel to the flame, widen the breach already existing, further embitter the South, and prolong the sanguinary contest. I do not regard this question as having been decided by the late election. The issue there involved was the vigorous prosecution of the war for the restoration of the Union. Entertaining these ideas, I cannot vote for the proposed amendment.

Such are some of my views, Mr. Speaker, on some of the most important questions which agitate the public mind at this moment. If the war be brought to a close within a reasonable time, and a united country be the result, this great Republic, with its immense resources, will spring into new life, and under the blessed reign of peace will ultimately shake off its burdens and repose queen-like among the nations of the earth.

We must be prepared to make still greater sacrifices than any that have gone before, if necessary, to save the Union; but the considerations to which I have adverted admonish us, as I have observed already, not to prolong the war a moment longer than is necessary to effect its legitimate object. Let us be careful lest in seeking to obtain a fancied benefit for others we do not destroy ourselves. It has been justly said, sir, that to most men experience is like the stern-lights of a ship, which illumine only the track it has passed. It will be a sad thing for this Republic if those who have it in their power to control its destinies are recorded by history in such a category. On the use to be made hereafter of the light of experience depends our whole future destiny.

It is to decide whether we take the first fatal step of disintegration which will lead us to the position of those petty States whose weight in the world's council is represented by a cipher, and whose little quarrels only provoke a smile, or whether we remain a great people—homogeneous, united, and powerful.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House by an extended argument on this question now. At the last session of Congress I had the honor to express my views upon it elaborately, and I do not desire to repeat those views now, because I do the House the justice to suppose that it remembers what I said on that occasion. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may say what they please about the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States, but no man can successfully deny the assertion I now make, that it is a radical change of the Government of the United States. It is not an expedient resorted to at this time to end this rebellion and restore peace to the land; but it is a blow aimed at the very foundations of the Government which our fathers gave us, and of which we have been long so proud. It is an effort to take from the States of this Union, by constitutional amendment, the great power of regulating their domestic and social affairs in their own way, and I deny the power to do that by Congress, even through an amendment of the Constitution adopted in accordance with the mode pointed out for amending that instrument.

Adopt this amendment, change the Government of the United States, say to the States of the Union everywhere, North, South, East, and West, that they shall not regulate their internal affairs in their own way, and is not that, I ask, changing the Government? Is it not taking from the States a power which, if attempted to be taken from them at the time the Constitution was adopted, would have prevented the adoption of that instrument? If you can do that can you not also introduce an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting States of the Union from regulating their marital relations? Can you not, with the same propriety, take from every State of the Union the right to regulate the relations of guardian and ward? Can you not, on the grounds on which you claim the right now to change radically the Government of the United States, deprive the States of the Union by constitutional amendment, at a time like this, of every power which they exercise under our form of government? And at what a time do you attempt this? You attempt it at a time when you are exerting all the powers of the Government to bring back to their allegiance eleven rebellious States of this Union. You are urging that they are still States of this Union; that they are still bound by the Constitution and laws of the United States. They have refused obedience to those laws and that Constitution, and you are endeavoring to force them to yield that obedience which they have refused to yield willingly. Yet at the very time you are doing this you propose to say to them that you will so change that Constitution as to make it entirely different from what it was when they engaged in this rebellion. We are to say to them, "We call you back to a Government which had no existence when you refused obedience to it." Now, have we a right to do this? Have we, the Representatives of the people of the United States, has this Government of the United States the right to call upon the rebels to yield obedience to this Government after we have made it a Government entirely different from that from which they seceded or against which they rebelled? What is the moral obligation upon them to yield now, when you shall have changed the fundamental law as you propose to change it? Ay! I go further, and ask, what is the moral obligation of loyalty and obedience resting upon any State of this Union, loyal or rebel, if you do this thing? Do you not thereby absolve every State from its allegiance to this Government? Do you not make it such a Government that any State in this Union which may choose now to engage in the rebellion in which eleven States are already involved will be free from all liability to the charge of violated faith?

Sir, I said that I was not to be led into an elaborate discussion of this question; and I will not be, although the field opens out wide before us. We have had this question presented to us once before. At the last session of Congress this proposed amendment to the Constitution was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] who now fathers it. It failed then to receive the requisite vote of two thirds of this body. Why renew it now? Why bring it up again, on this motion to reconsider that vote? Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] suppose that inducements, arguments, reasons, influences have been brought to bear upon the minds of members of this body to induce them to act now in a manner directly different from their action on that occasion? What are those arguments? Where are those reasons for doing now what we refused to do then? They have not been produced in this debate. If they exist they are outside of the legitimate subject-matter which is before us. There may be motives moving gentlemen to do now what they refused to do then. But if there be, they are hidden from my view; if not palpable they are invisible.

The President of the United States pays us a very high compliment indeed in his last annual message. He calls upon this Congress, before its expiring hour, to reconsider its action upon this question, and to do now what we refused to do at the last session. What reason does he propose to us for that change? What arguments does he produce in favor of it now that he and others did not adduce at the time this action was before urged upon us? None at all. He simply says: "Gentlemen, it will be done by the next Congress, and as the result is inevitable, as three fourths of the next House of Representatives will be in favor of it, why postpone the result? why defer it longer? why not accept your fate and bow to it submissively?" He asks us to abandon our principles, to give up our convictions, and yet in almost the same sentence he says, "If you want a man as President who will do otherwise than I have done on the slavery question you must find him and put him here, for I shall not change my opinions." Are we not as honestly convinced that we are right, and were right then, as the President of the United States is convinced that he is right? Have we not the same right, and is it not equally our duty to act on our convictions, as it is his right and his duty to act on his convictions? I know of no obligation resting upon a member of this House to change his views at the bidding of the President of the United States, or "any other in authority," not resting on the President himself to change his mind at the dictation of Congress; yet he says he cannot change, but the gentlemen of the House of Representatives can, and he hopes they will. Well, I fear some of them will. The wish or order of the President is very potent. He can punish and reward. I repeat that the only potent influence I have seen brought to bear upon this House to induce them to change their action of the last session is this request of the President of the United States.

My colleague, [Mr. YEAMAN,] who addressed the House this morning, in giving the reasons why he should cast his vote in favor of this resolution of amendment, stated that he should do it to end this rebellion, and to restore peace to this land. He stated that he did not believe that slavery was the cause of this rebellion; that he had so announced in former times. But he believed that the abandonment of slavery now would end the rebellion and restore peace; and that this could be done by this proposed amendment to the Constitution.

I cannot see the matter in the same light in which my colleague regards it. Sir, how would the adoption of this amendment to the Constitution end this rebellion and the agitation of the slavery question? If, when it were done, it were so well done as my colleague supposes; if it would restore concord and harmony among the States and people, then I should be willing to have it done quickly. I would not oppose it any longer; I would give in my adhesion to it, and take the step that my colleague proposes to take. But I cannot see it in that light. How will the adoption of this amendment end this subject? Does the mere abolishment of slavery throughout the United States by a constitutional amendment settle all the great questions springing up in relation to that institution? Does it not multiply and complicate the difficulties which surround us? As the thing stands now we know what it is; we know how it is controlled; we know how it has been governed. We have been accustomed to it. We know the condition of the negro race. But, sir, adopt this amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and by one fell swoop declare this race free throughout this broad land, and what are you going to do then with these liberated negroes?

Mr. YEAMAN. My colleague will allow me to say a word. He appears to have understood me to have maintained that the death of slavery would end the rebellion. I did not take that position. I took the ground that the adoption of this amendment would remove from these Halls one of the disturbing elements that now exist, as well as take from the rebellion one of the principal sources of its strength. I have not contended that the abolition of slavery would end the rebellion. That, sir, must be done by the armies in the field.

Mr. MALLORY. Well, Mr. Speaker, my colleague says that the adoption of this amendment would remove from these Halls one disturbing element of discussion. I differ with him in that respect. As I said before, we know how slavery now exists; we know what laws govern and control it; we know what rights maintain it. We know all about it. We know the status of the negro. But adopt this amendment to the Constitution, and so far from removing a disturbing element of discussion, do we not introduce hundreds of distracting questions in the place of that one which we propose to get rid of, and springing from this very act necessarily? I renew the inquiry, what does the gentleman propose to do with the negroes if they be liberated by this constitutional amendment? Does my colleague hold that they should remain in the States in which they may be when freed? Sir, I know hundreds of the Republican party—or I did know hundreds of them in former times; I do not know what their opinions may be now—who were bitterly opposed to this policy; who would have fought to the bitter end against setting free the negroes to remain in the States where they were freed, and to control the destinies of this Government by the exercise of the elective franchise, maintaining an equality with the white man, socially, civilly, politically. Do they entertain that opinion now? Does my colleague entertain it? Is he, are they, now in favor of the negro remaining when freed in the States where freed, enjoying the right of suffrage, politically the equal of the white man?

What is to be done with the negroes who may be freed? Is not that a disturbing question? Is not that an exciting question? If you are to send them out of the country, where are you to send them? What nation on the face of the globe would be willing to receive them? Do you say, "Send them to Africa?" How will you get them there? This is a rich Government; it is a powerful Government; it is a Government that can, according to the theory acted on by this Administration, do whatever it pleases, provided the greenbacks will hold out. But I ask the question, and I would like the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or the Secretary of the Treasury, or some other distinguished man who knows all about our financial condition, to answer it. I ask the question, is this nation able to deport and colonize the three or four million slaves that will be set free by the amendment now proposed? Can you raise the twelve or fifteen hundred millions, or the two thousand millions, that will be necessary for this purpose? Millions have now come to be regarded as so insignificant that perhaps I cannot excite the alarm of gentlemen on this subject unless I name some six or seven thousand millions. I do not know what amount it will require; but the sum is enormous. This Government now is oppressed with debt and laboring under financial difficulty. The wits of its wisest financiers are severely taxed to devise the ways and means to continue the present war.

Mr. MALLORY's time having expired, Mr. VOORHEES was recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MALLORY. I am very much obliged to my friend. I thought I would have concluded by this time.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not expect to occupy more than a small fraction of an hour. The gentleman can either speak in my time or the House can extend his time.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky have leave to proceed.

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not expect to occupy more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether this arrangement will prolong the extent of his participation in the debate? I propose to speak on this subject, and I would like to know whether my remarks will probably be carried over to a very late hour in the evening.

Mr. VOORHEES. I shall not occupy the floor more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I have suggested why, financially, we cannot agree to the deportation of this class. But that is not the only one. Humanity comes in and forbids this thing. Will you take this man, for whose freedom you have worked so long and with so much pretended philanthropy; will you take these beings whom you propose to raise from what you call their present abject condition to one of freedom and equality; will you take them forcibly and carry them from the land they love and place them where they do not want to go? Is that your humanity? Why not let him stay in the condition where he is contented and happy? Where will you carry him? Oh, no; this is not your purpose! I know that it was the purpose of some of the gentlemen on that side of the House. Their number has become "small by degrees and beautifully less." I know that that party have been "whittled down to the little end of nothing." [Laughter.] There is nothing of it scarcely remaining. But there are some gentlemen who still think that they ought to be colonized.

I now make the declaration, and I believe that time will prove its truth; I know that gentlemen are unwilling to accept it as true at this time; I make the declaration that the purpose of the party in power is to retain them in the States where they are freed by force and power if necessary, and to preserve them there as an element of political power, to be used through all time for the purpose of keeping control of the Federal Government, and the control of the States in their hands. That purpose has been indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELLIOT] in his effort to pass the freedmen's bill. It has shown that it will be the effect of that bill to erect an imperium in imperio in every State in the Union where these slaves are freed, to have in them all a large class of men who shall be kept from the control of State laws and held under the control of the Federal Government. This has been proved recently in Maryland by the interference of the military power to take from the control of the orphans' court the young slaves liberated there who were bound out to their masters in accordance with the laws of that State; and the announcement of the military commander that these young freemen should not have their status fixed by the laws and courts of Maryland, but that it should be fixed by the authorities of the United States.

Well, sir, having been freed by the party in power they will during all time be the friends of the party in power; and when their reconstruction policy comes to be carried out, and State after State is brought back by force, and not willingly, into the Union, how long, I ask you, will it be before this power will enable them to control the General Government and fix the destinies of this Union indefinitely? That may be a strong reason, Mr. Speaker, why they now urge this amendment. I have no doubt that that is their leading motive. And in the name of God, is it not a motive for me, and every man who loves the institutions of his country, for every man who wants to see this great free Government, controlled by the white men during all time, to oppose it?

Sir, I am not indulging in a vain supposition when I make this statement. Facts prove that I am right. Already those who claim to be the leaders of the Republican party, who claim to be the guides of its opinions, those who have from the time that that party was inception, organized, and came into power, manipulated, controlled, and educated it to the stand-points wherever they thought proper to carry it, have avowed this as their purpose. And they will continue to lead it to the attainment of their purposes and objects in the future.

I do not know but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] contemplated such an end and such a purpose. I do not know that he is not one of the illuminati who are undertaking to educate this whole land in the belief in the destiny of the negro, which is to place him not only upon an equality with the white man but above him in all respects. Sir, that is the policy of a distinguished gentleman from Missouri, (Gratz Brown,) who recently wrote a communication to the Democrat, published in St. Louis, in which this purpose is avowed. That gentleman, the "higher law" leader of that State, one of those who guide the public sentiment of the United States; one of that radical set, once so odious and now so powerful; and which has compelled the moderate and conservative men of the party to come into their views; that gentleman has avowed this as his purpose. I read that communication not with surprise, but with horror. It was addressed to the State of Missouri and to the convention which is to assemble there. He tells them that three things are necessary in order to secure that freedom to the negro which they propose to give. The first is a radical change in the judiciary of Missouri—the putting upon the bench a man who will support him in his views of negro rights; the second is that the elective franchise and freedom must go hand in hand, and the negro who is made free by the action of that convention is to be invested with the right of the elective franchise equally with the white man, and the right and power to hold office; and in the third place, for fear that this potent agency will not enable him to carry out his object of controlling that State, he goes further and lays down the doctrine that every white man in the State of Missouri who opposes his policy, every one engaged in the rebellion, including not only those actually in rebellion but those who go under the name of rebel sympathizers, must be denied the right of the elective franchise. This power which he wants to perpetuate in Missouri is to be accomplished by giving the elective franchise to the black man and taking it from the white man. And the policy he recommends in Missouri you propose to carry out in all the slave States in the Union. You intend that no State shall deny the freed negro the right of franchise. If it shall be done in any State you will set aside its action by the Federal power. I believe you intend to claim the right to prevent it by legislative enactment under that clause of this joint resolution which provides that Congress make the necessary laws to carry out the provisions of this amendment. Is not this your purpose? Will gentlemen deny it? This I aver to be the object of the leading few who control the following many of the party in power.

Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why I do not wish to see this radical revolution in our Government effected at this time and by this body. It is asserted that the next Congress will be able to do it; that two thirds of that body will be in favor of this constitutional amendment. I admit that it appears to be so. However, may we not calculate that the same agencies which have been brought to bear and operate successfully upon those members who voted against this resolution last Congress to induce them to change their votes now, may be brought to bear with equal success upon the minds of those who are elected to the next Congress, before they shall take action on this subject, to induce them to change their views? Changes may be effected by that time, and therefore I do not want to hurry up this thing now.

Another reason; those who are so anxious now to make us reconsider our action and adopt their views have, by the resolution, referred this amendment to the Legislatures of the various States for ratification. They have, as they have power to do under the Constitution, selected the Legislatures of the several States as the bodies to ratify this amendment. Those Legislatures exist now, and were elected by the people of the various States without reference to this great question. It was not a question in the canvass when they were elected. The attention of the people of the various States has never been called to it, as it should be before its adoption. Therefore I want the question postponed until those Legislatures are changed and new ones elected upon this very issue. It becomes necessary to refer the question to the Legislatures, or to a convention of the various States. I prefer the latter, and desire that such bodies shall be elected after a full discussion of this question shall have been had in a canvass.

These various considerations justify me in the vote I shall give again, the same vote I gave last session. I reiterate the views I uttered in extenso upon that occasion, and I believe in their solvency as assuredly as I believe in my own existence. My colleague said no man committed himself by his vote here; and I inferred from that that my colleague did not consider himself committed to favor this amendment of the Constitution by voting to refer the question to the people. He did not say whether he would favor the ratification of this amendment or not, but rather intimated that he would not notwithstanding he would vote to refer the question to the States.

Sir, my colleague is mistaken in supposing that this resolution refers the question to the people of the various States. If it did I would not have the same objection to it that I have. It refers this question to the representatives of the people in the Legislatures of the various States, not coming from the people after the people have expressed their views at all upon the question. That, I think, should have prevented my colleague from being influenced by the mistaken motives which have operated upon him, and I trust that when he comes to reflect that he is not submitting this question to the people of the States, but to the Legislatures of the States, packed, fixed, controlled, as many of them are, he will reconsider his purpose to vote for it. Has my colleague reflected that it is not and cannot be referred to the Legislatures, conventions, or people of nine States at all, and anything like an attempt at a ratification of it by Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Florida, or Texas, would be impossible? It would be a farce to refer it to the people of Tennessee, Louisiana, and Arkansas; and my colleague knows well enough the condition of Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland, not to feel that those States are not capable of giving a subject like this that peaceful, uninfluenced, deliberate consideration which its importance demands and the Constitution contemplates.

My colleague says that he considers himself free to oppose the ratification of this amendment in Kentucky although he votes for this resolution. Now, I cannot regard the matter in that light. The whole argument of my colleague was addressed to the State of Kentucky to show why she ought to adopt this amendment. The whole scope of his argument was to prove that it is the duty of Kentucky to ratify this amendment; and how, after having argued and reasoned with the State of Kentucky in favor of its ratification can he consider himself free, when he goes home, to oppose it?

Mr. YEAMAN. My colleague rightly apprehended my position in saying that a man might consistently and conscientiously vote for this resolution here and against the amendment in our State, but I afterward distinctly said that I did not put my vote upon that ground, but that I went boldly forward and justified the amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I did not hear that saving clause. I heard the first part, and I thought it a position so badly taken that I determined to address myself to it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are told in addition—I have had that argument presented to me by my conservative Republican friends—that if we adopt this amendment now slavery will be extinguished everywhere, and wiped out, and there will be no more disturbing or dividing elements, and all conservatives can act together against this radical party, and defeat the purposes by which they really seek to revolutionize this Government. That is one argument that has been addressed to me by Republicans why I should vote for this resolution, and it is an argument which has been addressed to me why I should take every step which the Republican party has taken since the commencement of this revolution, for we are in revolution now. But, sir, how mistaken in their views of human nature are those who expect any such result as that! In revolutionary times like these, one step in revolutionary movement induces another, and every such step you sanction makes it harder to resist the next step. That is the natural law of revolutionary movements. It is the law of all movement. The more the movement of a body is accelerated, the more difficult is it to stop it; and besides, I consider this very measure the most radical that has been, or can be proposed—going farther in that direction than all the laws passed by Congress and all the usurpations practiced by the Executive since the party in power commenced to revolutionize the Government. It is not only a step toward the conversion of the Government from a federative to a consolidated one, but it will be the accomplishment of that purpose.

If my colleague would see this matter in this, its true light, he would not invoke us to sustain this movement and profess his willingness after that to aid us in our resistance to what he calls the destructive and radical policy of confiscation, and the plans of reconstruction proposed by the President and this House, but he would see in it (as I believe before God there is) more danger to our liberties and to republican form of government than in all the measures that this Congress has or can enact, and in all the usurpations of the present Executive.

No, sir; now is the time for effort to resist the radical party and save our form of government. I invoke my colleague to reconsider his resolution to support this amendment, and instead of promising to aid us in the future to prevent or cure radical and destructive legislation, to aid us now in defeating this measure, the most radical and destructive of all. Does not my colleague know that former amendments of the Constitution were adopted to protect and guard the States in their rights and powers, and to enlarge them; and this is the first proposition that has ever been made to restrict those rights and powers, and to aggrandize the General Government? I regard it as a movement toward that centralization so much dreaded by our fathers, and which we will reach, unless gentlemen regain their senses before it is too late.

Sir, I do not intend to intrude longer upon the House. I have spoken longer than I intended, and it only remains for me to ask pardon of my Republican friends and of my Democratic friends who may have changed their views upon this question, for repeating that when the question shall be taken I shall give the same vote as I gave at the last session of Congress.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to detain the House but for a few moments, and to confine my remarks to a statement rather than to elaborate them into an argument.

It must have occurred to every observer that great indifference has been displayed during this discussion on both sides of the House. The question of amending the American Constitution upon a point of the utmost magnitude has not engrossed the attention usually given to ordinary legislation. Nor is this apparently strange fact any reflection upon the intelligence or zeal of the members of this body. On the contrary, it attests their sound judgment and capacity to discern correctly the eventful scenes through which we are passing and which will soon become history. Every one here by this time perceives that the existence of the institution of slavery does not depend in any degree whatever upon the enactment of this proposed amendment. The fate of the war in which we have so long been engaged has at last assumed complete and final control of that great question. In July last the President, with becoming frankness at least, announced to the American people that no propositions of peace in this unhappy land would be entertained by him until slavery was destroyed. This was plainly stated. I do not now recall it in order to arraign the fatal policy which, in my judgment, it involves, but simply to observe that this purpose of the war, thus avowed, obtained a ratification, by means however illegitimate, at the ballot-box. Four years more of power was thus given to the party which makes the destruction of slavery a condition of peace as well as a condition of union.

Upon the assembling of Congress here a few weeks ago, the President in his annual message again asserted this condition as the only one on which the war could end. If it is thought that I state the conclusion of his message too broadly, it is only necessary to recall his proclamations of freedom to all the slaves in insurrectionary States, and by which he tells us he intends to stand. He thus commits the blood and treasure of the country to the overthrow of the institution of slavery. There is no escape from this position, and I do not suppose he for a moment desires to evade it. He told the people in advance for what they should bleed and die in the event of his reelection, and he simply reiterates his assertion in the message.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if the arms of the Government triumph throughout the region of rebellion, whose vision is so dull as not to behold the liberation of every slave, without any other change in the Constitution than that which war and usurpations and proclamations have already made? This Government now stands committed to the destruction of slavery by all the means which the people possess, and at the expense of a thirty years' war, if that lapse of time should be necessary to accomplish the result.

But reverse the picture, and suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the rebellion becomes a success and southern independence lifts its head from the desolations of war. Slavery is at once beyond our reach. We would have amended our Constitution in order to apply the amendment to a foreign Power. But, sir, long before a final result is obtained by arms on either side of this baleful contest I think I foresee the relinquishment of this domestic institution by the action of the South itself. I cannot close my eyes to the events which are there transpiring. General Lee, on whose shoulders rests the entire cause for which the South drew the sword, asks for negro troops, and they will be raised. Slavery can no longer exist when that policy is adopted. An army of liberated slaves is totally inconsistent with the discipline and police regulations by which alone the relation of master and slave is maintained and rendered mutually advantageous. This fact is understood and appreciated by the public opinion of the South, and while yielding to it as a necessity, in order to raise soldiers and recruit their diminished armies, they will make the consequent and inevitable abolition of slavery a virtue in the eyes of the people of Europe, and seek for recognition and protection on that account. How far they are likely to succeed in thus enlisting the sympathy and aid of foreign Powers is a question well worth the anxious consideration of the ablest statesmen now intrusted with power.

Sir, in view of these facts, which are open to every eye, I hold that the question of slavery is rapidly diminishing in importance. Whether for better or for worse it is passing away. I shall not stop in this connection to inquire whether such a result is worth the terrible sacrifice which is required to secure it; whether the doubtful blessing which we confer upon four million negroes by setting them free is not too dearly purchased at the expense of the blood and tears and toil which this war has entailed upon the land. My views upon all these and kindred points are well known. I am now simply dealing with facts which all are bound to accept, and which the party that I belong to at least have no power to change. I foresee, it is true; other and most vital issues which will grow out of the destruction of slavery, and which will divide the councils of men in the future. The party now in power will seek to enfranchise the liberated negro, to make him a voter, a juror, and eligible to office. This has already been done in many States in which that party has the ascendancy, and the bill recently introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY], purporting to be a bill for the reconstruction of the Union, provides for the exercise of these privileges by the emancipated black man throughout all the seceded States when they are once more reduced to obedience. On all these questions, sir, we will meet you at the proper time. I shall do no more than allude to them now.

But, although I regard the act of the House today on this proposed amendment to the Constitution with total indifference, so far as the existence of the institution of slavery is concerned, yet I shall vote against its passage. I shall give my reasons, but not elaborate them. I hold that this is an improper time to amend the fundamental law of the country. Such an act should not be consummated amid the fiery passions and vehement hates engendered by civil war. It should be the work of calmness and of peace. It is to last for all time. There is an idea of perpetuity attached to constitutions and constitutional amendments which does not belong to ordinary acts of legislation. They should therefore be the work of unclouded wisdom and not spring from the wrath and smoke of the battle-field. If we have spent a large portion of our time here since the war commenced in repealing or revising or amending our hasty and crude legislation it should admonish us to refrain from laying a rude and innovating hand on the Constitution itself. When the sky shall again be clear over our heads, a peaceful sun illuminating the land, and our great household of States all at home in harmony once more, then will be the time to consider what changes, if any, this generation desires to make on the work of Washington, Madison, and the revered sages of our antiquity.

I hold also that it is an act of bad faith on the part of those in power to seize this time of patriotic sacrifice on the part of all to carry out and culminate a favorite partisan scheme against which nearly two million voters protested at the late election. But this conduct has grown familiar to us all, and I barely make the suggestion as worthy of consideration in connection with the whole political career which this war has been made to pursue under the dictation of an unhealthy fanaticism.

But I hold finally that the Constitution does not authorize an amendment to be made by which any State or citizen shall be divested of acquired rights of property or of established political franchises. The construction which our fathers gave to the Constitution, and to which we have all hitherto adhered, guaranteed to the slaveholding States the right of property in slaves. This proposition is too well settled for discussion. It needs only to be stated. It is true that the provision of the Constitution which authorizes its amendment is very broad and contains but one express limitation. But it is always implied as a limitation of power that a well-settled principle of public law shall not be violated. To majorities are intrusted great and diversified powers, but among them, however great and numerous, is never granted the power to rob a minority of its vested rights. This amendment, in my judgment, proposes to commit this wrong in regard to every slave State on which it can ever be brought to operate. I deny the power. If it can be exercised on the subject of slavery it can on all others. If the rights of a State and of its citizens on this subject can be destroyed all other rights may perish by similar usurpations of power. A minority would thus be left no resource save that of revolution. I cannot give my sanction to a measure fraught with the entire overthrow of the wholesome doctrine that States have certain reserved sovereign rights which no external power can take away.

I have thus very briefly given the views which control my action on this question, and now take leave of it, simply expressing the hope that whatever may be done may advance the happiness of the people.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, when this subject was first brought before the House for its action I thought I would take no part in the discussion, but would content myself with giving a silent vote. But the subject is one of such importance to my State and of such great interest that I think it my duty to my constituents, the freemen whom I represent, that I should say something to try to prevent the passage of this resolution. My determination to say something arises from the fact that most of the members who have participated in this discussion have evaded the question now before the House, which in reality and truth only concerns the State of Kentucky. I shall endeavor to demonstrate that fact. We see here in this House twenty-odd northern States arrayed against one southern State. I conceive that to pass this proposed amendment to the Constitution is in violation of plighted faith made to my State and people, and cannot be evaded without dishonor; it is in violation of faith pledged not only to Kentucky but to the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing this question I perceive most gentlemen commence their remarks against rebels, and are untiring in their abuse and denunciation of the rebellious States; the whole burden of their speeches is against the rebellion, when in reality this is a movement, not against the rebellious States, but against a loyal State now in the Union.

The attempt is made to sway men's judgments by a wholesale abuse of the disloyal States, for the purpose of committing an outrage on a loyal State of the Union. I was not present when this question was discussed and voted upon at the last session of Congress, and did not hear the arguments that were made in its support. But from what I have heard here during this session I discover that the supporters of this measure are desirous of preventing the true issue from coming before the House and the country.

What is the use of this proposed amendment to the Constitution? You contend that by the proclamation of the President slavery is already abolished in all the rebel States. It is needless, therefore, to apply the proposed amendment to any of them. You do not intend that they shall ever return to the Union. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has taken the ground here that the rebel States are no longer in the Union, and are, therefore, not entitled to the protection of the Constitution, and the action of Congress in receiving West Virginia in the Union as a State in violation of the Constitution of the United States seems to indorse his sentiments. I read from his speech delivered in the House on the 9th of December, 1862, upon that question:

"Now, these rebellious States being a Power by the acknowledgment of European nations, and of our own nation, subject and entitled to belligerent rights, have become subject to all the rules of war. I hold the Constitution has no longer the least effect upon them."

"Hence I hold that none of the States now in rebellion are entitled to the protection of the Constitution, and I am grieved when I hear those high in authority sometimes talking of the constitutional difficulties of enforcing measures against this belligerent Power, and the next moment disregarding every vestige and semblance of the Constitution by acts which alone are arbitrary."

"This talk of restoring the Union as it was under the Constitution as it is, is one of the absurdities which I have heard all I have become sick of. This Union can never be restored as it was. There are many things which render such an event impossible. This Union shall never, with my consent, be restored under the Constitution as it is, with slavery protected by it."—Congressional Globe, vol. 47, part 1, p. 50.

On what, then, is it proposed that the amendment of the Constitution shall, in reality, act? Solely on the State of Kentucky, a State which has always been loyal to the Union. She has not a spot or stain on her escutcheon. She has been always true to the country and the Constitution. Then I ask gentlemen why, when difficulties are thickening around us, they should strive, at a time like this, to increase those difficulties? It has always been admitted by northern statesmen heretofore that Congress had no right to interfere with any State on the subject of slavery. Daniel Webster, one of the ablest men that the North has produced, and in his day the greatest constitutional lawyer and statesman in the country, in one of his speeches in opposition to the extension of slavery in the Territories, said:

"We have slavery already among us. The Constitution found it among us; it recognized it, and gave it solemn guarantees. To the full extent of these guarantees we are all bound in honor, in justice, and by the Constitution."

"Slavery, as it exists in the States, is beyond the reach of Congress. It is a concern of the States themselves; they have never submitted it to Congress, and Congress has no rightful power over it. I shall concur, therefore, in no act, no measure, no menace, no indication of purpose, which shall interfere, or threaten to interfere, with the exclusive authority of the several States over the subject of slavery as it exists within their respective limits."

On another occasion, in the Senate, Mr. Webster said:

"I have often, Mr. President, expressed the opinion that over slavery as it exists in the States this Government has no control whatever. It is entirely and exclusively a State concern. And while it is thus clear that Congress has no direct power over the subject it is our duty to take care that the authority of the Government is not brought to bear upon it by any indirect interference whatever."

And at a still later period, recurring again to the same subject, in a public speech, Mr. Webster said:

"I hold that Congress is absolutely precluded from interfering in any manner, direct or indirect, with this [slavery] as with any other of the institutions of the States."

"I say that there is no power, direct or indirect, in Congress, or the General Government, to interfere in the slightest degree with the institutions of the South."

These were the opinions of that great and good man; although born and reared in the North, opposed to slavery, his honest conviction governed him, and Massachusetts statesmen would do well to follow his example.

We have been told here, not only by the President of the United States, but by Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, as well as by Congress itself, that neither the people of the non-slaveholding States nor Congress has any power over the subject of slavery. In this way the State of Kentucky has been led along, step by step, by the pledges you have given her, until she is now, as it were, powerless in your hands, and stands in the attitude of one State pleading for justice against more than twenty. I do not ask for any favor to Kentucky. I simply ask for justice for her. Give her what she is entitled to, and no more. I ask no more.

How does the proposition affect Kentucky? Let us look at the interest that she has in this matter. Most of the members of this House have little interest in the question. It is a mere idea with them. They sit here and vote away the property of others, while they themselves have no interest in it. How is it with regard to Kentucky? Her slave property before the war was worth $150,000,000, and would be at this day worth more if it had not been for the action of the Federal Government. You have no right to take away that property unless for the public use, and then only on making just compensation. I have heard much about "military necessity," but you would have just as much right, under this plea, to go to northern manufactories and take away clothing, boots, and shoes, by force of arms, for the use of the Army, as you would have to go into Kentucky and take our slave and other property. You would have just as much right to go into your large cities and take money from the banks and other moneyed institutions, on the plea that it was necessary in order to pay the soldiers to carry on the war. I believe in no such necessity, and such conduct is merely robbing the citizens, contrary to the constitutional laws of the country.

But you say that you intend to make this legal by changing the Constitution; and you ask us to consent that the General Government shall rob one State for the benefit of all the rest if you have it so. You propose to carry the amendment by a two-thirds vote in Congress and by three fourths of the States, which you are controlling by your armies. Look at the State of Kentucky. At this time and at the last election the Federal soldiers were scattered all over the State. You could not go to a town or cross-road or railroad station without finding it bristling with bayonets. The soldiers were there at the last election, intimidating voters and driving them from the polls. And yet you propose the mockery of submitting this measure to the people under such circumstances. Let me relate a few incidents that have taken place in Kentucky recently. Nearly every public press in the State of Kentucky, so far as I know, that does not sustain the policy of the Administration, has been suppressed by military authority. No paper is allowed to appear there that is not bound to advocate their policy. I do not believe there exists a public print in the whole State of Kentucky that is not so controlled. Not by direct military order, but by trade regulations, by which no editor can buy paper and materials for his office, or sell his paper when printed, without suffering great inconvenience; for the man who does not support the policy of the Administration is denounced as disloyal and not entitled to support. You have your hands upon every man in that country. Your officers say to this man and to that, "I want this property and that, and I intend to have it; and you who do not vote for Abraham Lincoln shall never receive a cent for your property; while those of you who do vote for him shall be fully paid." Even at this very day, in the State of Kentucky, we are called upon to support this amendment of the Constitution, and to legalize what under the laws of the land has hitherto only been robbery.

I could enumerate many an outrage that has been committed upon our people. We had an instance in the last election for judges of our supreme court. Our candidate—Judge Duvall—was a man who had served upon the bench, and who was up for reelection. He was allowed to run until two days before the election, when orders went out to strike his name off the poll-books, and he to be arrested and cast in prison; and the orders were carried out in regard to poll-books. It was probably thought that there being but two days before the election the people of that district would not have time to nominate another man for the office. But it so happened that some men took an interest in the matter, put up another gentleman—Judge Robertson—and by telegraph endeavored to spread the intelligence of the nomination all over the district, being twenty-three counties, nevertheless he received more votes than the candidate of the Lincoln party, who had been many weeks a candidate, and probably been all over the district, and known to the whole country.

I myself have been called a rebel because I would not bow the knee to power, and vote the ticket according to dictation. Never, so help me God, will I vote for anything which I believe to be wrong; never will I bend the knee before the footstool of power, although "thrift may follow fawning."

In my district, under the pressure of military power, two or three irresponsible men, hardly known in the county, some of whom I confess I did not know, although in my own county where I have lived all my life, were put upon the board of trade, and every man who desired to buy or sell anything, a horse, or cow, or supplies of any kind for his family, was compelled to go to them and get a permit before he moved it.

What more? All the railroads in the State of Kentucky are now in the hands of the Government and Government agents, and throughout the whole State they are taking every negro that comes to the roads and running them off to the borders of the State. For what? Is it for the benefit of the Government of the United States? Is it to aid in putting down the rebellion? No, sir; many are taken to the North and put into the Army, that the men of the North may get rid of serving in the Army, and thousands of dollars are made by this stealing of our property by individuals for their own benefit.

Not long ago it seemed that the Government was almost getting into difficulty with Great Britain about recruiting in Ireland, contrary to the laws of that country. It turned out, if the newspapers tell the truth, that Massachusetts had her agents all through that country, and were shipping men from there to save her own citizens. With the means she had made by her trade with the South, and the profits she had made upon the products of slavery, she was enabled to send her emissaries all through our country, and into Ireland, and buy up recruits to save her own citizens from going into the Army.

Now, why is this thing done? Why is the Federal Government carrying on this system in Kentucky and other loyal States? If you take away from a man that which he considers to be justly his own, you make him desperate, and he will retaliate upon you. You can never by oppression make a man obey willingly the laws of his country. Act justly toward him; let him see that he has a Government which will protect him, and he will love that Government. But oppress and rob him, and he will despise and hate you.

As I said before, you made a solemn declaration to the State of Kentucky that you had no legal power to interfere with slavery in the States. The President of the United States said so in his inaugural address. Mr. Seward, by the direction of the President, in his letter to Mr. Adams said that we had no right to interfere with this institution, and that it would remain the same after this war, whether the rebellion succeeded or not. And why? Simply because the United States Government, in its proper province, has no right to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States. To be more accurate, I will read a passage from that letter, dated April 22, 1861. He says:

"The condition of slavery in the several States will remain just the same, whether it [the revolution] succeeds or fails. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail; for the rights of the States, and the condition of every human being in them, will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it shall fail." "It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrages he has come into the Administration, has always repudiated all designs whatever and whenever imputed to him and them, of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the Constitution and laws. The case, however, would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional, and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people."

Thus, in addition to the obligation imposed by the Constitution, you have pledged your sacred honor that you will not do this thing; and if now you commit this act, which you have solemnly declared you had no right to do, and would not do, then you will commit a great outrage on my State, and my State alone, because it is the only State now interested in this question, the other border States having already taken steps to abolish slavery within their limits.

When you declared that you would not perpetrate this outrage, we believed you—at least I did. When these troubles broke out I declared before my people that you would never interfere with the rights guaranteed to the States by the Constitution; that you would stand by your pledged honor, your plighted faith. I had confidence in your pledges, and I endeavored to infuse that feeling of confidence into those of my fellow-citizens with whom I had any influence. Sir, when I come again face to face with the men to whom I gave that assurance, many of them having taken opposite ground to that which I maintained, how shall I answer them when they say, "Did we not tell you that when they got us in their power they would oppress us as they pleased?"

Mr. Speaker, in the adoption of this amendment you northern men will be merely carrying out to the letter the charges made by your enemies; you will be verifying the predictions made by disloyal men. You, by your own act, are now justifying every charge and insinuation made against you, and which I repelled with all my power. It is a matter of justice to my State and to my people that you should not perpetrate this flagrant wrong upon them in defiance of all your pledges heretofore made and as further evidence upon the subject, let me read a resolution passed by the Congress of the United States in February, 1861:

"Resolved, That neither the Congress of the United States nor the people nor governments of the non-slaveholding States have the constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the slaveholding States of this Union."

That resolution was passed unanimously by the Congress of the United States; and among those who voted for it are many gentlemen, leaders of the Republican party, who are now members of this House. Where will these gentlemen stand to-day when the vote is taken? Will they so vote that the record will show they proved faithful to their plighted honor and their solemn oaths to support the Constitution; or will they prove that they have been recreant to their duty?

This is not simply a question of policy. By the adoption of this amendment you are also stripping us of our political power; you are stripping us of our representation in this House. By the Constitution, our representation in this House depends upon the slave population of the State, and if you carry out this scheme you will deprive us of two members of Congress. Thus you propose to violate, in a vital particular, the compact into which the States entered.

When the constitutional compact was assailed by armed treason, you called upon us to come forward to assist in the suppression of the resistance to the Constitution and the laws. We responded to that call. We sent forward our men and contributed our means, relying on the pledges which you gave us that those men and means would be used only for the maintenance of the Constitution and the restoration of the Union, and that you would not invade any of the constitutional rights of the States nor attempt to interfere with their domestic institutions. But, in spite of this pledge, you now propose to rob us of our property and our political rights. I appeal to the justice of this nation, I appeal to you as honest men, to comply with your constitutional obligations and your promises on this subject. If these outrages are to be perpetrated upon us, let mesay that instead of putting an end to this war you will protract it, and instead of putting an end to these troubles you will multiply them a thousand fold. Then, instead of making friends you will only make enemies, and lose many friends you now have.

I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that we would stand together as brothers, that the rights of each State would have been respected, that the Constitution would not have been infringed. But such I am grieved to say has not been the case. It is now proposed to deprive the master of his slave without compensation. It is wrong in every point of view. He, the master, has the same right to his slave that he has to any other kind of property whatever. It is protected by the Constitution of the United States as well as by the State laws. And it is no small matter to undertake to deprive the people of Kentucky of all of their slave property. You propose to take all that many of them have in the way of property, and then to call upon them for taxes and for their quota of troops to carry on this war. Kentucky has supplied her share of taxes and troops willingly heretofore, as willingly as any other State of this Union. What will be the necessary result if these proposed outrages be perpetrated upon her citizens? When you have taken all they have, you cannot expect taxes; nor can you expect them willingly to fight a war for the purpose of taking away from them their slave property.

I do not want you, Mr. Speaker, to understand me as advocating the rebel cause. The rebels have had nothing to do with this question. It is a question between the General Government and a loyal State, and not a rebel State. It is in that light that I am discussing it. As between the Government and the rebels I take, as I have done all along, the part of the Government.

Carry out the policy which it is now proposed to be inaugurated, and this will be only the beginning of a series of outrages. The whole frame of the Government will be changed. You will have revolutionized the Government to which you try to compel the rebels to yield submission. You go to war to restore the Union and yet change the organic, fundamental laws of the Union. You whip the rebels back into the Union, and yet when they are whipped back the old Union has departed. Is it not a strange anomaly? I want the Constitution and the Union as they were.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard it contended that there is no such thing as independent States. Let us go back a little. When the thirteen colonies belonged to Great Britain—I mean the original thirteen—they were independent of each other.

They belonged only to Great Britain. When they threw off dependence to the mother country they were free and independent to all intents and purposes, and were so recognized by the world. They formed a Confederacy of States, and that not working well they concluded to establish this Union. What followed? I need not go to the debates of the Convention to show that this is a Union of independent States. The Constitution itself said that whenever it was ratified by nine out of the thirteen States it should be binding, not upon the thirteen, but only upon the nine.

There was no power to be exercised, nor could there be, for forcing the reluctant States into the Union. This is not a consolidated Government, but a confederation of independent States. The Constitution of the United States is the bond of the Union. It is the contract by which the States agreed to form a Government for themselves. It is a limited Government. The Constitution declares that the powers not vested in this Government are reserved to the States and to the people. We have, therefore, none but delegated powers, and when we undertake to go beyond them our acts are null and void. You have no more right to change the fundamental law in reference to slavery, being one of the reserved rights of the States, than you have in reference to anything else, and if you do it you do it by force and force alone.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why did this House repeal the fugitive slave law? Had it a bearing upon any other State than Kentucky? Certainly not. Had not Kentucky stood the fast friend of the Union? Was she not loyal and entitled to protection, and does not the Constitution declare that slaves fleeing from one State to another must be delivered up? That is the substance as well as the language of the Constitution—that the fugitives from labor shall be delivered up to their owners. Have you then dealt fairly with Kentucky? Why stab one of your sister loyal States? You know it was a stab at one of your own loyal States.

And why this great anxiety to overpower Kentucky? Mr. Speaker, this idea of restoring the Union has gotten out of your head. It has gone. You have departed from all the principles laid down by which you could conduct this thing properly; and now your acts would indicate that plunder and robbery were your main object. You are confiscating the negroes, as you call it. A military necessity, you say. You are leaving the farmers without any help whatever; and you are putting not all of them into the armies of the United States, but only a few of them. You have the remainder of them running about the country, paying them high wages, and making the people of the United States clothe and feed them.

And then you are taking others and what are you doing with them? You are running them off into the various other States, there to make servants of them just as they were from whence you took them. And such as nobody will have you are taking them away into camps, because they are not fit for servants. In my State is Camp Robinson, historic almost, because of its early location. It is built up almost like our cities, and indeed surpasses many of them, and even some of our capitals. It has water-works which supply it with water by a steam engine from the river; millions of dollars have been spent there, and you and I are taxed for all these things. Men high in position and receiving large salaries are doing nothing but superintending these camps. This is the way the people's money is squandered, and you legislate upon all these matters as though you had the right to do it.

All your arguments and all your homilies upon slavery I have heard. They are nothing but the distempered imagination of narrow minds, catering to the public opinion of a low and degraded constituency; nothing else. We ought to give them as much attention as the advice of a pauper picked up in the streets of London would receive in regard to the financial affairs of the Barings or the Rothschilds, who cannot keep a sixpence in his pocket from morning to night.

You talk about slavery, and say you want to do us good by taking our slaves away from us. If you would march your armies into your northern cities, where men live in marble palaces, who make fortunes out of the people, and if you would seize the contents of their banks and distribute it among the poor, you would do more good than you would by letting those nabobs have it who eat their sumptuous dinners and drink their fine wines. If you are going to revolutionize society everywhere and do the greatest good, seize upon that property and divide it among those who are poor and needy.

The remarks of my friend from New York, [Mr. ODELL,] which I heard with regret, were a stab directly at the right to hold property. He is arraying the small number of slaveholders against the large number of non-slaveholders, and would rob the few to please the many.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KASSON obtained the floor, but yielded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire the question of postponement to be put at the present time?

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would be as well to clear the Calendar of those bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on concurring in the report of the committee recommending the indefinite postponement of these bills.

The report was concurred in.

DELAWARE VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, before the adjournment for the holidays I offered a resolution, which was adopted, directing the Secretary of War to inform the Senate in reference to the authority under which he had called into the public service volunteers for thirty and for twenty days. He has not replied to that resolution. I hold, sir, that the Secretary of War and every member of the Cabinet is subject to the order of the American Senate. He has not replied, and I now move you, sir, that he be again directed to inform the Senate in reference to the matters inquired of by that resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's motion will be in the nature of a resolution, which he will prepare and offer.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Very well, sir.

The resolution having been subsequently prepared, was submitted by Mr. SAULSBURY, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to answer a resolution of the Senate of December 22, 1864, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate whether volunteers for thirty days and for one hundred days were called for by order of his Department, at any time preceding the last two drafts in the State of Delaware, from that State, and if so, for what purpose, and under what authority of law; whether such volunteers were promised as an inducement to volunteer exemption from said drafts; whether said volunteers were exempted from said drafts when they volunteered; whether they were kept within the limits of said State; and whether they were promised, as a further inducement to volunteer, that they should not be sent without the limits of said State, or that they should not be employed in active service in the field."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I think the resolution had better lie over.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark in this connection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the resolution is objected to, it is not the subject-matter of debate, but must go over under the rule.

FRANKLIN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. DIXON. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a memorial of the Franklin Insurance Company of Washington, have directed me to report a bill, and I ask that it be acted on at this time, as it is a matter of some importance to the public.

The bill (S. No. 384) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved the 2d of March, 1838, was by unanimous consent read three times, and passed. It proposes to extend and continue in force the act of 1838 for the period of twenty years from the 9th of April, 1858, the time at which the amended act expired, and to legalize and make valid all proceedings had by the company and all legal rights accrued or acquired, and all legal obligations entered into by the company between the 9th of April, 1858, and the date of this act.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, without amendment, and also to report back the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, with sundry amendments. I move that these two appropriation bills be postponed until to-morrow, at one o'clock, after the morning hour, and be made the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They must first be taken up by the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that they be taken up, so that they may be made the special order, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill first.

Mr. GRIMES. Give notice that you will call them up; that is enough.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to take up at this time the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill just reported by him. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator now moves that it be postponed until to-morrow, at one o'clock, and be made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senators present concurring therein.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio also asks consent to proceed to the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill. The Chair hears no objection. The Senator now moves to postpone the bill until to-morrow, at one o'clock, and make it the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to by a two-thirds vote.

INSANE ASYLUM.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 644) to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia, have directed me to report it back with an amendment. If there be no objection, as it is a small matter, I should like to have it acted on at this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that civilians employed in the service of the United States in the quartermaster's department and subsistence department of the Army, who may be or may hereafter become insane while in such employment, shall be admitted, on the order of the Secretary of War, to the same as persons belonging to the Army and Navy, to the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia, as provided in other cases by the fourth section of the act to organize an institution for the insane of the Army and Navy, and of the District of Columbia in said District, approved March 3, 1855.

The amendment was in line three before the word "civilians" to insert "during the continuance of the rebellion."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER J. ATOTCHA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no unfinished business of the morning hour; the business of the morning hour has transpired; and there is no special order for to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate bill No. 281. It is a private bill that was before the Senate some time since, and was laid aside on the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHANDLER.] I have conversed with him on the subject, and he authorized me to say that he had examined the bill and he had no objection to its passage.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atotcha.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 597) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. SHERMAN. One of the bills that I reported to-day is somewhat lengthy, and will not be likely to excite discussion, and it is not necessary to print it. If it is the pleasure of the Senate therefore, as there does not seem to be much business before it, I move to reconsider my motion to postpone the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, and ask that it be taken up and acted upon now.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that is done, I wish to make an explanation. I had expected to proceed this morning with the consideration of the resolution reported by me from the Committee on Foreign Relations to terminate the reciprocity treaty; but an appeal has been made to me by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] that it may be put off until to-morrow, as he wishes to be heard on the question. I have consented to put it off with great reluctance, but from an indisposition to disoblige him I wish that he should have the opportunity of being heard upon it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the indulgence of the Senator from Ohio to take up a bill for the purpose of making it a special order before his motion is put. It is House bill No. 307, which was made the special order for Wednesday of last week. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] has informed me that he will be ready to go on with the discussion of that bill next Monday. I move, therefore, to take up the bill for the purpose of making it the special order for Monday next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States; and its further consideration was postponed to, and made the special order of the day for, Monday next, at one o'clock, two thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, was postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock, and made the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator now asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until next Friday; and I will state that there is a proposition to amend the bill in an important respect that is now pending before the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce have had it under consideration, and, I am permitted to state, have addressed the Secretary of State for his views upon it. If the action of the Committee on Commerce is not favorable to the proposition that I make, I shall abandon it; if it is favorable, I hope the Senate will accede to it; and with that view I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until next Friday.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Senator has mentioned the matter to me, I will state that I understand the Committee on Commerce did act on his proposition last year, thoroughly examined it, and decided against it; and I do not think, under the circumstances, that he ought to ask a postponement of a general appropriation bill simply to increase the salary of a single consul. I am told by a Senator who served on that committee that it was fully considered at the last session of Congress and acted on and rejected. As the composition of the committee is precisely the same at the present session, that probably will be the result of the present examination. These consular salaries are all paid in gold; consequently, there is no argument based on the depreciation of the currency which would change the condition of affairs in the present year from the last. Under these circumstances I think we had better put the bill on its passage.

Mr. HALE. Then I will make the motion and suggest what is proper to be suggested in open Senate upon it. The proposition that I make is to increase the salary of the consul at Halifax, Nova Scotia, to $4,000. I will move it now. I think it should come in at the end of the sixty-sixth line of the bill.

Mr. FOOT. What is the present compensation?

Mr. HALE. The present compensation is $2,000.

Mr. President, there are a great many considerations that would govern the action of the Senate in this respect of a personal character, relating to the consul himself, which could with much more propriety be stated to the committee than they could in open Senate. The fact that the committee decided against the proposition last year I think will not be conclusive of it this year, for the same committee, as I am informed, and the two Houses followed it, did recommend a similar increase in regard to the consul at Nassau owing to the increased duties and responsibilities of the consulate at that port growing out of the rebellion that now exists in the country.

Halifax at the present time is the great depot for southern commerce on the Atlantic ocean. It has been full of blockade runners constantly; it is their great resort; and the consul is constantly and vigilantly and vigorously employed all the time. In my humble judgment it is of more consequence to have this Government properly represented at Halifax at this time, during the rebellion, than it is in three fourths of the kingdoms of Europe. Our consular agent there has more to do, more duties to perform than, I venture to say, the ministers of the United States at three fourths of the places where we support a foreign minister. He is paid $2,000 a year, out of which he has to pay his own house rent, clerk hire, and his messenger and porter. No allowance is made by the Government except simply for office rent. I need not say to the Senate, because they know it very well, that the usefulness of a representative of the Government depends in some degree upon the manner in which he is supported. You throw him into society, you constantly subject him to intercourse with the representative of the Crown there, officially and socially; and it seems to me it is poor economy for the Government to require its representative in such a port to live in a manner that a gentleman thus situated ought not to live. But I am trespassing on ground which I did not wish to occupy.

I called upon the Secretary of State after a recent visit to Halifax, and represented the state of the case to him; he suggested to me the reference of it to the Committee on Commerce, and said that if the Committee on Commerce would refer it to him, as they probably would, he would give the subject an investigation and be prepared to give a recommendation. Accordingly, at the earliest moment, I did introduce a resolution; it was referred to the Committee on Commerce; the Committee on Commerce have addressed the Secretary of State upon it, and will probably receive an answer from him in season to take action at their next meeting, which will take place on Thursday. I do not want to expose the private affairs of such a gentleman as this consul, in the Senate; and if I cannot make a case to the Committee on Commerce, on which they will unanimously recommend an increase, (if not exactly the one I propose, something like it,) I will not trouble the Senate again; but if the Committee on Commerce, upon examination of the subject, shall think that there ought to be an increase made, I trust the Senate will repose confidence enough in their judgment to follow it on this subject. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until next Friday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the amendment is not in order under the rules, unless it comes from a committee, involving, as it does, an appropriation; and as it will be my duty to make that objection on all similar amendments, I feel bound to do it now. If under the circumstances the Senate think proper to postpone the bill until Thursday or Friday, very well. My impression is, considering the action of the last year, that the Senate will scarcely increase the salaries of consuls abroad. There are many arguments in favor of an increase of the compensation of employes at home that do not apply to employes abroad. This matter was very fully considered at the last session of Congress; an application was made on behalf of this very consul, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and also to the Committee on Commerce, and I believe reported adversely upon by both committees. It is scarcely probable that the Senate will change its action from any new lights we have before us now. It is my duty to object to the amendment now offered, because under the rules it is not in order, on the ground that it has not been reported from any committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I recollect this case, and I recollect the general fact in regard to this class of cases. There was a very general application last year for an increase of consular salaries, and we reported against them all with one or two exceptions, and those exceptions were founded upon some peculiarities of the cases. In the case which has been mentioned at Nassau the duties had been very largely increased, and the expenses of living had also been very largely increased. My recollection is, however, that there was nothing peculiar in this case to distinguish it from the great majority of cases where an increase of salary had been asked for, and the Committee on Commerce came to the conclusion that there was no good reason in this case which did not apply to the vast majority of cases.

I think that was the state of the facts last year. I do not understand the Senator from New Hampshire to change that relation which it bore to the general class, by any statement of new facts existing. From what I know of that port I should doubt whether the facts were susceptible of changing that relation. It did not appear, I believe, last year that the expenses of living at that port had been particularly increased. That the duties had been somewhat increased is undoubtedly true, but not very largely increased. There is a very general demand throughout for an increase of pay in the consular service, and in ordinary times I am inclined to think that the demand might be reasonable; but the committee adopted as a rule, on which they were very inflexible last year, that unless for particular reasons shown they would not recommend an increase of salary; and I say to the Senator from New Hampshire that unless he is quite sure that he can make out a very strong case, unless this case is peculiar in its character, I doubt whether he will succeed in getting a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from New Hampshire is of the opinion that this case is peculiar, and he asks to be heard before the Committee on Commerce in relation to it. In private conversation with me I thought he made out a strong case, and I told him there would be no objection to his being heard before the committee. I do not ask for a postponement of this bill in order to consider this particular case; but still, as he represents it, and as the facts were presented by him to me, it was a case very similar to that of the consul at Nassau, whose salary was raised from $2,000 to $4,000 without a dissenting voice in that committee.

If this case should, upon examination, appear to be similar to that, I have no doubt the committee would recommend an increase. The facts are unknown to me further than they are presented by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The impression of the Chair is that the amendment suggested at this time is not in order, unless it be moved in pursuance of the direction of a committee or the recommendation of the head of a Department, inasmuch as it would increase the appropriation. The motion to postpone the bill until Friday, however, is in order.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone it for the purpose of getting the action of the committee on the subject.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to reconsider the vote postponing the action on the deficiency bill until to-morrow, and to take it up now. My motion to postpone it was based on the fact that I understood there was a special assignment for today; but it seems I was mistaken in that, and I think we may as well act on the bill now.

Mr. GRIMES. Has it been printed?

Mr. SHERMAN. The House bill has been printed, and there are not many amendments.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was to insert after line twenty, on page 2:

To supply a deficiency for the compensation of clerks in the Denver branch mint, $450.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the one just adopted, the following:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the branch mint at San Francisco, $134,889 68.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines thirty-four to thirty-seven, as follows:

For the support and maintenance of the convicts transferred from the District of Columbia, at such place or places as may be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause from lines one hundred and two to one hundred and fourteen:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employes, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for the purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; but no payment shall be made under this provision to any other persons than the clerks, officers, and other employes of the House and the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out from lines one hundred and thirty-nine to one hundred and forty-three, as follows:

For salary of the commissioner for codifying the naval laws, under joint resolution of March 3, 1865, from July 1, 1864, to March 3, 1865, $2,025.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the bill:

Navy Department, Bureau of Navigation:
For binnacle, binnacle lamps, and alidades; for bunting, muslin, and sewing materials for ensigns, jacks, distinctive flags and marks, signal flags, and foreign flags, and for making flags of all kinds; for logs, log lines, log reels, log slates, log paper, log books, and sand glasses; for leads, lead reels, lead lines, armings for leads, and sounding cups; and for signal apparatus other than signal flags, $125,000.
For freight and transportation of navigation materials, instruments, books, and stores; for postage on public letters; for the telegraphing of proposals; for packing-boxes and material; for blank-books, forms, and stationery at navigation office; for maps, drawings, models; and for incidental expenses not applicable to any other appropriation, $3,000.

For the purchase of nautical and astronomical instruments, nautical books, maps, and charts; and for repairs of instruments; and for binding and backing books and charts, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add:

Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:
For fuel for the Navy, and for the transportation and expenses thereof, $5,347,400.
For equipments of vessels, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add:

Bureau of Provisions and Clothing:
For provisions, $1,500,000.
For clothing, $700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Agriculture have instructed me to offer the following amendment to come in on page 5, after line one hundred and one:

For the expenses incurred in sending Joseph A. Wright as Commissioner of the United States to the International exhibition at Hamburg, Germany, in the year 1863, $5,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot object to this amendment in point of order, because it comes from a committee; but it is proper for me to state that Congress refused to send a commissioner to the fair named after a struggle of some duration, and notwithstanding that Mr. Wright, formerly a member of this body, well known to us all, did go, and I have no doubt performed valuable services. That is the whole of the case. Whether under the circumstances it is now proper to appropriate for that which was refused beforehand is a question for the Senate. I have no doubt that Mr. Wright, whom we all esteem highly, rendered efficient services to the Government, and that his services were valuable to the country; but the fact still stands that Congress refused to appropriate money for this purpose before the fair took place, and, notwithstanding our refusal, this commissioner went or was sent, and we are now asked to pay him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio if it was not the express understanding that no compensation or expenses were to be allowed by Congress when this appointment was made and accepted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know of no such understanding. I do not know anything about how that may have been. I know that Congress refused to appropriate money for this purpose, and notwithstanding that refusal, Mr. Wright did go and rendered this service. Whether he had any understanding with the executive department is more than I can tell.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My recollection is that the debate indicated clearly that no compensation was to be allowed. This gentleman, however distinguished he may have been, or whatever service he may have performed, did so with a full knowledge of the express as well as the implied understanding that there should be no compensation allowed from the Treasury.

Mr. HARLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire who appointed Governor Wright, whether he really received any appointment, or whether he went voluntarily; whether it is anything more than voluntary service rendered by a distinguished citizen of the country now coming in and claiming pay for it by the Government of the United States, when the Government, on consideration of the subject, refused to appropriate money for that purpose.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that the President requested him to go there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can inform the Senator from Illinois, if he desires information, that Mr. Wright was undoubtedly appointed by the President or requested by the President to go, and the President has sent a message to Congress asking us to pay this money. There is no doubt about this; the message can be readily referred to. Indeed, quite a report on the subject was made to Congress by Mr. Wright, and the President has submitted to Congress the propriety of paying him for his services, at the same time commending very highly the services rendered. He went by virtue of an appointment from the President, perhaps in a Government vessel, though as to that I am not advised. At any rate, he went on the express appointment of the President in the ordinary form.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Ohio be kind enough to refer me to the provision of law under which he was appointed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Ah!

Mr. SUMNER. I can make an explanation. I should not have said anything on this question if the yeas and nays had not been ordered. I have a great respect for Governor Wright, and I do not doubt that he rendered excellent service to the cause which he represented at this agricultural exhibition. His report on the subject is an important document; I have read it with great interest and instruction; but I cannot forget, sir, that when he went there, so far as I am informed, he went as a private citizen, without any national appointment. It is within my recollection that I reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations a resolution appropriating a certain sum for this very purpose. My resolution was voted down. At a later day in the session I brought it forward in another form on an appropriation bill. There again it was voted down, and my impression is that I brought it forward still a second time on an appropriation bill, so that the Senate acted upon it once, twice, if not three times. I was sorry at the time that I was unable to convince the Senate of the expediency of the appropriation, but I am obliged to recognize the fact that no such appropriation was made. When I saw by the papers afterward that Governor Wright had embarked on this mission I regarded it as a purely private enterprise to which I supposed he was encouraged by some of the agricultural societies of the country, and if anything was to be paid I supposed it was to be paid by them. These are the facts, and on these facts—

Mr. COLLAMER. The President appointed him.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Vermont reminds me of a further fact, that the President appointed him; but appointed him to what, and in pursuance of what authority? The President can only act, I suppose, according to law. I have already shown that there was no law applicable to this matter. The appointment was not diplomatic or consular. If either one or the other, then of course it would have been provided for in one of our appropriation bills, and the President would have been authorized to fill the place; but being neither consular nor diplomatic, I do not see that the President had any more authority to send an agent there than any member of this body, or than any private association. In one word, whatever was done was a private transaction, not in any respect involving the Government, and I do not think that we are now responsible.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, the fact stated by several Senators that the Senate heretofore refused to make an appropriation for this purpose, it seems to me ought not to conclude the subject. Before services were rendered the Senate refused to pay for those services. The services have since been rendered; and, as is admitted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the services were valuable to the country. Now, sir, the services having been rendered, and having been valuable, so admitted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and by other Senators who have spoken, it seems to me eminently just that we should pay for them.

It is a trivial matter; it was supposed to be for the advantage of the agricultural and mechanical interests of the country that our products should be fairly represented at the World's Fair; and the President, as I think with great propriety, sent a gentleman eminently qualified for this position to represent our interests at Hamburg, from which our artisans and agriculturists have derived great credit, and will doubtless ultimately reap great profit. Now, when it proposed that this agent of the Government, sent by the President, shall receive the expenses incurred by him on this mission, it is opposed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

If it were a proposition to increase the appropriations for building light-houses, or for commuting dues claimed in Europe imposing slight burdens on commerce, I doubt not it would receive his support; but being a simple matter for the advantage of agriculture he can see no merit in it, he can see no advantage to be derived from it, and no justice in defraying the expenses from the public Treasury. I confess I feel a little astonished at the Senator. We are appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars to build light-houses, for whom? For the advantage of commerce. We are appropriating large sums of money at his suggestion to remove burdens on commerce in Europe, for which the commercial interests alone ought to be made responsible, as I think. And when it is asked that an agent sent to Europe to represent the agricultural interests shall be paid his expenses, the Senator rises in his seat very gravely and says that he supposes the agricultural societies of the country ought to pay the bill! I submit that the merchants of the country ought to build the light-houses, and ought to pay the expenses of the improvements of harbors and the cost of commuting dues assessed on our commerce abroad, if equal justice is to be meted out and his views on this subject are to be indorsed by the Senate.

Technically I know this gentleman has no claim on the Government. If it had been authorized by law and an appropriation had been made in advance, there would have been no necessity for the adoption of this amendment. It is because there was no appropriation made heretofore that I now offer this amendment to meet the exigency which has arisen. We have sent a man abroad to represent the great agricultural and mechanical pursuits of this country at a World's Fair; he went with a commission issued by the President of the United States; he was recognized there as the representative of this nation in that convention, and, as we are told by Senators here, he discharged the duties incumbent on him with ability, and our agricultural and mechanical interests have derived great credit from his services, and it is now proposed by the Committee on Agriculture that we shall meet his expenses. This is the whole case, and I confess I feel some astonishment that it should meet with opposition on this floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I agree entirely in what has been said by the honorable Senator from Iowa, except perhaps in the sharpness of his strictures toward the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, although I must say that I think they were deserved, too; but the Senator from Iowa has manifested more courage in applying them than I could have if I had been in his place.

I believe that this appropriation should be made. Without detailing what transpired in the Committee on Finance where the case was heard, I undertake to say that a similar statement made here to that which was made there, would secure the appropriation without any considerable opposition. I will state in addition to what has been said by the honorable Senator from Iowa that one of the results of this mission was the establishment there, where the commissioner went, of an institution for the collection and preservation of articles of American mechanical production. That institution has been established by the Germans, to be maintained and conducted by them, in which articles of American manufacture in the mechanic arts are to be preserved and exhibited through all time.

The point made by the Senator from Iowa seems to me to have great force in it. If the appropriation had been made by law in advance, pursuant to which this commissioner was appointed and sent abroad, of course no question would remain to be determined. I do not feel like raising a question as to the power of the President to send this commissioner there. I believe that it was an eminently judicious act; I believe that the selection was well made; and I believe that the compensation now proposed to be paid is inconsiderable compared with the advantages realized to the country, and I hope that the appropriation will be made. I may say, however, that I am still in favor of light-houses being built by the Government, and dues commuted, and so on. I believe that the Government cannot do too much in those directions.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I am unwilling even for one moment to be left in the position in which my honorable friend from Iowa seems disposed to leave me. He holds me up as standing in the way of an appropriation for the benefit of agriculture, and reminds the Senate that I am assiduous in favor of appropriations for light-houses. I am ready to follow the Senator in any appropriation which he will show to be legitimate in favor of agriculture. Was I not the original author of the very proposition he now seeks to sustain? I reported it from the committee which I represent on this floor; I urged its passage once, twice, and I think even three times. I was voted down; the Senate was against making any such appropriation, and I submitted. The law then did not sanction the appropriation, and of course, therefore, it did not sanction any appointment with a view to compensation.

I do not say that the President may not designate an eminent citizen to go abroad and visit agricultural exhibitions. He may, and so may any Senator on this floor, designate an eminent citizen, and ask him to go abroad, but it is a private designation; it is not sustained by law; and I am at a loss how my honorable friend from Iowa, who is usually so economical, and always so clear-sighted, can justify at this moment an appropriation which has not for its basis any original sanction of law. If this question had not been carefully considered by the Senate on former occasions and in advance, if they had not decided against the appropriation, I should feel that possibly there was a certain opening for my excellent friend; but as the whole question was, on a former occasion, amply considered and voted upon, I do not see what opening there is now for asking the Senate to make an appropriation which it originally refused to sanction.

Mr. COLLAMER. I fancy that very few weeks pass over the Senate in which we do not make grants to pay money which the law has not before authorized. Almost every private claim which comes before us arises from something which has been done for which there was no legal provision. Frequently a man having done public service cannot get his pay because there is no appropriation to meet it, and that is the general character of a large class of private claims.

If we were to insist on the principle and doctrine that because there had not been a legal provision for such cases we were never to allow them, we might as well dismiss all consideration of private claims. So much for the general principle.

I acknowledge that I do not like the looks of things, when, after having had the subject before them, the Senate have refused to authorize a thing, and then the President makes an appointment to do the thing which the Senate have refused to authorize. On the first impression it looks like a want of courtesy; but that is all there is of it. The President still has the power to make appointments, and he may trust to the generosity, if you please, or the sense of justice of Congress to make the appropriation. Now, the result of this mission to Hamburg has been so marked, so beneficial in its consequences to the section of country in which I live, that I cannot think it proper to let the subject entirely drop without any remarks of mine upon it.

For many years our people had been in the habit of going to Europe—to Spain, to France, to Germany, as well as to England—for the purpose of obtaining breeds to improve their sheep, and to improve the condition of the wool-growing interest of the country, a very important interest. Great sums of money had been expended in that way; great numbers of different varieties of sheep had been from time to time imported into this country; but I need not go into that history. American ingenuity and enterprise, improving upon these materials which they had obtained from Europe, in point of fact finally produced a character of sheep, of wool-growing animals, which was of superior order to any in Europe. In the region from which I come we had known this for several years, but the whole people of the United States did not know it. The people of California did not know it. It is true they had begun to send to New England for sheep, and to take them from thence to California; but they did it, not because they thought it better than to go to Europe for them, although they had been to Europe for some, but because it was easier for them.

This improved breed of sheep, improved upon by American enterprise and American ability, were carried to the Hamburg fair. They there came in competition with the best breeds of Europe—flocks brought in by their nobility from all the different parts of Germany, from Spain, from France, and from Holland—and on full and fair investigation, under the supervision of this commissioner, it was there decided that those sheep, carried indeed from Vermont, were superior to any sheep on earth. It was so decided in Europe by their own committees. The sheep were taken from Vermont, and were sold by Mr. Campbell in Europe after that decision. Though that flock went from Vermont, it is not true that that kind of sheep is confined to Vermont. They are to be found all over New England, and they are getting West now much more than they were formerly.

Americans were then informed by European decisions, "You need not send to Europe any more after sheep to improve your breeds; you have got the best at home." Now, I undertake to declare that there have been thousands, and I will not hesitate to say hundreds of thousands of dollars saved to this country by that very decision; preserved here instead of being sent to Europe. To be sure, you may say that fabulous prices have been and are being given. It is not an uncommon thing now in New England to sell a single buck for $2,000 for the purpose of carrying him to California or to the West. Whole flocks of the first quality of ewes are sold for two or three hundred dollars a head, entirely for the purpose of breeding and improving the condition of the sheep of the country. That money formerly used to go to Europe, but it is now saved in the country; and it is saved, as I may say, as the result of this very mission to the Hamburg fair.

Such having been the consequences in my part of the country, I could not think it my duty to let it drop as being a thing that did not call for some recognition. The services have been rendered; they were undoubtedly valuable; and though we did not order the thing to be done, inasmuch as it has been done, and well done, I think it better to pay for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I do not understand this to be a question whether we shall pay a few thousand dollars for the benefit of the agricultural interest of the country or for valuable services rendered in an exigency which had not been foreseen, and no payment therefor been previously authorized by law. If it were either of those questions, I should find no difficulty in voting for it. I understand it to be a question totally different. It is in effect this: if a given subject, which is not within the sphere of executive action, be brought before Congress where it properly belongs, and Congress in their wisdom or want of wisdom (whichever it may have been) refuse to take any action, can the Executive still go on in the face of that decision, accomplish the object, and lay the foundation of a claim which we ought to pay? I think not. The Executive ought not to do thus. I do not know that he has. I am sure that it would be setting a very vicious precedent if we were to make this appropriation.

What is the fact in this case? It has been perfectly correctly stated by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. An application was made to Congress for an appropriation for the purpose of representing this country at an agricultural fair in Europe. A resolution on the subject was sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was reported favorably. It came back to the Senate, and the chairman of the committee, representing the committee, urged the expediency of making an appropriation for the purpose asked. It was discussed very fully in this body. In view of the condition of the country at that time, the Senate did not deem it expedient to make the appropriation. We were in a state of war; we were accumulating daily an immense debt. It was thought an unpropitious time to vote even the sum of $5,000 to represent the agricultural interest of this country abroad; and after, as I say, a very full discussion of the question, the proposition was rejected. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] with his usual persistency when he is right, as he generally is, at least in his own estimation, and very frequently in the opinion of the Senate also, not satisfied with the rejection, again pressed it on an appropriation bill, having the authority of the committee for so doing, and it was again rejected; and I believe it was again offered and still again rejected.

I am not about to say that the honorable Senator from Iowa had not a right to complain of this, and representing, as he does to some extent, the farming interests of the country, I will not deny that he had a right to say, "Why, this is very narrow and illiberal to the most important interest of the country." I am not sure, however, that we had the aid of the honorable Senator's voice on that occasion. I forget how it was; but at all events, if we had his aid, we failed entirely to carry the proposition; it was lost. If he did not come to the rescue I am sorry for it, for with his aid I think we should probably have carried it; but whether we had it or not, the proposition was defeated.

In this condition of things, I ask, if the Executive has appointed an agent to go to Europe, and the bills for his salary or necessary expenses are brought here to Congress, and we refuse to pay, ought it to be said that we are inimical to the agricultural interest? No, sir, it is not a fair statement of the case. It is whether or not the legislative department of the country shall be independent of the Executive, or shall be controlled by and be subordinate to the Executive.

The honorable Senator from Iowa alludes to the matter of light-houses. Suppose there was a bill brought into this body to build a light-house which should be the means of lighting ships into the most important harbor of the country; that it was discussed here, and after full deliberation was voted down as at the time, at all events, not necessary, not a judicious thing to do; and that as soon as that had been done, the Treasury Department had gone on and built the light-house and sent the bills here to be paid: would anybody think that we were bound, out of regard to the commercial interests of the country, to vote an appropriation to pay those expenses? No, sir; and yet nobody would say there was hostility to the commercial interests because we refused, under those circumstances, to pay the expenses of building such a light-house. It was a legislative matter beyond doubt; and if, under certain circumstances and in an exigency, expenses had been incurred to erect a light-house, and the bill had been sent here with a request to have it paid, that would be another thing; perhaps it would be just and proper to pay it; but if the matter had been brought here in the outset, and it had been examined, and the judgment of the Senate and of Congress had been passed upon it that it ought not to be done, I submit that the executive department could not then properly do it, and we, with a proper sense of self-respect, and duty to the Constitution and to ourselves could not then pay it or authorize it to be paid.

Thus this matter now stands. It has been passed upon by the legislative department, passed upon beforehand; the case has been decided; and after that, executive action has been had contrary to the decision of Congress, and we, because the service is said to be valuable, are asked now to pay for it. I submit, Mr. President, that we have said, although the service might be valuable, we could not incur the expense; and under those circumstances propriety, every principle on which this Senate ought to act, requires us now to refuse to make this appropriation.

Mr. HOWE. I am going to vote for this amendment, and I desire to say that I am going to vote for it without the slightest regard to the question whether the services of Governor Wright in that convention were of value to one interest or another of this country, or to no interest. I do not know, in fact, what was the value of his services as an agent of the Government there. Whether he was there in the interest of agriculture in general, or the wool interest in particular, or whether he was there in the interest of the mechanical or manufacturing industry of the country, or whether he was there in the commercial interest as an agent of the Light-House Board, I do not stop to inquire at all. I am governed by the simple fact that he took a designation from the President of the United States, and went there in 1863 to represent the United States of America in a convention in which the United States of America would not have been represented if he had not gone there; and that of itself I think of great value to this country. It is a great gratification to my feelings to know that he was there at all events.

When the resolution referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts was before the Senate, proposing to provide for just such a mission and pay for it, I voted for it; and when the Senate refused to make that appropriation I regretted it. I knew that we were in the very morning of a struggle, the end of which was intended to put an end to this nationality. I hoped that it would terminate differently. I knew that the very purpose of the assault which was then made upon us was to end this nationality. I thought it was excellent policy for us to make believe we were a nationality even then. There was a congress of the nations, and I thought it was our business to take our seat there, and to keep the flag flying; and when this Senate refused to make an appropriation for that purpose I regretted it. I must say that, individually, I felt humiliated by it, more so than when our flag was pulled down from Fort Sumter. There was one place where the nations were represented, and where we did not take our seats. I wanted that we should appear everywhere.

I do not think the President overruled Congress or attempted to overrule Congress at all. Congress simply said, not that we would not be represented there, but that we would not make any appropriation. Whether that decision was arrived at from any doubt as to whether we were an existing nation or not, I shall not undertake to say. I presume it was not. They simply said that under existing circumstances they would not make an appropriation. The President never said you should. The President has simply sent an agent there to represent us. He has imposed no legal obligation upon the country to pay for those services. The question for us to determine is whether we are glad to have been represented there or not. If we are, I think we should make payment for it; and I am willing to make payment because of the mere fact of being represented there. I would vote for this simple appropriation if the President, instead of sending Governor Wright, had sent a photograph of the goddess of Liberty there—anything to represent this nation in that congress. That is what I am willing to pay for, and that is what I shall vote to pay for.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I can nearly always indorse the positions taken by the Senator from Connecticut, and nearly always concur with him in his conclusions when he carefully considers a subject. For once, however, I think his logic is at fault; and if he votes against this amendment, it will be on a pure question of etiquette between him and the President of the United States. I will take his own case to illustrate what I mean.

He says, suppose the President had proposed that a light-house should be built; Congress considers the subject, and refuses to make an appropriation to build it; and, I will add, afterwards commercial gentlemen unite and construct it, and it serves an excellent purpose; that guided by its friendly light, weather-worn mariners on the high seas make the port safely from month to month, and from year to year; it renders life and property on a dangerous coast more secure; it thus diminishes the cost of the international exchange of commodities, and proves to be of public utility; not advantageous alone to the liberal gentlemen who advanced the means in the beginning, but advantageous to the whole country, to the great commercial interests of the nation, and, indirectly, to all collateral interests, agriculture included. Suppose that a proposition is then made to return to these gentlemen the money they advanced to erect that light, would the Senator from Connecticut oppose it? Would he then say to the New England merchant, originally, when this enterprise was proposed, deeming that it would be worthless, I voted against it? The experiment has been made, and it proves to be of vast advantage to this great interest, and to the nation at large, but as I opposed it in the beginning, in the belief that it would be worthless, because I differed with the President and though experience has shown that the President was right and that I was wrong, I will adhere to the error.

That is substantially the case before the Senate. The President recommended that an appropriation be made to defray the expenses of a commissioner to this World's Fair. The subject was considered, and the appropriation was refused. Why refused? I must suppose not on account of obstinate opposition to the President, not because the President recommended it, but because the Senate supposed that it would be useless, that it would be worthless, or that the service would not be of sufficient advantage to the nation at large to justify the cost.

Mr. FOSTER. If the honorable Senator will pardon me a moment, I believe no one at the time urged that the service was not desirable, and might not, and probably would not, be valuable, but because of the condition of the country. The necessary daily expenses were so great that the expenditure of any sum which could possibly be avoided, although for a valuable purpose, ought to be. The same reason exists, of course, now.

Mr. HARLAN. Very well. If I understand the Senator, he now abandons his original position, and puts it on the ground of ability on the part of the Government to meet the expenses.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the ground on which it was put originally.

Mr. HARLAN. We are engaged in war; the expenses from day to day are very large; and we are unable to meet this small liability! I do not agree with the Senator in this. The nation is able to pay it. But I will return.

The President suggested that an appropriation should be made. The Senate refused it at the time. The services had not been rendered, and, as I was about suggesting, in the opinion of those who voted against it the services probably would not be valuable, or, if so, would be valuable only to a special interest, not of sufficient national importance to justify the appropriation, and therefore it was at the time refused. But the President, as I suppose, stated to this gentleman, "I will commission you to go abroad to represent the nation in this World's Fair; no appropriation has been made; you will have to go at your own expense; you will have to use your own means; if an appropriation shall hereafter be made by Congress, all well; and if not you will have to pocket the loss." The representative accepted the commission, defrays his own expenses, fulfills the mission, and all admit it resulted in securing great credit to American artisans and agriculturists, and in securing vast immediate and prospective pecuniary profit to these great interests. The Senate was mistaken, the Senate was wrong, and the President was right.

This is admitted all around. The recommendation of the President ought to have been adopted in the outset; but because we did not then believe he was right, and honestly thought that he was wrong, we will adhere to the error, confessing it to have been an error. We will not now admit that we erred by our votes, although all admit it in their speeches. The President believed this to be of national interest, of national importance, and commissioned this gentleman, although without pay; Congress believing at the time that it was not of national consequence, refused to provide means to defray the necessary expenses. In doing this the President violated no law and imposed on the country no legal liability to pay a dollar. And no one pretends that such legal liability exists. Congress may now assume it or not, as it chooses. Believing that the mission has resulted in consequences of vast pecuniary advantage to the nation, the Committee on Agriculture believe that the nation should pay the necessary expenses incurred by the commissioner.

The Senator from Massachusetts, however, attempted to evade the allusion I made to him by saying that he originally was in favor of this proposition, that he introduced it and voted for it. Then I beg to know why he abandons it now? Why should he commit an infanticide, why destroy his own offspring? He supported it when it emanated from himself; why should he oppose it when it emanates from a more humble source? Is it because of the present origin of the measure? As it seems to me, there is no better reason for his reverse of position. He supported it originally because he believed it was right; he now admits that it was right; that the nation has derived great advantage from it; that we have received a full equivalent and more too, a hundred times over, for all that we propose to appropriate; but because the Senate refused to approve it then when he proposed it, now he will oppose it when it emanates from a different source. I submit to him that this is his true logical position. If the measure was right when proposed by him, it is right when proposed by the Committee on Agriculture, and if he will be consistent with himself he must vote for the proposition now which he sustained then.

Mr. DAVIS. I range myself on this particular question with the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senate will do me the justice to say that I do not do it from any sympathy with him. [Laughter.] The very consideration that induces the Senator from Wisconsin to sustain the measure is the identical one upon which I oppose it.

I was on the Committee on Foreign Relations when this measure was recommended to the adoption of the committee by the sanction of the President of the United States, and upon the special letter written by the diplomatic agent from the country in which the Fair was about to be held. I thought that the agency ought to be established, and that the agent should be sent. I sustained the proposition in committee and I voted for it in the Senate; and I well recollect the persistence and ability with which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations repeatedly urged it in the Senate. It was voted down upon the considerations suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. I thought the considerations were too small to interfere with the sending of such an agent, and having such a representative as this country should have in a Fair to be held in Germany; but the Senate thought otherwise. They expressly and pointedly refused to make the appropriation. That was their deliberate judgment and action; and after they had taken that position, the President, in defiance of that position of the Senate, and in defiance of its purpose not to incur the expenses of such an agency as this, nevertheless persisted in appointing the agent.

My friend from Wisconsin says that if a daguerreotype likeness had been sent by the President to that fair he would have voted for the appropriation. I so understood him; I may be mistaken.

Mr. HOWE. Not of himself, but of the goddess of liberty.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not say of himself. I would rather have the likeness of the goddess of liberty than the President's. It would be much more comely and attractive, that is certain. [Laughter.]

But the very reason that prompts the Senator from Wisconsin to give this appropriation his support induces me to go against it. I never would, at any time, under any Administration, or under the sanction of any President that ever presided over the Government of this country, vote for an appropriation to a matter to which the Senate had withheld its approbation when the President in defiance of that approbation, and upon his will sought to carry it out. I do not do this for the intrinsic importance of this small affair; very far from it. I was an earnest advocate of the appropriation at the time that it was proposed, and I regretted its failure; but this is a precedent of infinitely more evil than any good resulting from the agency, or all the results of our representation in that fair. We all know that precedent becomes law; that precedent becomes an institution; that precedent changes law; that precedent changes constitutional provision; that precedent subverts the fundamental principles of government itself, and it is just such precedent as this promises to be, and as it is. The executive branch of the Government in its head and in its heads of Departments has ad libitum upon its own pleasure created from time to time offices according to its own judgment or caprice or purpose to corrupt, and in addition to that it has attached to and given such pay and salaries to these officers as it pleased, by its own authority, in defiance of the legislative will of Congress, and in defiance of the limitations imposed upon executive power and discretion by the Constitution.

It is not only in this matter, but thousands of other matters, that this President has contemned and trampled upon the authority of Congress to create offices and to establish the pay and salary for those offices, and has also trampled upon the restrictions and prohibitions of the Constitution that prevented him and his department from creating offices and fixing their pay and salaries. All these matters and principles pertain to the legislative department of the Government, and they ought to be strictly maintained and defended by that department as a part of its own exclusive legislative power under the Constitution. Whenever the President in this matter or any other impinges on this principle, and the peculiar and distinctive province and prerogative of Congress, it is, in my judgment, much more important to rebuke him and to put down the President than to secure any temporary good which the object to which he had thus abused his power might lead.

Mr. President, I may make these remarks for another consideration. This agent is an old friend of mine. I have a very high personal regard for him. I would regret if he should lose anything personally; but I know that my opposition to the measure will not prejudice him or it, but will rather have an effect, if it has any effect whatever, to help along its passage. I shall be very much disappointed if the Senate does not pocket the usurpation of power which the President has practiced upon the present occasion, and if it should have the independence now to rebuke and repudiate that President and that usurpation of power.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if I were to consult my personal feelings alone, I should vote for this proposition. However much I may disagree with the political principles or position of Mr. Wright, of Indiana, my personal intercourse with him was always of the most agreeable and friendly character. I found him a kind-hearted gentleman, agreeable to all his associates. If this was a mere appropriation to him, and I had the authority to vote it, I certainly would vote for it, because I know of no man in the opposition ranks in this country whom I would more cheerfully vote to pay than I would Mr. Wright. But I think the honorable Senator from Kentucky has placed this question upon its true grounds, and I shall be governed by the argument which he has made. I am compelled, therefore, to vote against an allowance to a friend whom I esteem, simply because I have not the power or authority to vote in his favor.

Mr. POMEROY. I should not have said anything but for the yeas and nays being called, and I now merely desire to state that I shall vote against this allowance with a great deal of reluctance. I shall do it principally because this arrangement was entered into with the understanding that there was to be nothing paid. We had a full discussion of this matter here, and reasons were urged for and against the measure by several Senators, in which I took at least a very small part. I say this arrangement was entered into with the understanding, as I think, that if this service was rendered there should be no appropriation by the Government, and I do not think we should come in at this late day and seek an appropriation when it was decided by three successive votes that there would be no appropriation made. I shall vote against it simply because I believe that that was the understanding, that was the sentiment disclosed by the votes of Congress, if they have any instruction at all; and that certainly was their vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 8, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Collamer, Conness, Foot, Harlan, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Ramsey, and Riddle—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Henderson, Morgan, Pomeroy, Richardson, Slausbury, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Doolittle, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to offer an amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to come in at the end of the bill:

For a gold medal to Cornelius Vanderbilt, pursuant to the joint resolution approved January 28, 1864, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed; and it was ordered that the bill be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the annual report of the board of visitors to the Naval Academy for 1864.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that the usual number of copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred. Under the rule the motion to print goes to the Committee on Printing. The report is not from a Department.

Mr. GRIMES. It is the report of the board of visitors to the Naval Academy, which ought properly to have accompanied the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the order to print will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say in connection with what I have said that the reason why it did not accompany that report was because it had not been received at the time the annual report was made to the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business, and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, January 10, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. T. R. Howlett. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MILITARY ARRESTS.

Mr. KERNAN, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and the same is, directed to inquire and report to the House what legislation or action, if any, is necessary to secure to persons arrested and imprisoned by military authority a prompt examination into the cause of their arrest, and their discharge if there be no adequate cause for their detention, and a speedy trial where there is such cause.

GUNBOAT FOR LIBERIA.

Mr. SPALDING asked unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for the purpose of action thereon, a bill (S. No. 356) to authorize the President of the United States to transfer a gunboat to the Government of Liberia.

Mr. COX objected.

W. J. HARDING.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of W. J. Harding, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ESTABLISHMENT OF STEAM WHISTLES.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Naval Committee be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing steam whistles at Cape Elizabeth, Matineus Rock, Quoddy Head, for the benefit of the naval and mercantile shipping of the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. Hickey, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed House bill No. 644, to extend to certain persons in the employ of the Government the benefits of the Asylum for the Insane in the District of Columbia, with an amendment, and bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 281) for the relief of Alexander J. Atocha;

An act (S. No. 384) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company," approved 2d March, 1838; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 82) to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

SUPERINTENDENT OF INSANE ASYLUM.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that the Superintendent of the Insane Asylum in the District of Columbia be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate.

ATTACK ON THE CHEYENNES.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be requested to inquire into and report all the facts connected with the late attack of the third regiment of Colorado volunteers, under Colonel Cheyington, on a village of the Cheyenne tribe of Indians, near Fort Lyon.

GUNBOAT FOR LIBERIA—AGAIN.

Mr. COX. I would say to my colleague, [Mr. SPALDING], who asked to take from the Speaker's table the bill to give a gunboat to Liberia, that I will withdraw my objection provided he will allow me to make one little amendment, to strike out "Liberia" and insert "Peru."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of the business in which the House was engaged at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, on which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, when this question was up at the last session of Congress I had no opportunity, from certain causes then existing, to ask the attention of the House to the views which I entertain upon the only two questions which, in my judgment, are involved in its consideration. These are its constitutionality and its policy. Nor had I intended until yesterday to ask the attention of the House even to these two questions; but when the distinguished gentleman from the Louisville district of Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] rose in his place and called the attention of his side of the House to certain questions which, in my judgment, are outside of the main questions at issue, I thought it my duty, as it certainly is my pleasure, to ask the attention of the House to the propriety of such appeals. It seemed to me that with some emphasis and with somewhat of the air of leadership of his colleagues upon that side of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky demanded to know of them if there were new lights, and, with still further emphasis, if there were new "influences" brought to bear upon them since the question was considered at the last session, that should change the vote of any member who then voted against this proposition. I wish for myself to answer that there have been new lights and new influences brought to bear upon its consideration, and that gentleman I think is entitled to the commiseration of his associates if he has been unable to recognize these lights and these influences.

Why, sir, this question was propounded to the people of this country by the convention of Union men which met at Baltimore in June of last year; they challenged the people of this entire nation to its consideration by declaring that the best interests of the country required that this amendment should be adopted. And when the convention with which that gentleman was allied met subsequently in the city of Chicago about the 1st of September, they did not dare to take up the issue thus presented by a counter-statement to the Democracy of this country. They failed to meet the issue and to rally their adherents upon that basis. And I contend, sir, as a man raised and trained in the Democratic faith, that there is not one authentic doctrine of that party to which its most devoted adherent in this House should give his attention to-day as preventing the free and philosophic and calm exercise of his judgment in respect to the propriety of supporting this amendment. If the Democratic party desired to pledge gentlemen upon the other side of the House to opposition to it, I ask them why they did not in that convention rally the Democracy upon that basis, and tell them that it was a radical change, and that it was unconstitutional, as has now been claimed by some members upon the other side of the House. I affirm that there is no doctrine of the Democratic party that is against the proposition offered here for the action of this House to-day. On the contrary, I affirm that there is abundant testimony from the Democratic fathers of this country to the propriety of considering a question of this kind, and sustaining it as a matter of just statesmanship in this nation.

Mr. MALLORY. I would inquire of my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] if he is not aware that in every amendment that has heretofore been made to the Constitution of the United States the effort and the effect has not been to increase the powers of the States and diminish the powers of the General Government.

Mr. KASSON. I will answer that question very soon in the course of my argument.

Mr. MALLORY. And I will also ask if those changes have not been made by the very Democratic leaders to whom he now refers as guides to gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I will answer both questions before I have done.

At present I go on to say that the new light and the new influence to which I refer is simply this—and I appeal to the Democrats themselves for proof of what I say—that it has been the law of the Democracy from the beginning of this Government to this time, that true Democracy was obedience to the will of the people when lawfully and constitutionally expressed. I say that when this question was submitted to the people of this country during the last canvass it was fully discussed. In my own district, in joint debate, in every one of the twenty-three counties it was debated on the stump, and so far as I know it was debated in some way in every other district in this Union, and when the voice of the majority of the people of this country, as the result of this canvass, pronounced in favor of the progress of events, as indicated by this amendment, it is a law of the Democracy that they should defer to the will of the people thus declared with almost the force of national law.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I understand that the gentleman now claims that because the majority of the people of the United States indicated their approval of this change in the Constitution of the United States therefore the immense minority who opposed it should submit and consent to the change. Now, if he undertakes to assume that the majority can change the Constitution, and that the immense vote against any such proposed change should have no influence, then I will give up the contest. If he makes any argument at all of the kind which I understood him to make, should he not claim that two thirds of the people of the United States sustained his candidate and platform?

Mr. KASSON. I will remark to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] that he again fails to appreciate the old Democratic doctrine, that the will of the majority constitutionally expressed is the lawful indication of the course that should be pursued by the Democracy. But when the proposition is not final, but is to submit the amendment thus supported by the majority to the constitutional preponderating majority of two thirds and three fourths, it is against true Democracy to refuse that submission to the people.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make another statement which he can have the benefit of in his argument, and that is that that form of amendment was voted for by a minority of the people of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. I find that my friend has fallen into another error which we have so often found prevailing with him and his friends, and that is, the recognition of the right of men who have repudiated the Constitution and sought to overthrow the Government to be allowed to press down and resist the action of men who acknowledge their just allegiance to it; a doctrine that is anti-Democratic, unjust, and, I think, against the future as well as the present peace of this country. Aside from that his statement is unfounded in fact.

The course of our national statesmanship upon this question has been somewhat remarkable. The pendulum has swung first in one direction, then by reaction in the other direction, and now it is returning to the course of its original action. The fathers of this country did consider this question, and considered it in the same spirit in which we are now considering it upon this side of the House.

We are told here that the change is radical; that we have no power or authority to make it; in other words, that we are proposing to introduce into the Constitution an element and doctrine so much outside of the scope of the Constitution, as originally established, as to deserve the appellation now of a "radical" and unjustifiable change. And one of the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, I think the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY,] demanded at the close of his argument yesterday, "If you do this thing what obligation will exist upon the States or the people to adhere to a Government thus radically changed?" To that I wish now to call the attention of the House.

And first, I ask permission to read what occurred in the Convention that framed the Constitution, and the reasons given for that action, showing that the position taken by gentlemen upon that side of the House yesterday was in direct contravention of the spirit of the fathers who made the Constitution itself. For example, quoting from the third volume of the Madison Papers, when the very question of the action of the Convention upon this subject was referred to and was under consideration, Mr. Madison declared that he "thought it wrong to admit in the Constitution that there could be property in man;" and Mr. Randolph moved that the word "servitude" be stricken out and the word "service" inserted; and then follows the reason, as given in the Madison Papers, for the change:

"The former [servitude] being thought to express the condition of slaves, and the latter [service] the obligation of free persons."

It was so done.

Not only that, but this subject was wrought into the very texture of the Constitution itself; for that Convention prohibited the importation of slaves into this country after the year named in the Constitution; that is to say, it authorizes the prohibition of that importation after the year 1808, and that prohibition was made effectual by subsequent law.

I refer to this to show that we are only treating upon one of the same class of questions which were treated by the men who made the Constitution itself; and therefore it is now within the legitimate scope of any constitutional amendment affecting this subject.

I will now ask the Clerk to read to this House the opinions entertained by Patrick Henry, as expressed in the convention of Virginia that met for the ratification of the Constitution. I ask him to read the passage I have marked to show that he opposed the adoption of the Constitution, or expressed doubts of the propriety of so doing, because it so far covered this subject, in its terms, as to justify even the positive and direct action of Congress itself upon it, without any additional authority to be derived from a future amendment of that instrument.

"If you give power to the General Government to provide for the general defense, the means must be commensurate to the end. All the means in the possession of the people must be given to the Government which is intrusted with the public defense. In this State there are two hundred and thirty-six thousand blacks, and there are many in several other States; but there are few or none in the northern States; and yet, if the northern States shall be of opinion that our numbers are numberless, they may call forth every national resource. May Congress not say that every black must fight? Did we not see a little of this last war? We were not so hard pushed as to make emancipation general; but acts of Assembly passed, that every slave who would go to the Army should be free. Another thing will contribute to bring this event about. Slavery is detested; we feel its fatal effects; we deplore it with all the pity of humanity. Let all these considerations at some future period press with full force on the minds of Congress. Let that humanity which, I trust, will distinguish America, and the necessity of national defense; let all these things operate on their minds; they will search that paper and see if they have power of manumission. And have they not, sir? Have they not power to provide for the general defense and welfare? May they not think that these call for the abolition of slavery? May not they pronounce all slaves free? And will they not be warranted by that power? There is no ambiguous implication or logical deduction. The paper speaks to the point. They have the power in clear, unequivocal terms, and will clearly and certainly exercise it."

Mr. KASSON. And in reply to objections of that kind, made in the convention of Virginia, another distinguished member of that convention, Governor Randolph, rebuked them, and said:

"I hope that there are none here who, considering the subject in the calm light of philosophy, will advance an objection dishonorable to Virginia, that, at the moment they are securing the rights of their citizens, there is a spark of hope that these unfortunate men now held in bondage may, by the operation of the General Government, be made free."—3 Ell. Deb., page 598.

Such, sir, was the doctrine, at that time, of the fathers of the country, regarding it as a consideration in favor of the Constitution then proposed for adoption that there was a possibility that under its operation, whether by laws passed under it or by amendments that might be made in accordance with it, there was a possibility, "a spark of hope," in the language of Governor Randolph, "that these unfortunate men held in bondage might be made free."

Again, sir, at the same time when the Convention that framed the Constitution was in session the Congress of the Confederation was sitting in Philadelphia; and I quote from the act known as the "ordinance of 1787," which established freedom throughout the great northwestern territory, these words, declaring its purpose:

"For extending the fundamental principle of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws, and constitutions, are erected."

Thus declaring that the very basis on which rested the republics then existing, the several States then sovereign, was the fundamental principle of civil and religious liberty; and they desired to extend it to the northwestern territory by declaring every slave free (that was the practical effect of it) in all that vast territory. And I may state in this connection that by act of Congress at that time, and by its reenactment by the first constitutional Congress, slaves were emancipated in that territory. And I recollect well that subsequently there came from Indiana, then a Territory, (and, Mr. Speaker, you will remember the historical fact,) petitions to Congress, praying for the suspension, in regard to slavery, of the operation of that ordinance reenacted under the Constitution, the object being, from the necessity for labor, to authorize the people of that Territory to hold slaves for a longer period.

Thus we find, sir, that in the very inception of the Government, by its organic laws, by its debates (and I could occupy hours in citing from them to the same effect) this very subject was considered as a legitimate subject of legislation. And when the other gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] declares that by this proposition we propose to take from the people of Kentucky their property, to deprive them of that which belonged to them as property, I call his attention to the better spirit of the fathers of this country, who denied that it was property, and regarded it only in the light of personal service, like that which an apprentice owes to his master, except that this continued for life and the other for a term of years. And further, in connection with this charge of robbing citizens of their property, I call attention to the fact that, so far as I have been able to examine, all the emancipation that has taken place in the United States of America from the beginning of its history to the present time, whether by States or by the United States, has been emancipation without compensation. Let any gentleman in this House from any State in the Union where emancipation has taken place, correct my statement if I am in error. In Massachusetts there was no compensation.

Mr. MALLORY. Emancipation heretofore has been more gradual, and not immediate.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. And by the States, and not by the Federal Government.

Mr. KASSON. I speak now of the principle of compensation. If it is unjustifiable, there being no express provisions of the Constitution against it, if it be unjustifiable to take what they call property without just compensation, then, sir, it applies to the action of States exactly as it does to the United States; and to gradual emancipation identically with prompt emancipation; for gradual emancipation only takes away a smaller proportion, a less amount of the property. It would be just as much a violation of principle. It is a question of degree, and not a change of principle.

Now I affirm, Mr. Speaker, that the State of Massachusetts emancipated without compensation; that the State of New Hampshire emancipated without compensation; so also the State of Rhode Island; the State of Connecticut; the State of New York; and the State of Pennsylvania; so also the State of Missouri; so also the State of Maryland, thank God, since the outbreak of this war. And done upon this principle, not that it is taking away property, but that it is dissolving a relation; in other words, declaring that this is not property at all, but is a relation or an institution which is always subject to the operation of the legislation of the country in proper form.

Now, sir, this being so, with what consistency with the history of this country, I ask gentlemen on that side of the House, can they rise here and say that this change is "unjustifiable," "unconstitutional," "radical," so as even to discharge from allegiance to this Government the States and the citizens of the several States? So it was intimated yesterday by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY,] There is no basis for the charge in history. There is no basis for it in logic. Our fathers did not regard this as property like that which is property by the universal laws of mankind. Why, sir, that thing which is regarded as property under the Constitution of the United States and by all civilized nations we all understand. Remedies are given in every court in every civilized nation for the recovery and protection of what is generally called property. This used to be called an institution. They used to appeal to us, "Do not touch our domestic relations; do not touch our domestic institutions." But when they find that institutions and relations are the subjects of legislation, they then change the name and call it "property" and interference with their "property."

From my own State I wish to cite a very remarkable illustration of the point, a very solemn statement of a citizen of Iowa, whom gentlemen on the other side will acknowledge as authority, the very gentleman who, if my memory is not in error, officiated in Iowa during the last canvass upon the Democratic Central National Executive Committee, a gentleman who was judge in the Territory of Iowa, and whose judgments appear in the first volume of our judicial decisions. This gentleman still adheres to Democracy in its strongest and most obnoxious form, so far as I know. I read from the first case reported in the first volume of the reports of that Territory to show the position that was judicially taken by a gentleman holding that relation to it and to the Democratic party. It was a case involving the right of a slave to his freedom by virtue of a territorial law of Congress, and without compensation. In answer to a part of the argument, he said:

"The law does not take away his property in express terms, but declares it no longer to be property at all. Of course those legal remedies which can only be resorted to upon the presumption of a still subsisting ownership in the master, become altogether annihilated."

Now there is the judicial opinion of a strong and acknowledged Democrat that it is not taking away property, but simply changing a relation, and declaring that that relation shall no longer constitute property. Sir, it is a modern heresy, introduced mainly by those who are now the sworn and acting enemies of the United States, that a slave is property as your horse, your ox, and your ass are property. It is no doctrine of the fathers and no doctrine of the Federal courts of the country as administered in the early times.

Then, sir, I think I have shown by history that we, at least, have the right to deal with this subject by amending the Constitution, provided we do it according to its own terms.

Gentlemen say that we are interfering with State rights. In this particular I call their attention to what the Constitution has already done to interfere with State rights. They tell us this is a "change" of the General Government. They call the Constitution an "agency," a "compact," a "contract," all of which is contrary to a sound judgment upon the instrument itself. I take issue with that doctrine, and I appeal to those gentlemen to meet the issue, that the Constitution creates a Government within the scope of its powers as absolute, as sovereign, as complete as is the Government of any State in the Union, legitimately constituted by the people.

The Constitution reads in its opening clause, that—

Not that "we the sovereign States do make this compact;" not that "we the independent States do agree as follows;" not that "we the people of the United States create an agency subject to the control of the States;" but that we the people of the United States, for the objects named "do ordain and establish this Constitution." Now gentlemen may be able to show me in what that differs from the organization of the governments in the States. But I challenge them to show me one point of difference which constitutes this an agency or compact in distinction from a constitutional Government which does not apply equally to any State constitution and government in this Union.

Did not this Constitution interfere with State rights? Did it not take away from every one of those States the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof; the right to establish post offices and post roads; the right of regulating their commerce with foreign countries; the right to make treaties or alliances with other States; and the right to do a hundred things which exist with every sovereign and independent State? And yet we are continually told here by gentlemen on the other side that we are interfering with the right of sovereign States when the very Constitution itself takes away a large portion of the rights of sovereign States and appropriates them to the action and control of the Government of the United States of America.

Why, sir, it even compels those States, in their contest with each other, to go into the courts of the United States as litigants, and qualifies the Supreme Court of the United States, now sitting in the other end of this Capitol, to pass judgment upon the respective claims of what they are pleased to call the sovereign States of this Union. I say that in the light of these facts it is a logical absurdity to affirm upon this floor that we are interfering with the rights of sovereign States when we simply propose to take from the scope of their action one single subject more in addition to those which were withdrawn by the original Constitution.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have been listening with pleasure, as I always do, to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa. I understand them to apply to something which I had the honor to submit yesterday. With the gentleman's permission I will preface the question I desire to ask by a brief statement. My doctrine upon the subject of State sovereignty is this: they are sovereign upon those subjects which were reserved to them by the Constitution; that the Federal Government is sovereign upon those questions which were granted to its control by the States when they formed the Union. Wherein the Federal Government is sovereign, it is beyond the interference of States, and equally the States are beyond the control of the Federal Government on all matters reserved originally by themselves to their own exclusive jurisdiction.

And now let me ask the gentleman from Iowa, is his argument to amount to a denial that the States are sovereign upon the domestic institution of slavery? If so, why is there found in the Chicago platform a plank which denies to the Federal Government the power to touch this question in any State?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Indiana is too good a logician to consider that question as one of radical importance. He knows very well from the tenor of my argument that my object is to show that we have the right to take, by amendment of the Constitution, one additional element of what otherwise would be the domestic power of the States; because we are only dealing with the same kind of questions that were dealt with in the formation of the Constitution which took from them other of their rights, and I was proceeding to show that in this proposition we are running in the legitimate line of a diminution of State rights, for the better promotion of "the general welfare." I will now read an extract from a very solemn letter signed by George Washington, unanimously adopted by the Convention which framed the Constitution, and addressed to the Congress of the Confederation then in session, in order to show in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, and to a question propounded to me a while ago by the gentleman from Kentucky, the relative importance of the Union upon the one hand, and those so-called sovereign rights of the States upon the other. In that letter, dated September 17, 1787, adopted unanimously by the Convention, as I beg gentlemen to remember, Washington says:

"It is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all. Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest. The magnitude of the sacrifice must depend as well on situation and circumstance as on the object to be obtained. It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests."

"In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, perhaps our national existence."

Now, let gentlemen upon the other side of the House consider that George Washington and the Convention that framed the Constitution declared "the consolidation of the Union" to be the supreme object of every true American, and ask themselves where they stand if they oppose an amendment that has for its express and acknowledged object and effect the consolidation of the Union by the simple act of rendering the institutions in one respect in this country accordant, that respect being the very one which has caused this present war and brought about the very evils that those framers of the Constitution declared would exist for want of a proper consolidation of this Union.

Mr. VOORHEES. The gentleman will allow me one moment. I do not rise for the purpose of disturbing the current of his argument, and if it is at all disagreeable I will not interrupt him. Inasmuch, however, as this is a grave question, and one not often discussed on the floor of this House, I trust he will excuse me. I do not understand the authority which the gentleman quotes to conflict at all with the views which I have always entertained and have often expressed. I believe that the Constitution was made for the purpose of forming a union of the States. Whether the term "consolidation" is happy or not, or fairly expresses the proper idea, I shall not stop now to consider. But I hold that the Constitution formed a union not to be broken at the will of any one State. If any one has ever supposed that I upheld the right of a State to secede from the Union, he has done me great injustice. I have often expressed my views on this question here and elsewhere.

But what I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to now is this, does he hold that the Constitution consolidated a Union whose Federal power embraced the right to do as they pleased with all the reserved rights of the States? If that is his view now, how does he reconcile that view with the doctrine laid down but a few short years ago by the party to which he belongs? What new powers has the Federal Government obtained over the States within the last three or four years? If new powers have accrued, whence have they been obtained, and out of what causes have they arisen?

In 1856 and in 1860 the party to which the gentleman belongs laid down this doctrine:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

If the gentleman can square his present views with that assertion of principle, I will be happy to hear him do so; and furthermore, while he is upon that point, let me call his attention to a resolution that passed this House by the votes of his political friends within the last three years. I do not know whether the honorable gentleman was a member of the House at the time, but I take it for granted that if he had been he would have supported the resolution as did his friends. The resolution was offered by the distinguished gentleman who is now a Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. KASSON. I will say to the gentleman that I remember that resolution well.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me read it.

Mr. KASSON. It was cited yesterday, and I propose to answer that point.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me read it for my own purpose and then I will not detain the gentleman longer:

"Resolved, That neither the Federal Government nor the people or governments of the non-slaveholding States have the purpose or the constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any State of this Union."

That resolution embraces a denial of three sources of power: it denies that the Federal Government has any such power; it denies that the people of the non-slaveholding States have any such power; it denies that the governments of the non-slaveholding States have any such power—altogether constituting the broadest denial upon this question that could possibly be put in the English language.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Voorhees] again fails to do justice to his logical powers. When we declared in that resolution that we had not that right we laid the very foundation which justifies this action to get the right, to wit, by an amendment of that Constitution which then denied it. We propose this amendment to the Constitution now in the light thrown over the country by the horrors of this war. We propose to amend it in order to get the right, and to furnish the opportunity to avoid the occasion of a future war, and to restore a permanent peace to this distracted country. We passed a resolution in that spirit then, when gentlemen were crying out for olive-branches instead of cannon-balls, and everybody was willing to tender the olive-branch in advance of and to avoid the shedding of blood.

But when war has come, notwithstanding that when the olive-branch has been rejected, when we have been met on the side of the enemy with bayonets instead of reciprocal olive-branches, this country has learned a new lesson. We have learned that that class of men in the South must be treated as well with iron as with what the gentleman's friends have been pleased to style mere paper fulminations.

So it was with the action of the convention at Chicago to which the gentleman refers. It was declared that the balance of power would be preserved by mutual non-interference. It was not accepted by the South; the balance of power was not preserved by non-action upon this subject, but was overthrown in the face of it, thus showing the necessity of some further action on the subject in order that the balance of power may be restored and the peace of the country perpetuated as well as reestablished.

Do not gentlemen perceive that there has been a war about this very question; that hundreds of thousands of lives have been lost in a war provoked by the adherents of this institution; that the question is again presented to the country with a redoubled significance and power, until you cannot go into a cottage in the most remote hamlet of the nation where, in the midst of tears for dear ones lost, they do not pray you to save their posterity from being obliged to shed blood again in a contest provoked by those who have no justice in their cause, and who have no grounds for appeal to the support of either Christianity or civilization or to any feeling of humanity in their race.

Mr. VOORHEES. Does the gentleman from Iowa hold that the powers of the Constitution have been changed or enlarged by this war? And further, whether he seeks now to amend the Constitution by virtue of itself; or whether the gentleman is at last driven to intrench himself, upon this question, in the war power? If not, if the Constitution remains unchanged, I must be permitted to respectfully suggest that the doctrine asserted by the party before the war broke out, upon the subject of constitutional power, should obtain now under an unchanged Constitution.

Mr. KASSON. If I gather the scope of the gentleman's inquiry, it certainly is unnecessary for me to answer him. If he is familiar with that Constitution, which he no doubt has read, he knows that it confers power for its amendment. If he asks me my opinion as to the war power under it, I affirm that the Constitution gives that power to an undefined extent; and that it rests with the organized representation, legislative and executive, of the people of this country, how far that power shall be exercised, according to the necessities of war, and limited not to be in conflict with other provisions of the Constitution.

And now I call the attention of gentlemen upon that side and upon all sides of this House to another fact: that there are but two limitations in the Constitution of the United States upon the power to amend it. In every other respect that Constitution may be amended as fully as the constitution of any State in this Union may be amended. I refer to the fifth article, which gives the power to amend, and prescribes the mode in which the amendments shall be accomplished. It says, after prescribing that mode:

"Provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article."

That relates to the importation of foreign persons, meaning negroes.

"and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

Upon these two points, or rather the one now remaining point, you are not permitted by the Constitution to amend it. Upon every other point within the range of conventional action, as recognized by civilized countries, you have full power to amend the Constitution.

And there has never been a more dangerous doctrine propounded upon this floor than that which was enunciated upon the other side of this House yesterday, that we had not the power to amend the Constitution, and on the other hand that these southern rebels had the right to come back into this Union under the same Constitution identically that existed at the time they went out of the Union. That was the doctrine of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BLISS,] who spoke, I think, on Friday. He declared, in substance, that that right existed in the rebels; and one other gentleman, I think one of the gentlemen from Kentucky, reaffirmed the doctrine, maintaining that the rebel States have the right to come back into the Union under a Constitution identically the same as that which existed when they went out.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in relation to another matter. Will the gentleman tell me whether he believes that, by an amendment to the Constitution, we could so change our Government as to convert it into a monarchy, or an aristocracy, or a despotism?

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will ask me a practical question relating to this subject, I will answer him.

Mr. MALLORY. This is a practical question.

This amendment proposes radically to change the Government.

Mr. KASSON. I do not propose to discuss here the courses of the planets or the phases of the moon. I keep to the question as closely as I can, and I seek to rescue it from that abyss of party politics into which my friend from Kentucky sought, yesterday, to prostrate it. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen in this House who claim to be statesmen, who claim to be patriots, and to desire permanent peace in the country, to the principles that underlie this proposed amendment.

And I ask again, in answer to the proposition which was propounded yesterday as to the right of the rebels, under the Constitution, to come back and find that instrument exactly as it was when they left the Union—I ask this question: Can men, by the criminal action which they themselves institute, stop the wheels of Government as propelled by the honest, loyal, adhering portion of the community? Then I ask, if that loyal portion of the community choose to amend their Constitution pending this criminal action of the rebels, how can it be maintained for a moment that they have a right to come back under the identical Constitution that existed when they went out? Yet two gentlemen on the other side took the ground yesterday that men, by rebellion and crime, may prevent us from making whatever amendment of the organic law may be necessary for the peace of the country and the perpetuity of our free institutions and free Government! No, sir; I will not offer such a premium to rebellion, nor maintain that rebels not only keep all their constitutional rights during rebellion, but actually deprive us of our rights by the act and during the continuance of rebellion.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to ask the gentleman one more question: Will he hereafter, when this question shall have been submitted to the various States for ratification, admit that the States now in rebellion shall be counted in ascertaining the proportionate number of States ratifying the amendment?

Mr. KASSON. I am not aware, sir, that there is any proposition upon that subject before the House.

Mr. MALLORY. The question must come up in the future, and I ask the gentleman in relation to that future.

Mr. KASSON. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When the gentleman places himself right upon the Democratic principle of following the indications of the will of the majority of the people, and supports the proposition to give to the people an opportunity to give the full majority that is required, then he may propound such questions to me. At present, while he stands upon entirely different ground, and does not combat my premises or my logic, I deny that he has the right to raise a contingent and remote question. But I will say this: If you will give the opportunity to the people of the several States of this Union, including the rebellious States as they may be reclaimed from rebel authority, you will have a majority of three fourths of all the States for the amendment. Counting the free States of the Union, including Missouri among them, and the little State of Delaware, you have twenty-four States of the Union to begin with, leaving but three more to give the constitutional number required by any theory to establish this as a part of the Constitution of the United States. Do you tell me that Louisiana will not ratify this amendment, that Tennessee will not, that Arkansas will not, when the loyal men of those States have a fair opportunity to record their votes upon it? I say that my information from authentic sources is entirely different, and leads me to entertain the confident belief that the only men who have the right to vote under the Constitution, the men who are in allegiance to this Government and give the Constitution their support, will go with strong voice for this amendment; and I shall endeavor to show the reasons why if time remains to me.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will allow me one moment; I will not detain him long. I will, however, as one upon this side of the House to whom the gentleman refers, answer the question which he propounded, and that which the gentleman from Kentucky propounded to him.

Mr. KASSON. I did not refer to that gentleman, but to his colleague, [Mr. BLISS.]

Mr. COX. I am aware of that; but the gentleman will allow me to say what I proposed to say. I hold that there exists under the Constitution the right to amend it in every particular, except the two particulars specified in that instrument. Nay, more, I carry the Democratic principle to such an extent that I maintain that the people of this country, speaking through three fourths of the States, in pursuance of the mode prescribed by the Constitution, have the right to do anything; to erect a monarchy in this country; to make the king of Dahomey, if you please, the king of this country; because all the States have ceded to three fourths of them the right to change the organic law in all particulars except two. My reason for opposing this amendment is not that I deny the power to make it, but because, in my view, it seeks to consolidate power; to absorb the powers of the States, and deprive them of their municipal liberty; because it is a step toward monarchy and despotism.

Mr. KASSON. I am glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio concede away the whole case made by his Democratic colleagues yesterday. This is no proposition to appeal to the war power. Those gentlemen who dread an appeal to the war power so much as the gentleman from Ohio might well be alarmed if this were proposed to be done in any other way than by the action of the sovereign people, sovereign in their right to amend according to the constitutional form any of their institutions. And yet I do not understand him to say that he is willing to give the people the right to pass on the question and to say whether it is their will or not. He is not willing to trust the people.

Mr. COX. I could give the people the right to pass upon it if I did not believe—

Mr. KASSON. They would do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. The language which the party over there is now enjoying itself at shows no inconsistency. I said I would not oppose it if I did not believe it would tend to disturb the balance of power between the States and thus disturb our peculiar confederated system. It is because you seek to break down slavery, and because, by the exercise of a power given in the Constitution you would divert our Government from its proper course and channel, that I am opposed to it. And that is the subject for laughter on the other side of the House.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman, instead of admitting my proposition well founded, passes over that point, and yet declares his apprehension in another form by the action of the people; that it would disturb the balance of power; in other words, he has no confidence in the people of this country for fear they will themselves disturb the balance of power, and therefore does not want to submit it to them.

Mr. MALLORY rose.

Mr. KASSON. In a moment. It amounts to the same thing, that the modern Democracy, as represented by my distinguished friend from Ohio, distrusts the first instincts of the people, while the old Democracy, in which I have already said I was raised, always appealed to the sober second thought of the people, and declared its confidence in the issue of a sober appeal to them on any question. But these gentlemen are unwilling to submit the question to the action of the people.

I will now hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman from Iowa whether this amendment does not refer the question for ratification, not to the people of the various States, but to the packed Legislatures elected without reference to this matter.

Mr. KASSON. Why, sir, my friend from Kentucky complains because we do not do an unconstitutional thing.

Mr. MALLORY. Not at all.

Mr. KASSON. We do exactly the thing which the Constitution tells us to do. But in submitting it to the Legislatures, do not the people pass upon it? Do not the people elect the Legislatures? Do not the people pass upon it in the same way that they passed upon the ratification of the Constitution itself, by choosing a body of men to accept or reject this amendment? Of course they do.

Mr. MALLORY. No. When the States acted on the Constitution and the ratification of that instrument, they elected conventions and Legislatures with a view to that specific object. If the gentleman will alter this resolution and provide for the calling of conventions of the States to decide whether this amendment to the Constitution shall be ratified or not, then there would be some ground for the position he occupies.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman vote for the proposition thus amended?

Mr. MALLORY. No, sir.

Mr. KASSON. I must proceed with my argument; I appeal from old Kentucky, impressed only with the traditions of the last thirty years, adhering to the doctrines of the nullifiers denounced by Jackson, our great modern Democratic father. I appeal from that old Kentucky to that young giant Kentucky that is now rising in its place, and representing the purer Democracy of our fathers, that young giant, springing like Minerva full armed from the front of Jove, which took action in its Legislature on Friday last in the spirit of this amendment, and which has an eloquent exponent upon this floor, [Mr. YEAMAN,] from whom we have heard once on this question. I appeal to that young Kentucky, infused with the life of the times, capable of appreciating the spirit of events, competent to understand the necessity of a modification of our institutions which is required by the times and by circumstances. And to that Kentucky I submit the argument which I render here, for it will meet me on the terms and premises, and logic which I have sought humbly to submit to gentlemen on that side of the House to-day.

For the present I leave the question of constitutionality; and I call the attention of the House to the only question, beside the constitutionality of the measure, which, in my judgment, should be considered here by legislators who desire to act for the best interests of the country; I refer to the policy of the amendment. Let me say here that it is necessary to carry into effect one clause of the Constitution of the United States which has been disobeyed in nearly every slave State of the Union for some twenty-five or thirty years past. I refer to that clause of the Constitution which declares in section two of the fourth article that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States. You cannot go into a State of the North in which you do not find refugees from southern States who have been driven from the States in the south where they had a right to live as citizens, because of the tyranny which this institution exercised over public feeling and public opinion, and even over the laws of those States.

In my own State there are numbers of men who have been driven from their farms, not for any offense against any of the laws which usually constitute crime, but because in opinion they did not agree with those who adhere to the institution of slavery. Who does not know that we have abundant proof that numbers of men in the State of Texas, Germans who had settled there, quiet and peaceable men, have been foully murdered in cold blood because they were known to be anti-slavery in sentiment? Who does not know that innocent ladies, cultivated, intelligent, Christian women, have been driven from the cities and States of the South, not for any legal offense committed by them, but because they had dared to say something offensive to this intolerant spirit of slavery? Nay, more; who does not know that it has inaugurated a cruel despotism, a spirit brutal beyond comparison in the history of the world, in the treatment of soldiers of the Union taken prisoners by them since the war commenced? What other civilized nation exists in Europe, or on this continent, that would have treated prisoners of war as ours have been treated in this southern dominion? I ask gentlemen to point me to modern history, and show me where prisoners of war have ever received such neglect and brutality as our soldiers have encountered who have been made prisoners in the South.

And what is the reason of it? It is because they charge these soldiers with being abolitionists. They appeal to that insane, mad spirit of slavery, and thus heap crime upon crime. I speak of it now in its effects. To illustrate its effects, remember it was slavery which positively refused the agents of what gentlemen are pleased to style a sovereign State in the Union a hearing in its courts. Did not Massachusetts send two distinguished gentlemen to try a cause affecting the right of South Carolina over free colored citizens of Massachusetts in the courts of South Carolina, and were they not driven ignominiously from the city of Charleston, without access to the court? Would that have been done if slavery had not existed? But worse than that! I mention one other illustration with shuddering horror, and I mention it only for the further exhibition of the truth of history. The chairman of the Military Committee mentioned to me yesterday an instance showing the effects of the institution in another direction, infinitely worse than the denial of relief according to law, and before its own tribunals.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to the gentleman from Iowa continuing his remarks.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope, as the gentleman from Iowa has been interrupted so much, and as I have had part of his time, he will be allowed to proceed.

Unanimous consent was given.

Mr. KASSON. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that one of the effects—and I avoid all allusion to the exercise of private authority, I only speak of the philosophy of the institution as traced in its effects on society—that one of its effects as stated to me yesterday on competent authority was that one of the "institutions" subordinate to the institution of slavery had been called into play against some soldiers of our Army who had been taken prisoners and had escaped. It is well known that it is a recognized business in parts of the South to keep and train blood-hounds for the recovery of fugitive slaves. I speak of it as a fact well known and not denied by anybody. My information is this, that four Union soldiers who recently escaped from one of the rebel camps were pursued by the aid of that subordinate institution and overtaken. A ring was formed about them and the blood-hounds were let in on these four soldiers, who were torn to pieces amid the jeers and shouts of the rabble that encircled them! Tell me that it is my duty to act in any way for the protection of that institution! Let gentlemen go home to their constituents if they will, and say that they voted for the perpetuation of an institution capable of effects of that kind, one which denies the constitutional rights of our citizens in the South, suppresses freedom of speech and of the press, throws types into the rivers when they do not print its will, and violates more clauses of the Constitution than were violated even by the rebels when they commenced this war, and which has, in effect, been in chronic and constant rebellion against the provisions of our national Constitution during the last twenty years. Their personal action is for their own determination.

For myself, sir, I will go to the noble, gallant people of Iowa with no such record connected with my name. I had rather stand solitary, with my name recorded for this amendment, with the hope of justice twenty years hence, than to have all the honors which could be heaped upon me by any political party in opposition to this doctrine. You cannot resist the tide of modern civilization. It commenced with our Revolution and it will flow on until unforeseen obstacles shall block up its course. It was sustained by the spirit of Washington and Madison and Jefferson, who denounced this institution; it was strengthened by France, when that great empire, then flushed with the liberal genius of a republic, pronounced a decree for the entire abolition of slavery throughout her then extended colonial dominions. Thence it passed to England, and, although a bitter enemy of France, and disliking everything favored by the French people, yet after twenty years of contest under the leadership of men whose names stand high—none higher—on the roll of English history or of fame, freedom became a fixed fact throughout all the dominions of Great Britain. Subsequently it even permeated the arbitrary despotism of Russia, and now, by a decree of the imperial Government, seven million serfs are set free and restored to the natural rights of mankind. Then came Holland and Denmark in the train of emancipation, leaving the kingdom of Spain, the last resource upon the European continent of the institution of slavery, and not even there, I believe, tolerated on her own soil, but only in her distant colonies.

And here, gentlemen tell me that by crying peace, peace, and suppressing abolitionism, they can check the flow of this tide, and procure a permanent peace and concord in the Union. They must be blind to the moral and religious power which prevails in this country if they entertain that doctrine. At the time of the Revolution the three great ecclesiastical bodies of this country, the Methodist, Presbyterian, and Baptist, uttered their condemnation of this institution of slavery; and that opposition has run through nearly all the ecclesiastical organizations of this country ever since. They think, whether right or wrong is not the question, still they believe that the Bible compels them to entertain that doctrine; and are you by your legislation or inaction able to change that opinion?

Not only that, but that great and increasing party which believes in progressive civilization, and which has moved over the world the mighty tide of which I speak, supported by the mightier power of religion, is beginning to clearly recognize that there are three great fundamental natural rights of human society which you cannot take away without striking a vital blow at the rights of white men as well as black. They are the rights of a husband to his wife—the marital relation; the right of father to his child—the parental relation; and the right of a man to the personal liberty with which he was endowed by nature and by God, and which the best judicial authorities of England have for a hundred years declared he could not alienate even by his own consent.

Take away these three great fundamental rights from any large class of human beings, and then do you cry "peace," "peace?" and do you expect no assault upon a system which deprives men of such a class of rights? Sir, you must palsy the tongue which would speak; you must do more, you must palsy the hand and the arm which would strike, or you will never, never, never have reliable peace in this country while that institution exists, the perpetual occasion of moral, intellectual, and physical warfare. I put it then to gentlemen upon that side of the House, having avoided every element of partisan debate in this discussion, whether pure reason, and sound patriotism, and just policy, do not require of them to support this amendment, and allow its submission to the people of this country. If you desire peace and harmony, you will give the people of the North and of the South an opportunity to establish harmonious relations by the expression of legitimate majorities upon this question. If you desire perpetual discord and war, then you will refuse them the opportunity, and compel the perpetuation of this institution, with bloodshed without end in the future, and disunion without end in the present.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. This question, Mr. Speaker, has been very thoroughly discussed, and I doubt whether it is possible for either side of the House to advance any new or original proposition with reference to it. At the last session I had the honor to submit my views to the consideration of the House, and to state the reason why I should vote against the adoption of this resolution to amend the Constitution. I stated then that I doubted the power, in this mode, to reach the object aimed at; and I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion to-day, particularly that part of it between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Indiana, and I have heard nothing that has in the least altered or modified the views I expressed at that time.

I admit, with my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] that the people can alter their fundamental, organic form of government, and so can the people change entirely their Government. That is the doctrine which the southern people assert. But, sir, that is not this proposition. This is a proposition to change the form of government, a form adopted with certain theories, with certain principles, for certain objects; and I contend that while we may amend the Constitution in the mode provided by that instrument, we can amend it only to reach and cover those subjects or powers which were delegated originally to the General Government. The Federal Government was made by the States; the people collectively were never called to act upon it; and while the Constitution provides for its own amendment, so as to enable the General Government to carry out the objects originally delegated to it, still all the reserved rights are reserved to the States. If we can amend the Constitution in this respect, we can amend it so as to reach to the marital relations and all other matters of a domestic character.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to repeat what I said at the last session upon this question. I should be glad to know that I was wrong; but having formed those opinions after careful study, having deliberately and carefully and, as I think, without partisan bias, reached that conclusion, with all due deference to the President of the United States I am of the same opinion now.

But, sir, we are nearly a year later in the unfortunate and calamitous present history of this country than we were at the time this question was discussed at the last session. Events of moment have transpired since then, and therefore I have taken the floor for the purpose of offering for the consideration of this House a few practical remarks as to the policy of passing this resolution; as to the effect if finally adopted by the necessary number of States; and whether, even if the effect shall be to free the slaves, we shall have given to that unfortunate race any amelioration of their condition, any social or political elevation of their status, or have advantaged them in any regard whatever.

Sir, the President tells us in his annual message at the commencement of this session that he hopes we will now pass this resolution. He refers to the action of the people at the late election, and tells us that if we fail to pass it the next Congress will, and that as the next Congress will, why, forsooth, we ought to pass it.

Well, sir, that is very strange reasoning for that functionary. We all know that death is certain, and yet should we anticipate it? Because any evil that is hanging over the country or over us as individuals is inevitable, shall we forsooth meet it hurriedly and in advance? Sir, I cannot agree to the President's reasoning, that because this is inevitable we should stultify ourselves, and go counter to our principles and our honest convictions in voting for a proposition which we utterly deplore and condemn. I am not sure that the President's premises are correct. The next Congress may hold a different opinion upon this question. Slavery, as it now exists, may cease altogether before the next Congress of the United States assembles. The whole condition of our country may be altered, North and South, before the assembling of the next Congress. But assume this should not be, and the next Congress does recommend this alteration of the Constitution, do we not have Legislatures elected between now and that time? Will not the people be called upon then to act for the first time on this question? Will not Legislatures be voted for and elected on this question? Because, sir, although, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa, this was an issue of the presidential election, according to the Baltimore platform, it was no issue in the elections for members of the Legislatures; and before the Legislatures can be called upon to act new questions may intervene for their consideration and new reasons why they should not accede may prevent their doing so.

But, sir, we will assume that Congress passes this resolution; we will assume that the Legislatures of the States carry out the recommendation of Congress and agree to this amendment; what then? Will any man contend that it will free one slave? Did the President's emancipation proclamation free one slave? Was it not, in his own expressive language, "like the Pope's bull against the comet?" This also would be a mere brutum fulmen so far as the States in rebellion are concerned. If they continue in rebellion as they are now no action of this Congress can affect the status of slavery within these States. They disregard the action of this Congress; they will disregard any action that we may take in an amendment of the Constitution. In those States slavery will continue, except in the triumphant path of our armies. Therefore the practical effect of this amendment will really be nothing. Without we hold their territory by military power it will free no slaves; where our armies march, where their tread is felt, there slavery ceases; but it ceases only so long as our armies occupy slave territory; and when you withdraw that, slavery will again exist if the confederate power so wills it.

But I go further, because I desire upon this occasion to discuss this question freely and frankly. And what I say I say for myself, individually. I know the popular error is that it is politic for men to go for the abolition of slavery. I know the politicians of the North, looking for political preferment and the success of partisan power, run with this popular current of the day. And the man is looked upon as a fool who is honest and frankly and boldly expresses his convictions to the contrary. But whether it be right or wrong, politic or impolitic, so far as I am concerned, I will, as I have always done in this House, and since the commencement of my public life, frankly and freely express my honest sentiments.

Now, sir, we will assume that by an amendment to the Constitution you abolish slavery: what then? Why have you abolished it? The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has to-day attempted to tell you of some of the evils which surround this institution. He calls it a social evil; others call it a political evil. All the evil acts of the rebels are attributed to the fact that slavery exists there. And it is assumed that this rebellion never would have existed, that it could not have been begun, that it could not be prosecuted or sustained, except that slavery existed within those States.

I will not stop to answer these fallacies. Our revolutionary fathers went into a rebellion and were successful. The institution of slavery was not any hindrance to their success. When they threw down the gauntlet to their masters upon the other side of the Atlantic the colonies all held slaves, and yet they prosecuted a seven years' war successfully, during which we lost all our large cities. They all held slaves, yet no one among our enemies in England declared slavery as among the evils of our rebellion, or that in consequence of its existence we were prosecuting a bad cause for a wicked and bad purpose.

Well, sir, we will assume that we have abolished slavery. What then? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] asked you yesterday what do you propose to do with these people when you have freed them? Deport them? As the gentleman told you, it would add $4,000,000,000 to your debt, but that, in his own expressive language, would not deter gentlemen upon the other side of the House. The scheme of colonization has been abandoned; that scheme had for its supporters such men as Henry Clay and Daniel Webster. Our new lights have gone against that. They desire to keep these negroes here for home consumption. First, to use them as instruments by which to obtain political power. Secondly, to retain the power thus obtained. Thirdly, to gratify vengeance against the slaveholder. Fourthly, as an excuse for continuing the war, and thus to continue the army of Government officials, and finally, if possible, to elevate the negro to the condition of the white man and give him suffrage, and by that means to create a power which will forever rule and control this country.

Sir, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] thus presented a question which must be considered and decided. Wendell Phillips, in New York recently, more fully developed the design. He boldly announces the doctrine. He sustained it, asserting that a crossing of the white and black races would create the most superior race that has yet existed. And in reply to an inquiry, the distinguished gentleman to whom I refer boldly admitted that the object was to make the highest and most glorious specimen of human nature that the world has ever seen. Mr. Speaker, we may amend the Constitution; we may by superior military force overrun and conquer the South; we may lay waste their lands and destroy their property; we may free their slaves. But there is one thing we cannot do: we cannot violate with impunity or alter the laws of God.

The Almighty has fixed the distinction of the races; the Almighty has made the black man inferior, and, sir, by no legislation, by no partisan success, by no revolution, by no military power, can you wipe out this distinction. You may make the black man free, but when you have done that what have you done? Have you elevated his condition? Have you advantaged him physically, socially, morally, or intellectually? I asserted here at the last session, I now repeat the assertion, that the condition of domestic servitude as existing in the southern States is the highest condition of which the African race is capable, and when compared with their original condition on the continent from which they came is superior in all the elements of civilization, philanthropy, and humanity. Sir, look at the African in his native condition, where he is supposed to be not only free, but "monarch of all he surveys." I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from the volume of Captain Carnot, published by the Appletons, in 1854, describing what he saw in Africa, and the condition of the negro in his native wilds.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"In my wanderings in African forests, I have often seen the tiger pounce upon its prey, and with instinctive thirst satiate its appetite for blood, and abandon the drained corpse; but these African negroes were neither as decent nor as merciful as the beast of the wilderness. Their malignant pleasure seemed to consist in the invention of tortures that would agonize, but not slay. There was a devilish spell in the tragic scene that fascinated my eyes to the spot. A slow, lingering, tormenting mutilation was practiced on the living as well as on the dead; and, in every instance, the brutality of the women exceeded that of the men. I cannot picture the hellish joy with which they passed from body to body, digging out eyes, wrenching off lips, tearing the ears, and slicing the flesh from the quivering bones; while the queen of the harpies crept amid the butchery, gathering the brains from each several skull as a bonne bouche for the approaching feast!

"After the last victim yielded his life, it did not require long to kindle a fire, produce the requisite utensils, and fill the air with the odor of human flesh. Yet, before the various masses were half broiled, every mouth was tearing the dainty morsels with shouts of joy, denoting the combined satisfaction of revenge and appetite! In the midst of this appalling scene I heard a fresh cry of exultation, as a pole was borne into the apartment, on which was impaled the living body of the conquered chieftain's wife. A hole was quickly dug, the stake planted, and faggots supplied; but before a fire could be kindled the wretched woman was dead, so that the barbarians were defeated in their hellish scheme of burning her alive.

"I do not know how long these brutalities lasted, for I remember very little after this last attempt, except that the bushmen packed in plantain leaves whatever flesh was left from the orgie, to be conveyed to their friends in the forest. This was the first time it had been my lot to behold the most savage development of African nature under the stimulus of war. The butchery made me sick, dizzy, paralyzed. I sank on the earth benumbed with stupor; nor was I aroused till midnight, when my Kroomen bore me to the conqueror's town and negotiated our redemption for the value of twenty slaves."

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I presume it will not be contended that the condition of the native African is, in any regard, equal to that of the American slave. Sir, the Africans live in their native wilds as slaves. The Africans are sold into slavery by themselves. I contend that their condition in this country is in every regard improved. From barbarians they become civilized Christians; from slaves they become free men. Admitting all the sins with which slavery is charged, it cannot be denied that it has been an instrument in the hands of God by which to confer a benefit upon that unfortunate race.

Now, sir, I contend that, if we desire to be philanthropic—if we desire to confer a benefit upon that people—let us afford every amelioration of their condition that we can under the law; but, sir, let us not forget that, evil though slavery be, there is yet a greater evil for this unfortunate country, and that is its destruction, the disunion, the consummation of the ruin now before us.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] said yesterday we may be anticipated in our beneficent desires—that, in his opinion, the confederates themselves are preparing to abolish slavery. I know that it has recently been stated in the South that, rather than yield to the North, they would make terms with England and France, on the condition of the recognition of their independence, with the abolition of slavery to follow as a consequence. Sir, that may be; but in my judgment, it will not be. Neither England nor France will interfere in this question upon conditions of that kind; nor do I believe that the confederate government would accept the recognition of their independence by any European Power, if based upon the abolition of slavery without the consent of the States and the people thereof.

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that at this session of Congress there would exist a condition of public affairs that would bring about certain peace and Union; that these measures of aggression against the southern States would no longer have necessity or palliation. I had hoped that this Government would entertain propositions which have been made for a cessation of hostilities and the restoration of this Union upon the basis of the existing Constitution.

But, sir, I have been disappointed. There is no disposition to heal this quarrel at all. There is no disposition on the part of the party in power to restore the Union upon the basis of the old order of things.

I can only say further, Mr. Speaker, that I shall vote against this resolution. I shall vote against it because it is not within the power of Congress to pass it. I shall vote against it because it is unwise, impolitic at this time, if we could pass it legally. I shall vote against it because it is another step toward the eternal separation of the two sections. I shall vote against it because it would be no advantage to the negro if successful. I shall vote against it because it is an improper intermeddling with the domestic affairs of others. I shall vote against it because I want to remove every obstacle to the peaceful solution of this great question; I want to alleviate the condition of the South as well as the North; I want to discontinue these controversies and struggles now pending between men who but yesterday were fellow-citizens of the same great country, with the same constitutional rights and privileges. I shall vote against it because I would leave to every State and every political community the entire control of their own domestic affairs. I shall vote against it because I want to preserve the essence of our constitutional liberties.

I want to continue this as a Republic. I want to disseminate power from this central point instead of concentrating it here. I want to preserve the limitations of the Constitution and of the Government, as originally constructed, in theory as well as in letter and spirit, that we shall not interfere with the relation of master and slave any more than between husband and wife.

I want to allay this excitement. I do not believe slavery has had anything to do with it. I know that at the North slavery is obnoxious to the people. I know that the sentiment there is against the existence of slavery upon the continent of America. But there are evils at the North which I should like to see exterminated. There are evils every where, among every people in every part of the world; and before we assume the right to do away with the evils of our neighbors we ought to do that which is right ourselves.

We are in a war, a terrible civil conflict. Those who believe that it is near its termination are in error, because after you have abolished the armies of the rebels there is power of resistance left among the people inhabiting that vast territory which will make it necessary to have a standing army upon every square mile to retain it. You will have not only to conquer, but keep conquered. It is not only necessary to conquer their armies, to deprive them of the power of resistance, but, in order to preserve the essence of our Government, you must conquer their hearts. You must get their assent or you must hold them in subjugation, and when you do that we will have ceased to have a republican form of government.

I want to restore this Union. Under no circumstances I repeat, would I consent to disunion. But, sir, to restore the Union you must accompany the Army with the olive-branch. You must learn from General Sherman, who has done more to conquer the people of Georgia by kindness than ten thousand triumphant armies marching through that State could do. It is only by conciliation and kindness that we can conquer the rebels. Reverse the picture: suppose we were in rebellion against them, how long would we resist an attempt to subjugate us and control our domestic relations? They are as brave a people, as generous a people, and as noble a people as ourselves, and as such it is wisdom to treat them.

The Republican position for forcible abolition is illogical, because when their slaves are freed by this mode you have enslaved the master. One follows as the consequence of the other. I say you must hold them in bondage before you can accomplish your purpose in this way. What is the distinction? a distinction without a difference. I should be loth to say here that forcible emancipation is the result of wickedness alone, but I will say it is a combination of wickedness and folly. We want the Union; we want these States back again; we want to see these men represented upon this floor; we want them to obey the laws and the Constitution; admitting they have committed a wicked folly in attempting to rebel.

"To err is human: to forgive, divine;"

and it is only, in my judgment, by conciliation, by affording them every guarantee of the Constitution and every privilege under the Constitution, that we can bring that people back again with us to live under one common Government, recognizing one common Constitution, one common head, and one common flag.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I have not designed to make a speech upon this resolution, and I do not expect to do so now. All I shall say will be little more, perhaps, than a statement of some of the reasons why I cannot support this resolution.

The Government of the United States is one of limited and defined powers. It possesses the powers, and only the powers, granted to it through the Federal Constitution. All other governmental powers, all the powers not enumerated, are reserved to the States or the people thereof. I have not been satisfied, I am not convinced by any of the arguments made upon this question, that the power has been conferred upon the General Government, or that it can be by the proposed amendment, to control, regulate, or interfere with the internal and domestic affairs of the States. I cannot believe that the framers of our Constitution intended to or did place a minority of one fourth of the States of this Union in a position to be stripped of all their rights of property at the pleasure of the other three fourths. The power of amendment as conferred through the Constitution can, as it seems to me, extend only to matters in which the States have a common interest. It is one of the reserved rights of the States under their own State constitutions to regulate, control, and manage their local and peculiar interests in their own way.

This, it seems to me, was so understood by the party now urging the passage of the resolution under consideration. At the time of Mr. Lincoln's nomination, the convention nominating him unanimously, I believe, adopted this resolution:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend."

The rights of the States and each State to control its domestic institutions is essential to the balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend. Would not this amendment destroy that balance of power? Do not the endurance and perfection of the Republic depend as much upon the preservation of that balance of power now as it did when at his inauguration Mr. Lincoln "reiterated" the sentiments of that resolution, and claimed that it was a law for himself and his party?

But, sir, I could not myself at this time vote for this resolution if I did not doubt the power to amend the Constitution in the particular proposed. I do not "deem it necessary" or wise in an hour like this to change so essentially and radically our Constitution of government. However gentlemen may entertain sentiments of revenge toward voluntary rebels, it is not now pretended by any that all of the people of the rebellious States are guilty of rebellion. It is unjust and cruel to the innocent and true men in those States. It is taking advantage of a state of things which neither they nor we can prevent to overthrow without the consent or cooperation of those to be affected by it most, one of their constitutional and cherished institutions. It is verifying one of the first and most powerful arguments for secession, that the northern States were only waiting for the power and opportunity to destroy all their rights of property and person. Sir, it will furnish the rebel leaders another argument by which to win the doubting and to arouse the lukewarm; it will aid them in raising other armies to fight against the Union; it will enable them to prolong this bloody and terrible war by embittering and intensifying the hatred of these people against the abolitionized North; it will destroy the confidence of the Union men in those States in the good faith and candor of those who pledged them that the only purpose and desire of the party in power was to restore the Union and reestablish the supremacy of the Constitution of our fathers; it will demand the blood of thousands more of the young men of this country and pile upon ourselves and our children a still weightier burden of debt and taxation. Finally, it will, in my judgment, if that be possible, put in greater danger the ultimate restoration of peace and the Union, and weaken, if it does not destroy, all faith in the safety and stability of republican constitutional government.

Sir, I have no sympathy with the institution of slavery, powerful as it may have been in the past; between Jeff. Davis struggling to save his neck and Mr. Lincoln to build his empire, it seems to be doomed. At all events, the vast Army and Navy of the United States are pledged by their Commander-in-Chief to its overthrow. Every day the conflict of war is trenching in upon its dominion, and if it were to fall in a legitimate struggle to put down rebellion and restore the Union, I shall not be one of its mourners. I have not lost my reverence for the Constitution. I remember it still as the handiwork of Washington and his compatriots. I cannot forget the solemn awe and earnest solicitude with which they approached, considered, and perfected that immortal monument of human wisdom. I cannot forbear to warn this House that the spirit and temper which pervaded that august body should fill the minds and hearts of those who attempt or dare to remodel it. Whenever that sacred instrument must be altered, let it be done in the spirit of kindness and in fraternal love to every portion of our country and toward all the people who are to live under it. Let peace once more come to this bleeding, mourning country, and then with the love that animated the great heart of Washington invite all who can be forgiven the part they have taken in this most unfortunate struggle to join in amending, if necessary, the law which all must reverence and love who can endure to live under it. But I conjure you to let the wail of the dead and dying pass, let the smoke of battle clear away, let peace and the Union be restored, let reason again assume her dominion before another revolution shall be inaugurated. Tear not the work of our fathers asunder in passion, stain not the charter of our Union and liberties, framed by them, with their children's hands reeking with their children's blood.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, in contemplating the rise, the progress, and rapid development of the grandest system of government ever yet devised, I am led to reflect upon its present condition, and, if possible, to raise myself for a moment above the raging elements now threatening its existence, and to see if there is anything in the future which can be done, and which has not been done, to allay these elements of strife, and once more restore to reinvigorated life the Union of these States.

For my part I aver, as I have ever avowed, that if anything has been left undone which might now be done, which shall restore to us the unity of power, the blessings of peace, and the glorious promises of future we once enjoyed, then that needful thing I am prepared now to do.

In considering the subject now before the House, I recognize in it the fruition of the disturbances of the last thirty years. By these amendments the promised fruits of the abolition of slavery are sought to be realized. If the union of the States is to be maintained thereby; if thereby peace and prosperity are to be restored to the land of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson; if sectional animosities are to be allayed; if thereby treason is to be foiled or punished; if the cause of human progress is to be promoted; if, in a word, all the best interests of our common country are to be promoted by these amendments, I am prepared now, as I have ever been prepared, to make any and every sacrifice, personal to myself, which shall accomplish objects so great and desirable. I do so the more readily because I recognize in the manner of presenting these amendments one of the modes pointed out by the Constitution for submitting to the States, or rather the people of the States, propositions for its amendment.

I am not unmindful, Mr. Speaker, that for many years there have been those in the land who were dissatisfied with the Union because its Constitution contained the provisions and compromises by which slavery and its safety were secured from violent or political assault. I have never otherwise than thought that this class of persons contributed in no small degree to the breeding of those successive and increasing irritations upon the slavery question, which were finally seized upon by the southern rebel leaders as sufficient pretext for civil war, and which they have so powerfully used as the incitement for consolidating and wielding the southern mind in four years of gigantic war against the Government of their fathers.

But, Mr. Speaker, I, the Representative of a slaveholding constituency, aver now, as I have averred, when a prisoner in the rebel guard-house, and as I have, amid all the scenes of woe and desolation, that rebellious war has wrought in my district and in my State, that the evils and dangers which were complained of were not so grievous or threatening, nor could they be, as to justify a resort to armed rebellion. I had ever been of the firm conviction that, prior to this internecine war, there was no effective power which could have successfully arrayed itself against the constitutional rights of each and every part of our common country. And in reference to the disturbing causes which brought on the war, and superinduced the necessity for these amendments, if the South had planted herself upon her constitutional rights, and stood shoulder to shoulder with the men of the North disposed to regard them, then there could have been no cause for the one nor necessity for the other.

But, Mr. Speaker, in reviewing the history of the last thirty years it is impossible not to perceive that while there has been a party who have furnished irritating pretenses, irritating to the pride and nature of men, there has also been a party who have as eagerly seized upon these subterfuges for the sole purpose of inflaming and controlling the southern mind. They have used this power, not more with the view of defending slavery than for the purpose of carrying out a long-determined, deliberate, and wicked aim of setting up an independent power upon this continent for selfish and inglorious ends; and if in the end those using slavery for this nefarious purpose shall find that the people, by the adoption of these amendments, destroy slavery, then it can but be evident to them that they have been the architects of their own fortunes.

Without any arguments, Mr. Speaker, as to the good or ills of slavery as a primary question, and as it has all along existed under the sanction of the laws of our ancestors, nevertheless it has transpired during the course of this war that this institution was the chief lever by which the rebel leaders have wielded the southern mind; and for that reason it has lost nearly all the sympathy and support it once maintained. And to such extent has it become a source of irritation that it seems at length necessary, in order to secure the great blessings of peace and union once more, that the great question of its further existence or non-existence shall be submitted to the people for their decision.

And here I am reminded by the arguments of gentlemen upon this floor of our want of constitutional power to pass this amendment. I aver that if I had a doubt as to the right of Congress upon this subject of proposing and passing this amendment by two thirds of this House, and the Senate as at present organized, I unquestionably would vote against this amendment. I believe in the existence of the power; and while I say that I indorse the wisdom of that provision of the Constitution which declares that all power not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. It has served as a guide and a landmark heretofore, and I trust it will long remain there as a landmark in the future; and it is not at all in conflict with that provision of the Constitution which authorizes amendments to be made to this Constitution.

Some gentlemen argue that we have no right to do it because slavery was one of the reserved rights of the States. I see nothing in the Constitution which reserves that right to the States, but I see from the proceedings which took place prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and especially in the provisions which are in the Constitution itself, that the Convention to frame the Constitution did take cognizance of this question of slavery. In the ninth section of the first article—and that is what is declared as one of the sentiments of the great Dred Scott decision—all the States were allowed, for twenty years after the adoption of this Constitution, to buy, sell, trade, and traffic in slaves in any manner they might please. And they might have done so, so far as any prohibition in the Constitution is concerned, up to 1864. But after the lapse of twenty years power was given to Congress to prohibit it in the future; and they did so at a subsequent period. Suppose we had here a proposed amendment to abrogate that ninth section, giving Congress that power after the expiration of twenty years, and to say that Congress should have no such power in the future, would gentlemen then quote the very language of the ninth section giving to all the States the power to trade and traffic in such property? Gentlemen would not have the power to do that.

There is another provision which allows Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution. And the last provision is that Congress shall have no power to propose amendments by which States are deprived of their equal right of representation in the Senate. Now I maintain that this House has no right to propose an amendment to deprive a State of its equal representation in the Senate, because all our powers to propose amendments are derived from the Constitution. That is really the only existing prohibition that I know of in the Constitution. Can it be said that, under that restriction declaring the powers of the General Government, and the powers reserved to the States, Congress has no right to propose any amendment to the Constitution at all? Legitimately and logically, the argument would come to that. And yet, on a moment's reflection, no gentleman would take such a position.

Some gentlemen argue that we have no right to make any amendment, unless it be in reference to something already in the Constitution. The answer to that is that the very first session of Congress after the adoption of the Constitution a number of amendments were adopted on the suggestion of States to which the Constitution had been submitted for ratification, some of which had no sort of reference to anything in the Constitution as originally drafted. The most important of these grew out of principles which had cost the people of England oceans of blood—out of principles which were asserted in the Revolution. There cannot be any doubt of this; but if any gentleman should still have a doubt on the subject, let us see how this Constitution was to be adopted.

In the very last article of the Constitution it is declared that the ratification by the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of the Constitution between the States so ratifying the same. Eleven of the States ratified the Constitution at once. Nine would have been enough to create and constitute a Government, not only de facto but de jure. The States of North Carolina and Rhode Island did not agree to it for several years afterwards; and according to my view of it they were not parties to the Constitution. The Convention originated with the delegates from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, and perhaps some other States, who recommended that delegates should meet in Philadelphia on the second Monday in May, 1787—to do what? In order to amend and revise the Articles of Confederation. That was all the power they had. But who will say that after these delegates assembled in Convention they had not plenary power? They exercised it, and nobody has ever objected to it.

But the article of the Constitution which gives Congress power to propose amendments is that which declares that Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall find it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution, and if adopted by three fourths of the States they become a part of the Constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, and that these amendments, when adopted by three fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution.

There are thus two modes provided for amending the Constitution. If the proposed amendments come from the Legislatures of two thirds of the States, they are to be referred to a convention. But if they come from Congress, I ask whether Congress has not plenary powers to the extent of the authority given in the Constitution to propose any amendment it pleases, which is not expressly prohibited to it, or reserved to the States in the Constitution itself. Certainly it has. But I have heard the suggestion that it cannot be done because, says one gentleman, there are eleven States that are not represented here. Why are they not here? Is it our fault that they are not? We cannot coerce States to send members here. That is one of the powers of coercion which I deny. It is a personal privilege guaranteed to the States, and if they fail to avail themselves of it, it is their own fault.

This House and the Senate, as at present organized, constitute Congress, and we have a right to propose amendments to the Constitution. I do not suppose that the framers of the Constitution ever contemplated that eleven States, or any other number of States, should, upon any proposition which did not suit them, absent themselves. But it is a plain proposition that Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, may propose amendments to the Constitution. If we have not the power to do so because the Representatives of eleven States are absent, then all our acts are void. They are not what they purport to be on their face, acts passed by the Congress of the United States. That is one argument. Then, sir, the adoption of the Constitution required the consent of all the States, or, in other words, the States that did not agree to it were not to be bound by it, because in article seven of the Constitution it is expressly declared that all the States agreeing to it should be bound by it. But that is not the rule when these amendments are proposed. Three fourths of the Legislatures of the States, on the recommendation of two thirds of Congress, can propose and ratify amendments. Now, if the constitutional provision was that an amendment should receive the assent of all the States, just as that was required in the original adoption of the Constitution, I admit that the question might be raised whether or not we could proceed in this matter without the assent of those States that are now absent; many gentlemen here believing them yet in the Union, although they have thrown themselves outside of its pale for the time being. But that is not the constitutional provision.

To my mind this proposition is so plain that I had never studied much on this subject until I heard the arguments of gentlemen here, but the longer and more closely I look at it the more I become satisfied that that clause in the Constitution amounts to nothing if such objections are to be raised.

Why, sir, upon this subject of slavery, I know that Alexander Hamilton went home to New York from the Convention which framed the Constitution and told the people there that if they had not compromised on this subject there could have been no Union. I know that other men said so. That goes to satisfy my mind that if the North had held out there would, perhaps, have been no Union. On the other hand, if southern men had not demanded these compromises, in all probability a different Constitution would have been presented to the American people.

I now leave the constitutional question. I have endeavored to satisfy my own mind upon the subject, for to me it would be a stumbling-block if my mind was not clear upon it.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House while I recur briefly to some of the prominent facts connected with the history of this agitation. Chief among those, to my mind, appears the long-fixed purpose of the rebel leaders to overthrow the Government without regard to slavery, and, in fact, regardless of everything which stood in the way of their own selfish aggrandizement.

As early as 1832 we find the spirit of treason abroad in South Carolina under the leadership of Mr. Calhoun. The pretext for this demonstration and effort to destroy the Government was the unequal and oppressive operation of the tariff; but in fact the promptings of Mr. Calhoun, and those of his political school, originated, not so much in their opposition to the tariff, as from a fixed design to sever the Union and set up a southern confederacy. Calhoun, while Vice-President, having early saw the influence likely to be exerted by Mr. Van Buren in the administration of General Jackson, sought means to drive him from the Cabinet, and to produce a rupture between him and General Jackson, and to get himself in favor with the President. Failing in this, and determined to push his schemes to the point of a rupture with the Government, he sought as a pretext opposition to the tariff. I refer to the opinion of General Jackson, expressed shortly after the event, and which the history of events since that time abundantly verifies. In a letter dated at Washington, May 1, 1833, and written to Rev. Mr. Crawford, of Georgia, he says:

"I have had a laborious task here; but nullification is dead, and its actors and courtiers will only be remembered by the people to be execrated for their wicked designs to sever and destroy the only good Government on the globe, and that prosperity and happiness we enjoy over every other portion of the world. Haman's gallows ought to be the fate of all such ambitious men who would involve their country in civil war and all the evils in its train that they might reign and ride on its whirlwinds and direct the storm. The free people of these United States have spoken and consigned these wicked demagogues to their proper doom. Take care of your nullifiers; you have them among you. Let them meet with the indignant frowns of every man who loves his country. The tariff, it is now known, was a mere pretext." * * * "Therefore the tariff was only the pretext, and disunion and a southern confederacy the real object. The next pretext will be the negro or slavery question."

Thus wrote General Jackson nearly thirty-two years ago. What says Colonel Benton, whose whole history, from 1833 to the day of his death, is filled with warning upon this subject, and who sacrificed himself by refusing to worship the Moloch of slavery in Missouri, whose people are to-day reaping the bitter fruits of their persecutions and disregard of his counsels? In the second volume of his "Thirty Years in the Senate" he has furnished a truthful page for history upon this subject, and which it may be useful to introduce here. He says:

"The regular inauguration of this slavery agitation dates from the year 1835; but it had commenced two years before, and in this way: nullification and disunion had commenced in 1830, upon complaint against protective tariff. That being put down in 1833, under President Jackson's proclamation and energetic measures, was immediately substituted by the slavery agitation. Mr. Calhoun, when he went home from Congress in the spring of that year, told his friends that the South could never be united against the North on the tariff question; that the sugar interest of Louisiana would keep her out, and that the basis of southern union must be shifted to the slave question. Then all the papers in his interest, and especially the one at Washington, published by Mr. Buff Green, dropped tariff agitation and commenced upon slavery, and in two years had the agitation ripe for inauguration on the slavery question. And in tracing this agitation to its present stage, and to comprehend its rationale, it is not to be forgotten that it is a mere continuation of old tariff disunion, and preferred because more available."

Those words of Jackson and Benton were prophetic, and we are now reaping the fruits of that policy. I ask the privilege for a few moments now to review as briefly as I can the course that has been uniformly pursued by these southern men in reference to this matter from that day down to the day of the inauguration of this rebellion.

Mr. Calhoun, being thwarted on the tariff question, early went to work in reference to the slavery question. The next agitation, as we have seen, was to be upon that question, and my recollection is that the action by the anti-slavery societies of the North commenced about the same time. They saw that the field was open; they saw the purpose of those southern men, and I admit that they fanned the flame. They went side by side, seemingly at times coöperating together, each one of them, in every instance and in every movement, tending to make wider the breach between the North and the South. They talked so much about the North and the South that we who lived in the West almost came to the conclusion that there was nothing in this Union but the North and the South. We never heard of any question being discussed here unless it was a northern and southern question, and that, too, in reference to slavery.

Mr. Calhoun commenced his intrigues shortly after Mr. Van Buren had been made President, having an eye to Texas, and not being satisfied with Mr. Van Buren's position on that question, he intrigued against him, and Mr. Van Buren was defeated in the next nominating convention. In 1848 Mr. Van Buren was nominated by a convention at Buffalo, and at that stage of our political history arose what was called the free-soil party. Up to this point of time the question had not assumed a particular or definite shape as to the mode and manner in which they should agitate this question, yet it was continually broached in every possible shape without seeming to have any definite result in view.

But the administration of Polk passed off. Then arose another branch of this question, or rather, it was an addition to the old question. And what was called the free-soil party, or the Wilmot-proviso party, then arose. And in 1848 General Taylor, not upon questions and issues that sprung up between the politicians, but upon the high appreciation for his character and military ability, was nominated and elected. After his time had expired there was a convention of the Democratic party held in 1852, and nominated a candidate for the Presidency.

And whom did they nominate? Franklin Pierce, avowedly the candidate of southern men. I have nothing to say against the administration of Franklin Pierce; at least, I have no arraignment of him to make. But he was unquestionably the candidate of southern men, and could never have been nominated or elected unless they had brought him forward.

But let me refer here to some measures of importance that preceded his nomination. The compromise measures of 1850 had been adopted. Those measures were acceptable to the great body of the people both North and South. I do not think they were acceptable to the nullifiers of the South, nor do I believe they were acceptable to the abolitionists, who were fanning the flame of discord in the North. But I say that to the great mass of the American people, North and South, the compromise measures of 1850 were acceptable. And it became evident that there was a disposition among the American people to drop this slavery agitation; and when Mr. Pierce was nominated, in 1852, there was an express agreement, and stipulation, and understanding between southern men and northern men, that they would nominate and elect Mr. Pierce, and forever stop this slavery agitation. Therefore the barnburners and Wilmot-proviso men came together, with others, in support of Mr. Pierce, and he was elected.

But who denies, at this time, that his Secretary of War, who is now the president of the confederate States, shaped his course and his policy with an eye to the ultimate object that he believed was approaching? No one can deny it now. We can trace it in all his acts and movements. And after Mr. Pierce was elected, and before the election of Mr. Buchanan, there came up another question. The Territory of Kansas was to be organized; and what was the policy pursued by the southern men then? They thought it was a trump in their hands, if they could only force the principles of non-intervention, as adopted in the compromise of 1850. The Missouri compromise stood in their way, and non-intervention was one of the arguments which they used for its repeal. They believed that if they could get the Missouri compromise out of the way in the organization of the Territory of Kansas, then they could play the trump card in the great effort they were making, and win a position which would enable them ultimately to get up such a state of feeling among the people of this nation as to break it up.

A bill was brought in to organize the Territory of Kansas. I have not looked at the Journals; I have never looked at them. But I know the impression made upon my mind, and I will state it. The Senate was not satisfied with the bill as first reported by the Committee on Territories, being controlled by the Calhoun influence at the time, and referred it back to the committee. The committee reported a second time, and reported a bill for the organization of Kansas and Nebraska. The southern members were not satisfied with that, and it was referred again to the committee. I well recollect the declaration made to me by our Senator, Mr. Atchison, in reference to that matter. The committee had known very well at the first what they wanted, but they had refused to give it. Mr. Atchison said to me that if the committee, when they reported the third time, had not reported a bill to repeal the Missouri compromise, they would have taken it out of the hands of the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Douglas,) and he, Mr. Atchison, would have reported it himself. But they got their report at last. They inserted in the bill, as a sort of justification of their action, what Colonel Benton very properly and forcibly characterized as "a stump speech injected into the belly of the bill." They said that they did not intend to legislate slavery into or out of the Territory, but leave the people there perfectly free to act for themselves, in accordance with the principles of the compromise measures of 1850.

Then immediately after the organization of that Territory and the wiping out of the Missouri compromise—which was the worst measure ever adopted as a party measure by the Democratic party since its first organization—the Democratic party broke down for a time. I had belonged to the Democratic party up to that time, and continued still to act with it, yet I declare here to-day that if I could have found any other party which would have suited me better, or even as well, I should have gone into it; and I know that thousands of good Democrats did abandon the party on that occasion. By that act they had taken away the only wall of defense, other than the Constitution, that the slaveholders had against which to plant themselves for the purpose of protecting their rights against aggression. They had wiped it out; but then they had a purpose to accomplish in it. And what was that? Directly after the Territory was organized we in Missouri saw, and no doubt you heard. There was a Colonel Buford—I believe they called him—from Alabama, Georgia, or South Carolina, one of those three States. He absolutely came with a lot of young sprouts from South Carolina, from Georgia, and from Alabama, up to Kansas. They did not come as emigrants; but they came there with arms in their hands. For what? To clear the road and put slavery into Kansas. Great excitement was aroused upon the border at that time; and a number of Missourians joined in the effort. Thereupon the emigrant aid societies sprang up. They, too, came not in the capacity of emigrants; but they came trotting along with black carpet-bags in their hands, with very little, seemingly, to live upon after they got there. Every one understood their object. Each one of them had, either in his wagon or on his shoulder, a good Sharpe's rifle.

Now, that just suited the notions of those men who had sent Buford and his gang to Kansas. There was an issue. There was bloodshed there. Many men were induced to go there from Missouri. I deprecated it at the time, just as I deprecated this rebellion as a wrong. I believed then, and I believe now, that two wrongs never make a right. The conduct of the Emigrant Aid Society, and of those men who were trying, the one party to whip slavery into Kansas, and the other to whip it out, could result in no good. Oh! sir, if you could but know how the people of my district on the border of Kansas are suffering to-day and have been suffering the bitter fruits of the effort to whip slavery into Kansas and fight it in there, those people would at least have your commiseration. The men of Missouri who were engaged in that matter were the identical men who engaged in this rebellion. They joined the army of the South. Many of them are dead and gone, and those who are living are afraid to come back. But the honest inhabitants of the country there—and there were thousands and thousands of them who countenanced no such thing as this—have been made to suffer; and the result is that we are desolated, burnt out, destroyed. We have been made to drink the bitter cup to the very dregs, not by our own conduct, but by the efforts of those men who set out with the purpose to break up this Union. These facts are well recognized and understood in Missouri now. The people all see and feel that the thing was brought upon us by the causes to which I have alluded.

But, sir, they failed to make Kansas a slave State, although they had obtained the repeal of the Missouri compromise. After they had failed in that object, what was their next move? In 1856 a President was to be elected, and in the summer of that year there assembled at Cincinnati a convention which nominated Mr. Buchanan. That, I believe, was the first occasion on which South Carolina ever sent delegates to a national convention. But what was the course and conduct of the South in that convention? Do you not remember, sir, that Mr. Yancey, at the head of the Alabama delegation, came to Cincinnati with instructions from the party in Alabama which he represented that if the convention did not recognize the principle of non-intervention he should withdraw, and then they were going to make a point? But, Mr. Speaker, the compromise measures of 1850, recognizing the principle of non-intervention, had been adopted. The Missouri compromise, which was in the way of non-intervention (for that measure was intervention) had been repealed. The party then recognized in their platform for the first time (although it had been pressed on them time and again) the principle of non-intervention. Upon that principle they nominated Mr. Buchanan; upon that principle they went into the election; upon that principle their candidate was elected.

What was done during the Administration of Mr. Buchanan? I helped to elect Mr. Buchanan; I gave him my vote; but I am bound to say that, whether he knew it or not, no man is now so blind as not to see that during that Administration there was sought to be made the whole arrangement which was to give the southern men such a position in its winding up that they would be enabled safely and securely and according to their own theory to go out of the Union without any sort of trouble. With a Secretary of War, a Secretary of the Treasury, and a Secretary of the Interior, all of whom have since held high positions in the rebel army, who doubts for a moment that during that Administration they made every arrangement and pursued every policy that was calculated to give them the advantage; not the advantage as equals, but to put them in a position to accomplish their diabolical purposes? No one can doubt that. At the very close of the Administration—and I may as well mention it here because it has always been bearing upon my mind—at the very close of his Administration, if he had the nerve—oh, that we had a Jackson then!—if he had had the nerve of General Jackson, when men were talking treason upon this floor and in the Senate Chamber, just to have had his Attorney General prepare the papers and his marshal to take them into custody, and if there was no other place than the Old Capitol prison, if he had incarcerated them there, then tried them for treason and efforts to subvert the Government, there would have been no war at all. Instead of that we had seven States seceding from the Union. The laws had been violated; the rebels refused to allow the revenues to be collected, and finally they fired upon our unarmed vessels, which, if a foreign nation had done, would have kindled a fire in the hearts of the American people, and we would have had war. I suppose that even Mr. Buchanan would have gone to war. Instead of that seven States had gone out of the Union; troubles had accumulated upon us; Mr. Buchanan had scruples as to what he should do; the country was in a state of indescribable confusion.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, because I have always believed it—it has always looked so to me—that there was an implied if not an express contract between the secessionists and Mr. Buchanan to this effect, that they should shape their course so as not to interfere with him and make it obligatory upon him to go to war with them, and he would let them alone and turn all the burdens of the revolution over to his successor. It has always impressed me that that was the understanding. Whether it was or not, such turned out to be the fact.

When Mr. Lincoln's Administration came in seven States had dissolved the Union so far as they could. Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated. I have not been a Republican or a supporter of his Administration, except so far as my convictions satisfied me he was right. Every man must admit that since the days of Washington no President has entered upon the administration of the Government under such perilous circumstances. It is easy to find fault, and I have sometimes found fault myself. But I have reflected that if I occupied the stand-point he did, and seeing what perhaps he saw and I did not see, I would probably have done no better than he has done. I make no excuse for what has been done or for what has not been done. My only object is to revert to the history of the country to show that the very men who finally began this revolution were the same men who had been trying to start it for thirty years. I hold them responsible for it, and for what has been done under it.

I know, sir, that what are called personal liberty bills have been passed, and of an aggravated character; but there was no pretext in them for rebellion. Every one of them, so far as I know, when taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, have been overruled. There was a law in Pennsylvania, and under it Prigg took his case to the Supreme Court, and the opinion of that court, written by Judge Story, a Massachusetts man, laid down the rights of the several States in reference to that matter clearly in accordance to the Constitution.

A number of the States repealed these laws; but if they had not repealed them, if they had been attempted to be executed, the parties could have gone to the Supreme Court of the United States and had the difficulty properly adjusted.

Now let me tell you a fact. The census shows that from 1840 to 1850 there was a loss of slave property of one thirtieth of one per cent. The proportion had largely decreased from 1850 to 1860. The compromise measures of 1850 had been adopted, and there was a general disposition among the people North and South to let this question die out. According to the census the estimated value of the slave property lost between 1850 and 1860 was one fiftieth of one per cent., whereas ten years before it was one thirtieth of one per cent. The question was dying out, and if the southern Representatives had remained here and not seceded they would have had a majority. They could have done what they pleased in the way of legislation. Congress did, after they went away, in order to show that they had no disposition to irritate them upon the subject, pass bills for the organization of three Territories—Colorado, Nevada, and Dakota—not one of which contained a word about prohibiting slavery from going into those Territories. The Congress that did that had the power to include that prohibition, had they seen fit, as the southern members left these Halls. If those men had stood to their posts nothing could have been done contrary to their wishes; and in the Congress which just met after the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln they would have had a majority of from twenty to forty in the House, and from ten to sixteen in the Senate. The President could not have appointed a Cabinet officer without their consent, nor a foreign minister, nor could he have obtained a dollar of money to carry out any project whatever.

But I must now allude to their schemes to break up the Democratic party, and their successful efforts in that way at Charleston and Baltimore in 1860. Colonel Yancey, at a meeting in Columbia, South Carolina, in October, 1859, urged the sending of delegates to Charleston as best to give them a position to break up and divide the Democratic party, for, said he, with a national party in organization they never could succeed with their designs. When the convention met, Colonel Yancey came with instructions from his State that if the principle of intervention was not recognized by the convention, the delegates from Alabama were to withdraw. The convention at Cincinnati had adopted the principle of non-intervention, and declined to change their position. Thereupon the delegates from Alabama and a number of southern States withdrew. I asked Colonel Yancey myself why it was that four years ago he, with the Alabama delegation, went to Cincinnati with instructions, if the convention did not recognize the principle of non-intervention that they were to withdraw, and now, said I, you come here with instructions from the same party, if the principle of intervention is not recognized you are to withdraw. I recollect well his significant and emphatic answer, "We found the principle of non-intervention would not answer our purpose." We adjourned from Charleston to Baltimore to give time for the States whose delegates had withdrawn to send other delegates, but we were followed up, and some of these seceding delegates, the more successfully to carry out their plans, claimed their seats, and on being rejected a second time withdrew and nominated their own candidate, and in this way effectually broke up the Democratic party. When these delegates returned to the South, they proclaimed they had broken up the Democratic party; that Mr. Lincoln would now be elected, which would open the way for the success of their wishes. And to show what their wishes were after the election of Mr. Lincoln, in the South Carolina convention which passed the secession ordinance, Mr. Rhett said:

"The secession of South Carolina is not an event of a day. It is not anything produced by Mr. Lincoln's election, nor by the non-execution of the fugitive slave law. It has been a matter which has been gathering head for the last thirty years."

Is it not plain that they have forfeited the only opportunity they ever had of maintaining and upholding their constitutional rights? And here let me say that these men have forfeited their constitutional rights. Forfeited them how? They have rebelled against the Government; they have declared that they will not be governed under our Constitution; they have repudiated it; and yet we, the great Democratic party of the North, have been standing up to them, appealing to them, and telling them that we are ready to stand by their constitutional rights. But they indignantly spit upon us and say, "We claim no constitutional right; we have no affiliation with your Government; we throw you off, and as evidence of that here is our own independent government and constitution, and we claim nothing at your hands."

I, for one, am tired of following after those men. If they will come back; if they will, as the President said in his last message, lay down their arms; if they will ask to return into the Union, I think they could put a damper upon this amendment in the Legislatures of the States. If they would come back to-day it would be in their power to make an issue, but it is not in our power. This thing has gone so far that there is no such thing as our holding it back. They can make the issue if they choose. Let them unitedly propose to recognize this Government and Constitution, and to yield obedience to the laws made in pursuance thereof, there would be a powerful party to say, and I think the President himself would be bound to say, that is all we ask. Then this question of slavery would become a political one. It might produce some difficulty, but it could be handled better afterward. They have the power, then, to come back, and if they do not it is their fault.

And now, Mr. Speaker, that the supports of slavery, by the workmanship of southern hands are broken, and from all appearances soon to crumble into dust, we may reflect for a moment on the spell-bound terror forbidding debate with which the now revealed enemies sought to surround that subject upon all occasions, great and small. Scarcely a subject of importance could arise for the decision of the people in which these men failed to see a chance for yet more agitation. As a consequence, those men in my State who refused to participate in these agitations which had for their immediate object the embroilment of sections, and their ultimate object the disunion of the States—I say that that class of men who would not lend themselves to this treason-breeding work, had for many years prior to the war been the special object of vindictive hate and persecution. The great Senator from Missouri, for thirty years a shining light in the councils of the nation, was brought to the guillotine erected by these agitators for no other reason than that he had announced the doctrine, "let slavery alone where it is, do not send it where it is not." Scores of lesser men for like reasons were made powerless and hated by these arch-agitators; and it should be remembered that whatever of tyrannical opinion was brought to bear against freedom of speech fell at all times with great power upon those moderate men whose life was cast in the midst of it. Indeed, how common was the declaration in former days by these men, that they endured the out-spoken sentiments of the abolition extremists with more patience than they could the reasonable remonstrance of dwellers in their midst.

Mr. Speaker, now that the result, the extinguishment of slavery, is likely to be accomplished by war of their own choosing, yet gentlemen here may very well consider that rashness is still out of place in subsequent dealings under this result. This accomplished, we should at once stay the hand of confiscation, desolation, and destruction of the property and other material interests of this unfortunate people, and by our united efforts satisfy them that we seek no personal degradation for them; that after, by the prowess of our arms, we shall conquer the strong military power which has heretofore held them in subjugation, we will encourage the inauguration of a policy, so happily begun by the intrepid Sherman in his dealings with the people of Savannah. Yet another consideration may be suggested, Mr. Speaker, with this accomplished, why we should not further deal harshly with these people. It is the historical fact that twelve of the thirteen original States owned, possessed, and dealt in slaves; that for reasons satisfactory to several they parted with it, each in their turn, and to their respective advantages. There are wise persons who believe that under profound peace on this subject a like result would have followed ere this in all the border States. But by the fate of war, for which the southern leaders are solely responsible, its sudden extinction is likely to come, and the question of a few years precedence, more or less, in point of time as between the States, amounts to naught in the life of a nation, and can leave no just ground for future bickerings on the subject.

Not among the least of the developments of the times, sir, is the fact that in the dire extremities to which the fortunes of war have driven rebellion the rebels themselves now contemplate the extirpation of slavery and placing of arms in their hands to defeat the cause of the Union. Our arms at the close of last year were everywhere victorious; the forces of the rebels were by deaths, sickness, desertions, and captures, fearfully lessened. To replenish their armies and at the same time secure the fealty of their slaves, as well as reassure their discouraged friends at home and abroad, the rebel leaders are resolved to make use of our measure to abolish slavery. They saw the party with which I have acted arrayed in an almost unbroken column against this amendment; and, well knowing the unyielding nature of party spirit, they judged "the party" would stand fast to their position and thus defeat the passage of the constitutional amendments. And now with the usual dexterity of these old politicians they appear to be making every preparation to appeal to their slaves for two or three hundred thousand soldiers. They would thus be able to say to the slaves, "The Yankees have pretended to desire your freedom, but when the pinch came, when called on to pass a law giving freedom to you, they voted it down. They dislike you as much as they do us. Help us whip the deceitful wretches, and we will give you freedom; you can get it of nobody else; Lincoln's plan of freeing you was voted down."

The chances are now decidedly apparent that the rebels will thus talk to their slaves, and undertake to put into the field hundreds of thousands of them as soldiers. I would like to hear gentlemen explain to this House and the country how we benefit the Union cause by thus enabling rebels to speak and act. I would like to know if it is wise and statesmanlike to afford to the rebels an opportunity to raise such an issue against us in European courts. I ask if it is not more easy to prevent than to meet such an issue when raised before foreign Powers.

The fact that such a design and the raising of such issues are meditated appears plainly from the current news of the day. Now, sir, in view of these anomalous facts, and devoted as I ever have been to the Union of the States and the perpetuation of the principles which animated our fathers, I ask where should be found the position of the loyal man on such a question? Where, in view of which, should be found that noble array of northern men who have heretofore apologized for slavery and bared their breasts to the storm of opposition because the Constitution supported it? Where, in view of this, can be the position of the border-State loyalist? Sir, there can be but one answer in the loyal heart. If the slave is to be used in this war let him be used in the cause of the Union. Viewed in the light of the rebel purpose to use slaves in their rebellious war, there is no alternative (even if it were desirable at this late day) but to choose that the former slave shall war for the cause of Union rather than against it. Thus much I have taken the liberty to say to those noble men of the North with whom it has been my pride to act politically. Thus much I say to those who have all along realized the vast difficulties of Constitution and laws and prejudice which circumvented the slavery question, but who never made slavery paramount to the Union.

But after all, Mr. Speaker, is it anomalous in the history of the world that the slaves should be used in war? If we appeal to the history of the renowned republics of old, which tolerated slavery as does our own, we shall be convinced to the contrary. In those great civil commotions which at times so terribly shocked the Greek republics, and especially in the long and terrible civil wars of the Romans, we find slavery playing a conspicuous part in the policy of the contending factions; and those contending for the ancient and cherished forms of government, as well as those opposing, vied with each other in efforts to ameliorate the condition of the slave in consideration of the support he would give to this or that cause. But it would hereafter be anomalous in history if we should fail to avail ourselves of whatever support we can derive from this measure, when it is so apparent that our enemies are about to avail themselves of the same resource.

Mr. Speaker, I have done with the subject. In what I have said I have been prompted by no spirit of ill or hate to the mass of the southern people of the Union. I, upon the contrary, deplore the ill fortune by which for the time being they were placed under the power of evil men who for thirty years have been bent upon "precipitating them into revolution." But in what I have said I have endeavored to speak the words of truth and soberness, nothing extenuating nor setting down aught in malice. In what I have said I am amply warranted in the history of those political perturbations which culminated in this tremendous war. Vast has been the sacrifice of blood and treasure already in this war for the Union; but great though it be, we nevertheless owed it to unborn generations to come, to deliver to them unimpaired the great legacy bequeathed to us through blood and fiery trial by our ancestors. We owed it to the great cause of republicanism to show before the world that the form of government can be maintained by a republican people despite the machinations of all foes, internal and external. We owed it to all the best and brightest hopes of mankind to show that millions of freemen could rush to arms in defense of their cause, and could stand persistently by it through good and evil report. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that from the bloody ordeal and fierce chastening of the past four years our glorious nation may still brave the trials yet to come, and that ere long we shall enter the sunshine of peace, and stand before the world a free, united, and happy people.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will detain the House but a few moments, intending to divide my time with the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.]

I regard this as a marked day in American politics and American history. I am happy to follow a gentleman from a slave State—and a slaveholder too, I believe—[Mr. KING,] who advocates a constitutional amendment whereby slavery may become extinct throughout all the breadth of the land. I rejoice that the State of Iowa, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, and is known by her forty thousand majority for freedom, has so honorable a neighbor, so magnanimous and so able a philosopher and statesman upon this floor.

It seems to me this is a day of great opportunities; great for the conservative Republican who shall never more have to apologize for his votes, correcting his record; and a great day for the Democrat, who may now break the shackles of party, and stand forth with the great men and patriots in our early history, and march on in the royal highway of freedom for all nations. Sir, this is one of the days which makes the text for volumes of history big with the fate of races and an empire.

Now, sir, as I have not to talk about my own consistency, having been, so far as I know, always an abolitionist, I am here to say that I do not enter into the discussion of the simple propriety of this measure. No; at the threshold I deny that there can be property in man. I never believed in the doctrine. My whole nature revolted at it, and the reading of books of law, volumes of history, and of God's word, never taught me else than that the institution was barbaric, in defiance of natural justice, and so shameful in its pretensions that in no State in this Union has its legal existence been established by any law. And here I desired to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] when he spoke of the legal and constitutional rights of his people, where he finds a law in the State of Kentucky, or in any other slave State, that establishes the system of African slavery. It cannot be found. Slavery is an outlaw, and we are but proposing to execute the criminal that has been an outlaw for generations in this country.

It is well known that the British constitution and the common law of England and the decisions of the great jurists of England were against the existence of slavery in that country. One John Hawkins was the first to engage in the slave trade in this country. He planted the institution here. Did that legalize slavery? Did he have from his queen any authority to traffic in human beings? None. How did slavery come to exist in the colonies? From whence came the authority to hold slaves? From England? No. Did it come by colonial legislation? No. How, then, came it in these States? By brutal force. As I have already said, it is not found to be established by law in any State, and must stand here as an outlaw. The great expounders of our Constitution have said that the Declaration of Independence itself, proclaiming all men free and equal, laid the corner-stone of our Confederacy, and that it is above all constitutions and all laws. That is enough for me; and we are only tolerating here, that which should have ceased to exist long ago, and spared us civil war. Sir, if I had my preference, I would rather see slavery wiped out here by a legal decision, and announced by a chief justice—our Lord Mansfield, I trust—on the great principles of justice, rather than by the tardy action of States.

I wish now to refer for a moment to the statement made by the venerable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] that we are about by this measure to deprive his State of representation in this Chamber. How is that? They now have three fifths representation for their slaves; when the genius of liberty shall take possession of that State, and the votes of the people shall have destroyed slavery there, then their slaves will be counted as freemen. Instead of decreasing their representation, we augment it.

But the gentleman asks, What will you do with our slaves? What shall we do with them? Ah! it seems to me there is something due to those who have so long supported their masters, certainly to be let alone. Cannot they who have supported themselves and their masters in the past take care of themselves? That, sir, is a question which we can well afford to leave unanswered, since the enslaved race are establishing their manhood and fighting our battles.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] stands up here in defense of those who are now in rebellion, so far as to declare that slavery has not ruled the country. I wish, sir, that he had been more conversant with American history; that he had read less of newspapers and more of our political history. Why, sir, it is well known that the great majority of the people of this country have been controlled by the institutions of the South. We propose to break away from that control, and to stand forth free and independent, never more to be bartered away by a body of men banded together for any political or selfish purpose, much less by those in the control of tyrants.

If you look into the facts and figures in regard to this control, you will find that up to the year of the rebellion for two thirds of the time the Presidency of the United States had been held by slaveholders or southern men; you will find that of the Presidents of the Senate slavery had sixty-one out of seventy-seven; you will find that of Speakers of the House of Representatives they had twenty-one out of thirty-three; you will find that of Attorney Generals they had fourteen out of nineteen; and that they have had the Secretaryship of State nearly two thirds of the time; and since the slavery agitation, as if it were to be ready for this conflict of arms, for four fifths of the time have the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy been from the South.

Look, too, at the Supreme Court of the United States and its organization; slavery has had seventeen out of the twenty-eight members. It was organized purposely, as all the world knows, to give five judges to the slaveholding States, and four to the free States, notwithstanding that the free States exceeded the slaves States almost one third in population and one half in wealth and in business for the courts.

Thus do facts answer that assertion of the gentleman. And hence it is the business, the high and holy work of the American people henceforth to sunder these shackles, and no more to be controlled by the system of slavery which was fast binding us and defenseless to be cast into outer darkness.

Mr. Speaker, I have noticed the agonies of gentlemen over the tomb of slavery. I do not forget how they agonized, even to the going down of the sun, against the abolition of slavery in this District. There were, according to them, untold horrors looming up from that measure; but what has been the result of its passage? It has raised the value of property in this District two hundred per cent. It benefited a race and enacted justice. Not one of the horrors which filled men's imagination have visited us. Then, again, when the enlistment of negroes was proposed, we were told that the negroes would not fight, and that if we tried to make soldiers of them our white troops would resist it, and the rebels would fight with increased desperation. Neither assertion was true. So, too, on the discussion of the confiscation law, we were told that if it were passed rebels would fight to the last ditch, and our last victory was won. Twenty thousand people in Savannah and a hundred and fifty thousand in New Orleans have made your prophesy false. They came out to take food from your hands and welcome the old flag. You shed ink in great profusion in protest and opened the lachrymal founts over unborn children; yet the born children mock at your fears, and you are, gentlemen, in tolerable health to-day, except in that sense political in which you seem to be on the verge of dissolution. But there is political health to be found in this grandest opportunity of the century which is given to make the land of the Pilgrims and of Washington free; so free that another rebellion will be impossible; to make the nation's rebirth so glorious that Heaven shall look down to see.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that there has been much coaxing outside and inside of this Hall in effort to induce Democrats who have voted against the Republican party and against the amendment so long to come now and vote for the amendment. I for one do not share the solicitude of many on this point. I am in no coaxing mood. If these gentlemen see no wisdom in giving orders for a shroud, that there may be an early and decent burial of that which is in its death throes and ought to have been hastened to the tomb long ago, we can endure its putrescence till the "ides of March" at least, when at a called session of Congress, if a necessity, a jubilant majority will give the vote which they were elected to cast, and will ally their names with the honored dead of the centuries. We can pass the constitutional amendment then without coaxing, thank God. The next Congress was elected for that purpose, and we shall have an overshadowing majority which will open a new page in our political history; and to vote for this constitutional amendment is just the feast to which those members fresh from the people were invited. Those who sunder party ties and vote for it cannot fail of grateful remembrance, for slavery and Democracy have been mutual supporters for thirty years. They cling together like the Siamese twins. And so theirs shall be the folly, theirs shall be the curse, if they do not resist the sorcery of party. Let them abide together and go down to the depths "with bubbling groan," for, pleasant in their lives, in death they should not be divided.

Mr. Speaker, I need not give my reasons in full why I shall vote for this constitutional amendment. I will simply state a few of the reasons that will impel me to do so. In the first place, I will vote for it because the Constitution provides for its own amendment. Secondly, I will vote for it because it allows the people of the States to exercise their sovereignty—that "popular sovereignty" which we have heard descanted upon, lo, these many years. I propose to have a practical illustration of the doctrine. I will vote for it because it is a measure of justice to millions in chains, to hundreds of thousands fighting our bat-

les. The country demands it. The people, although their Representatives here heed not their voices, demand it. They demand it by the voice of four hundred thousand majority given in the late election to the present Executive of the United States. Above all there is a voice sounding out louder than the thunder if men would hear it; it is the voice of God to this nation, "Break every yoke and let the oppressed go free."

I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, to welcome so many who are coming into the ranks of free men, and to know that there is a breaking up of unholy alliances. I rejoice not in any mere party victory, but am gladdened in seeing men restored to their right minds and placing themselves in the currents of intelligence and patriotism, so that when there shall be a reorganization of the Government, when there shall be an adjustment, when the war is ended, we shall find men of all classes and of all parties allied together invoking the blessing of Almighty God to the end that this may be the great, the glorious, the free, the mighty nation of the earth.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I take pride in the fact, and let it go down to history, that but one gentleman on the other side of the House has stood up here to advocate "the sum of all villainies," American slavery. Thank God, he did not belong to a slave State. A thousand thanks those who live in the midst of the institution do not detract their reason and provoke the vengeance of the Almighty by standing up here in defense of American slavery. But let him, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] living on northern soil and in a mighty city, degrade, if he choose, his manhood, defame the African race, and thus bear off all the honors to which his pandering and vassalage entitle him. "Let him enjoy his solitary ignominy," is said all around me. Yes, sir, I repeat it. That gentleman, born and reared in a free State, has seen fit to stand up in this year of 1865 and declare that American slavery is the best condition of the African race. He deserves the shackles he would fasten upon others, and, as I trust in God, I believe his posterity will at least wear his brand of ignominy if not wear the chains which he would forge for others. Reproaches of scorn for slavery's defender, but thanks for those who have broken the shackles of party and are coming forth for their country! I rejoice that this is their day of freedom, and that we are now about to give liberty to millions who have no voice in this Chamber.

I will now yield the remainder of my hour to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] who desires to speak upon this question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, "property," "vested rights," "robbery," are the dying cries from the agonized hearts of the men who defend man-stealing and women-whipping, and who apologize for treason. I do not rise here for the purpose of making a constitutional argument, but only for the purpose of briefly answering those charges. It seems to me that they come from the wrong side of this question when used by the men who oppose this constitutional amendment.

"Property!" What is property? That is property which the Almighty made property. When at the creation He gave man dominion over things animate and inanimate, He established property. Nowhere do you read that He gave man dominion over another man.

"Vested rights!" What vested rights so high or so sacred as a man's right to himself, to his wife and children, to his liberty, and to the fruits of his own industry? Did not our fathers declare that those rights were inalienable? And if a man cannot himself alienate those rights, how can another man alienate them without being himself a robber of the vested rights of his brother-man?

"Vested rights" and "robbery," forsooth, from the slaveholder! Why, sir, it is passing strange that men, from usage and familiarity with a crime, will even get to using the very words and phrases in defense of that crime which legitimately and properly describe the crime itself. There never was a highwayman who had pursued his course of crime for a series of years who did not regard the execution of the law upon him for his crimes as most unjust to him. The poet has well said that—"No man e'er felt the halter draw,

With good opinion of the law."

It has been truly said by the gentleman who preceded me, [Mr. GRINNELL,] that in the statutes of no slave State in the Union can you find the origin of slavery. There is not a statute in any one of those States that ever established property in slaves; not one. It is a carbuncle; it is an ulcer; it is a cancer which has grown up by stealth upon the body-politic, and which has only from usage become familiarized to men, and they have surrounded it with the statutes protecting the relation that we find in any of the codes of the slave States. You cannot find in any statutes of any civilized nation on the face of the earth where property in things animate or inanimate is established. Nowhere is that property defined; nowhere is it declared in any statute in the world that man shall have property in this or that thing. Because, as I have said before, the Almighty having given property in these things it is only necessary that civilized society should surround it with laws to protect men in the possession and enjoyment of it.

I trust we will hear no more of robbery, of vested rights. Slavery commenced in robbery and theft, and has been carried on by a trespass, and no usage in the lapse of time can make that just or legal or right which in its origin and inception was a crime.

What is that we now propose to do? We propose to say in the organic law of the land that there shall be no more involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime. And there is another thing; we are now dealing with a class. While there may be now and then a loyal slaveholder in the rebellious States, as a class the slaveholders are traitors, as a class they brought on this rebellion, as a class they are fighting our soldiers in the field, starving our prisoners in their dungeons, and by every high-handed and ruthless outrage conducting this war of treason. That is the character of slaveholders as a class.

But there is another class of people there denominated slaves. What are they? Invariably the friends of the Union; invariably the friends of the Union soldier, giving him aid and comfort, secreting him on his stolen flight from southern dungeons to the lines of our Army, furnishing him food and shelter on the way, and diverting from him the bloodhounds on his track.

It is but a day or two since that I took by the hand the adjutant of that grand old regiment that I raised and took into the field. For a year and a half he had been sojourning in a variety of southern prisons. Escaping from Columbia with a few others, he was for twenty days and nights within the rebel lines, traveling by night, and secreting himself by day in the hut of the slave, until he reached the lines of Sherman near Savannah. In every instance, (and his tale is but a repetition of the tale told by thousands,) in every instance he could with the utmost confidence approach the humble door of the slave, either by night or by day, and rap for admittance, and could obtain there concealment, protection, and food. He was never turned away and never deceived by any slave from whom he sought assistance. The slaves guarded him; they fed him upon the best they could procure, and sent him on his way rejoicing. And when the slaveholders, those men who, according to the declaration of the member from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] are a brave, generous, and noble people, put upon his track the bloodhounds and the bull-dogs, and when their hoarse howling was heard upon his track, his pursuers were, by the arts taught by the slaves, diverted from the scent, and he was protected.

Sir, it is said, I believe, that every man looks upon and appreciates character from his own stand-point. I suppose that a man who stands upon the gallows and feels the halter drawn about his neck would regard a very disreputable person, if exempt from the doom of that punishment, as very respectable; and I suppose that, if a man has escaped the penitentiary by the statute of limitations or any other device, he would regard as very respectable a character which others might consider very ignoble. Men of a low class regard the character of others from their own low stand-point, and by a comparison with their own position in the moral scale. But it is left for the member from New York to justify and support this barbarous institution of slavery, and to declare that the slaveholders engaged in this rebellion are, par excellence, the noble, gallant, and generous people of the United States. Mr. Speaker, I do not so regard them. From the standpoint which I occupy I look upon them in a very different light. I think that they are neither just, generous, nor noble; and, sir, you shall find that, wherever slavery has existed for a series of years, it makes the slaveholder ignoble, unjust, ungenerous, and tyrannical. Such is the natural effect of the institution everywhere.

The member from New York caused to be read at the Clerk's desk a description, as I learned afterward, of some horrid scene in Africa as written by a traveler. I did not know when it was read from what source it was taken, nor had I heard what was said by the gentleman in connection with it. Forming my surmise on the character of the description, I turned to some one near me and asked whether it was a description of the horrid atrocities committed by the denizens of the Five Points and others, constituents of the gentleman, during the riot in New York city a year or two ago. It seemed so apt and complete a description of the scenes which occurred during that riot, as they were detailed in the New York papers, that I thought it must be an extract from some history of those occurrences. We all recollect that during that riot colored orphan asylums were set on fire, negro women with children in their arms were murdered, and in some instances negroes were burned. Those are scenes which were participated in by voters of that member's own city and district. You need not go to Africa to find scenes of horror.

I think that we should deal justly with the unfortunate class of people who will be freed by the adoption of this amendment. Justice, long delayed, should be awarded to them. Why, sir, suppose that by some turn of the wheel of fortune the slave should become the master, and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who addressed the House yesterday, should become the slave. Would he then cry out, "Robbery! violation of vested rights!" If we sought to strike the shackles from his limbs? Yet his slave is a man. And Thomas Jefferson declared that it was by no means impossible that some turn of the wheel of fortune might bring about that state of circumstances; and he declared that in case of a contest between the masters and their slaves the Almighty possessed no attribute that would take sides with the masters.

Mr. Speaker, I thank God that by the votes of my constituents, who sent me here by over thirteen thousand majority, I have the privilege to-day of standing up here and advocating this amendment; and I know that when the light of the past and the present and the future shall with their concentrated rays throw a focal blaze upon the page of history that we are making to-day, it will be a source of the highest pride for my children to point to the record which I make and the vote which I give to-day; while I know equally well that as to the men who may vote against this amendment, and particularly those who apologize for the institution of slavery, their action will be an everlasting disgrace to themselves and their children and their children's children. Sir, we are making history, and we are making it fast. These things will not be looked upon fifty years hence as they are now. When this usage of slavery is abolished and when we have ceased to be familiarized with the clank of chains, then we shall look upon this thing with the horror it deserves.

Mr. McBRIDE. Mr. Speaker, by the vote on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] this House will decide whether the proposed amendment to the Constitution, by which slavery shall be prohibited within the limits of the United States, shall be submitted to the several States for their action or not. No one authorized to speak for the people of the State whose interests I represent upon this floor has yet spoken upon this question in either branch of Congress, and I avail myself of the privilege of giving expression to my views with greater pleasure because my State has been hitherto unheard; and secondly, that they are in emphatic harmony with the clearly expressed sentiments of my constituents.

I shall ask the indulgence of the House for but a brief time, while I present in concise form the reasons which govern my vote on this grave question. I have no wish to enter the broad field which has been swept by this debate for the purpose of gleaning after the myriad reapers who have entered the harvest before me, but I will traverse the limited scope which I have prescribed to myself with as much rapidity as is consistent with the perspicuous presentation of the positions which I shall endeavor to establish by the way, promising to be (for I know how anxious most members are to close this debate) neither elaborate nor diffuse.

The first question that presents itself in the consideration of this proposition is whether we have the power to take the proposed action of initiating the abolition of slavery by a prohibition of it in our fundamental law; if we have not the power to do it, the rightful authority as an American Congress, then all discussion as to the propriety, the expediency, or even the necessity of the act is of course idle folly.

But, sir, I have listened carefully and attentively to the arguments of gentlemen upon the proslavery side of this question, who deny our authority to amend the Constitution as proposed, without being able to perceive the justice or soundness of their assumption. I perused with patience the ingenious argument of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] made at the last session of Congress, and reiterated Saturday last by his colleague, [Mr. BLISS,] the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRYOR,] and a member from New Jersey whom I do not choose to name. The gist of that argument being that slavery is a State institution, never submitted by them to Federal control, that it is an indefeasible right of property conferred by State laws, and not to be divested by any other sanction, is a fallacy which can, I think, be most easily and conclusively met and answered.

You assert that slavery is a local institution, deriving all its right to exist from the municipal laws of each State where it is acknowledged. I admit the assertion. You assert that it was a subject left by the framers of the Constitution to the States, to be by them controlled, legislated upon, encouraged, fostered, or abolished in the States, as to them seemed most expedient. That I also admit.

You assert that, owing its existence to State laws and State authority, and being a subject left by the framers of our fundamental law to the exclusive control of the State authority, therefore we have no right to so amend the Constitution as to take Federal control of and abolish it. This assertion I deny. The conclusion does not follow from your premises, as I now propose to demonstrate. This is a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States and to establish in that Constitution a power hitherto not possessed. That Constitution is the existing fundamental law of all the States, having been assented to and ratified by them. It contains among its provisions one by which it prescribes the methods by which the instrument may be altered, changed, and amended. Those methods are, that the two Houses may, by a two-thirds vote, propose amendments; or Congress may, on application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, call a convention to propose amendments to the Constitution; and in either case, whenever the proposed amendment or amendments shall be ratified by three fourths of the States, they shall become valid and binding provisions of the Constitution; and upon this power of amendment there is one and only one limitation, and that is that "no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." The full and complete power to amend the Constitution in any and every particular is given and confirmed by the fifth article of the Constitution, curtailed by the single existing limitation as to equal State representation in the Senate. If the States had intended, when the Constitution was originally formed, to forever keep the institution of slavery beyond Federal control, they should and would have excepted that also, with the right of equal suffrage in the Senate, from among the subjects of rightful amendment.

I grant that the right to abolish slavery was not given to the Federal authority as a legislative power, but the means by which the national Government might obtain that power through an amendment to the Constitution were given, and those we now propose to apply.

If domestic slavery was beyond our control originally, the Constitution points out the way by which we may legitimately take it under cognizance, and we are following strictly the methods it prescribes.

Sir, we are told that by this amendment, if it succeeds, we are encroaching upon the rights of the States, and that we are taking a step toward consolidation. Certainly we are; and if the States, in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, choose to yield not only the right which they have hitherto enjoyed of controlling and perpetuating the system of slavery, but every other political right exercised by them, they can unquestionably do so. It may be very unwise policy for them to do so; but it can nevertheless be done constitutionally; and that is the question I am now considering.

I think, then, that I have established the proposition that, as all the States have agreed by their ratification of the Constitution to abide all amendments which shall be made to that instrument which receives the sanction of three fourths of their number, having first passed the preliminary ordeal of a two-thirds majority of both Houses of Congress, or of a national convention, our proposed amendment is perfectly within our province and power.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I pass from the question of our power to amend, and come to the equally important practical question, the expediency of the proposed amendment. Ought slavery in these United States to be abolished? Is it our duty as statesmen seeking the good of the country and of posterity to put an end to this institution? Is it our duty as citizens, loving our country and seeking her glory and prosperity, and withal having her good name among nations committed to our care, to rid her of this institution?

Sir, it seems to me that but one patriotic answer can be given to these questions, and that is an affirmative one. View it in whatever light you may, the answer must still be the same. Look at it as a question of mere political economy, and the argument of material prosperity alone would say abolish it forever. The argument of statistics and facts, so triumphantly conclusive as to defy all attempts at refutation, which my friend from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] presented the other day, ought of itself to determine every man who seeks for the proper development of this fair western continent, to vote for the abolition of slavery on every proper occasion.

When an American citizen enters a foreign land and sees the degradation to which the downtrodden masses are subjected by their kingly rulers, his soul revolts at the injustice, but his mouth is closed against remonstrance. If he talks of the beneficence of free institutions and the glory of republican government he is told to learn to practice what he preaches before he seeks to proselyte abroad. If the American, indignant at the wrongs he sees done to unhappy Ireland by the proud rulers of England, expresses his hope to see her emancipated from their rigorous rule, he is asked to think of the millions pining in chains beneath the starry flag of the country he so proudly praises. If, burning with that instinctive hatred of tyranny which finds new fuel in the dark history that records the endurance of noble Hungary, and the oppression of despotic Austria, he ventures an utterance of the feelings of his heart, he is shamed into silence by the sneering suggestion that a more galling tyranny and a more degrading slavery stain the prosperity and dim the glory of his own fair land. If then, sir, it were only to make our Government consistent with itself, to make her an example of freedom, to which all the nations of the world might turn and be instructed, free her from every stain, and wipe off every reproach based upon the existence of human bondage; if it were only to vindicate our good name with mankind, I would vote to abolish slavery.

But, sir, I contend that the argument against the institution as an offender against the rules of common justice, as a felon self-convicted of ineffable crimes, as a traitor-assassin seeking madly the life of this free nation, demands that it be summarily sentenced without benefit of clergy. Long enough has it debauched and deadened the conscience of the people; long enough has it shocked humanity and defied Heaven by its violations of every principle of truth and morality; and now, having filled up its cup of crime and villainy by a treason so rank and foul as to shame all historic example and all criminal parallel, we, who hold the malefactor in our grip, owe it to humanity, to justice, to ourselves, and the world, to strangle the guilty monster. If, instead of being guilty of the indictment which I have presented, slavery were only an element of political discord, a constant subject of agitation and disturbance as it has undoubtedly always been, still the peace, order, and prosperity of the country demand its extinction. Glance at our brief national history and learn that no danger to our national integrity has ever existed that is not chargeable to the irritating effects of slavery. It was the one subject which in the Convention to frame our Constitution was the most difficult of adjustment, and threatened us with all the evils of national disintegration and anarchy. Its demands and exactions began then; they have ended by a vain attempt to destroy the nation which it could not longer keep in subjection beneath its iron yoke. Not a single serious danger to our nation has ever existed since we became one people that does not find its origin and motive in the institution. Foreign aggression we never feared; subjugation from abroad we have always defied; but domestic dissension, arising out of the dissimilarity of our institutions and the conflicts to which these diversities have given rise, has ever been the care and dread of our statesmen.

Slavery demanded those acquisitions of territory in 1803 which finally led to the fierce controversy as to the admission of Missouri, which came so near involving us in revolution and civil war in 1820. In 1832, taking the guise of mere commercial jealousy in the shape of nullification, it again threatened the country with the horrors of war and bloodshed. Demanding the annexation of Texas, a demand yielded to against the moral sense of the nation, and thrown to it as a "sop to Cæberus," the war with Mexico ensued, and all the fierce and bitter agitation of 1850. Not satisfied with having torn and distracted the country by that fierce excitement before which in 1850 all that had preceded it "paled their ineffectual fires," and grasping with insatiate hunger at every element of power and strength, the demon of slavery again in 1854 roused the fiery tide of sectional and political excitement by endeavoring to rob the free Territories of the nation of the fair jewel of their glory and prosperity and appropriate them for its own base uses. And for the last ten years we have had no other question in national politics deserving the name or dividing politics save slavery and its incidents. It has at every period in our history, when our integrity as a nation has been threatened, been the prompting enemy of the public peace, the active offender against order and quiet. It has filled the land with broil, with hate, with intestine commotion and irreconcilable discord. When after six years of continual and angry agitation it capped the climax of its crimes in 1860 by letting loose upon the country all the devastations of civil war—a war that has made the world stand still with horror as it gazed upon the desolation and the havoc that have marked its gory track—it left the hand of vengeance with no further excuse for clemency. It filled up the measure of its wickedness, and proclaiming itself an open enemy, it henceforth became an outlaw whom it is our duty to follow to utter extermination.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] complains that this amendment is treating Kentucky with bad faith. Sir, the charge comes with bad grace. Why, sir, in 1820 the North, confiding in the faith of Kentucky pledges, agreed to the compromise of the great statesman of the West, Henry Clay, but when the time came that the North was to realize the benefits guaranteed by that compromise, Kentucky, in the person of her Senator, made the motion which broke the plighted faith of the nation and covered the national Legislature with a stain of dishonor from which the waters of time can never wash it clean. Sir, let me ask that gentleman whether it is kind in Kentucky to insist that her interest, if in antagonism with that of her twenty-odd sisters, who he says are arrayed against her, shall be maintained and theirs sacrificed? Is it good faith to her sister States to insist that her interests shall be maintained at their expense? That slavery is the motive of the rebellion we can establish by every fact bearing upon our troubles. Why is it that West Virginia clung to the Union while the chivalry district went off in revolt? Simply because slavery was the dominant interest in the latter, and had little power in the first. Why did the free mountaineers of Tennessee rally round the flag of their fathers with an honest devotion unsurpassed by any example furnished in history, while the planting regions of the same State went frenzied into the dark abyss of rebellion? Slavery explains the reason. Go to the mountains of Kentucky and of North Carolina, where the husbandman earns his scanty living by the honest toil of his own hands, and where slave labor is the exception and not the rule, and fidelity and devotion to the Union burn as warmly and as brightly as in any part of our land. Go to the cotton and rice fields still by the sweat and moistened with the tears of the slave, and rebellion fierce and bitter seems to reign in every heart. If then rebellion is the result of slavery, let us destroy slavery and thus destroy the motive to rebellion, give peace to the country, and harmony to all our future.

But we are met with another objection, that if we emancipate we must enfranchise also. I deny the conclusion; but I should not be deterred from the move, even if it were correct. A recognition of natural rights is one thing, a grant of political franchises is quite another. We extend to all white men the protection of law when they land upon our shores. We grant them political rights when they comply with the conditions which those laws prescribe. If political rights must necessarily follow the possession of personal liberty, then all but male citizens in our country are slaves. This illustration alone reduces the conclusion to an absurdity. Sir, let the rights and status of the negro settle themselves as they will and must upon their own just basis. If, as a race, they shall prove themselves worthy the elective franchise, I tell gentlemen they will enjoy the right; they will demand and they will win it, and they ought to have it. If, on the contrary, as a race, they are so far inferior to those with whom they must compete as to be unequal to the high and responsible position of free electors, any attempt to elevate them to that standard will be a signal failure. I have no faith in their ability to contend in the race before them successfully, and no fear of degrading my own race by contact with them, for, sir, there is an antagonism between the races which will prevent anything like a complete blending of them, and I leave all questions of the consequences of emancipation to be settled by justice and expediency as experience shall dictate. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof," and I will do what right and expediency require now, and leave the consequences to be provided for as they may arise. Conscious as I am that the best interests of the country and posterity require a mitigation of the evils with which slavery has afflicted this war-desolated and strife-torn land, I will not suffer myself to be prevented from giving my aid to this beneficent proposition by any imaginary evils that it may not provide for. If the abolition of slavery shall still leave us the dregs of this pestiferous question to be dealt with at a future time, I am willing to trust the future for their settlement, well convinced that all others are mere subordinate difficulties which time and statesmanship will enable us to wisely overcome.

Mr. C. A. WHITE obtained the floor.

tution; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 386) to incorporate the National Protection Insurance Company, of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. RAMSEY also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 388) further to provide for the verification of invoices; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COLLAMER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 389) relating to clerkships in the Post Office Department; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. COLLAMER also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Elias H. Chambers, praying to be indemnified for the loss of Treasury notes destroyed by fire, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, the Judiciary Committee not deeming it advisable to report any general bill on the subject, but to leave each claim to be acted upon on its own merits.

The request was granted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) to postpone and prevent the sale, for less than their appraised value, of certain Indian lands in Minnesota; which was read, and passed to a second reading. He gave notice that he would call up the resolution to-morrow.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes, and their treatment by the civil and military authorities, reported it without amendment.

PENSIONS.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 365) in relation to pensions, have directed me to report it back without amendment, with a recommendation that it be passed. The bill is very short, and is intended to effect a very desirable object; it has the sanction of the Department; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that it be considered now. I think it will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that no person in the Army, (including regulars, volunteers, and militia,) or in the Navy or Marine corps, shall be allowed to draw both a pension as an invalid and the pay or emoluments of his rank or station in the service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 657) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June 1865, and for other purposes," so far as the same relates to witnesses in the courts of the United States.

COMPENSATION FOR CALLED SESSIONS.

Mr. BUCKALEW submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be authorized to report a bill or joint resolution providing compensation to members of the Senate at special called sessions of the Senate, commencing with the Thirty-Eighth Congress, such compensation to be confined to sessions when the House of Representatives is not convened, and to members who are required to journey from their homes to the capital in order to attend such sessions.

PRINTING OF EVIDENCE.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be authorized to print certain evidence before them relating to the right to seats of Messrs. Cutler and Smith as Senators from the State of Louisiana.

SECOND ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 385) authorizing the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War, to report it back without amendment, and with the recommendation that it pass; and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to act upon it now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for the term of one year from its passage, an officer in the War Department to be called the Second Assistant Secretary of War, whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum, payable in the same manner as that of the Secretary of War, who shall perform all such duties in the office of the Secretary of War belonging to that Department as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or as may be required by law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF NAVAL OFFICERS.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SUMNER. Will it take any time?

Mr. GRIMES. I think not.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to bring forward the resolution for the termination of the reciprocity treaty to-day.

Mr. GRIMES. We can pass this bill in a moment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 607) to provide an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit. It provides that any officer of the Navy or Marine corps, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be advanced not exceeding fifty numbers in rank, for having exhibited eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle or extraordinary heroism.

The second section provides that any officer of the Navy or Marine corps, either of volunteers or otherwise, who shall be nominated to a higher grade by the provisions of the first section of this act, or of those of section nine of an act to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the United States Navy, approved July 11, 1862, shall be promoted, notwithstanding the number of the grade may be full, but no further promotions are to take place in that grade, except for like cause, until the number is reduced to that provided by law.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported the bill with an amendment in section one, line five, to strike out the word "fifty" and insert "thirty," so that the clause will read:

That any officer of the Navy or Marine corps, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be advanced not exceeding thirty numbers in rank, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

MANSLAUGHTER IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No.

595) to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. As it is but a short bill and it will take but a moment to consider it, and as I presume there will be no objection to it, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider it at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which proposes to amend the second section of an act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia, approved March 2, 1831, so as to read as follows:

That every person duly convicted of manslaughter, or of any assault with intent to kill, shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor, for the first offense, for a period not less than two nor more than eight years, and for the second offense, for a period not less than six nor more than fifteen years.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 337 for consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 337) authorizing the payment to the Adams Express Company of the amount of certain Treasury notes destroyed or irrecoverably lost while in their custody was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Adams Express Company the sum of $22,080, being the amount of certain United States Treasury notes, commonly called legal-tender notes, destroyed or irrecoverably lost while in the custody of the company, the same having been placed by them in an iron safe and shipped from New York on board of the steamer Bio Bio, which steamer, after being partially burned, sunk beneath the water in front of the levee at New Orleans, on the 22d of March, 1863, carrying down with her the iron safe and contents. But this payment is not to be made until the company shall execute to the United States a bond, with security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned to indemnify the United States against all loss, cost, or damage incurred by reason of the payment, and that if the safe shall be hereafter recovered or brought to land the company shall repay to the United States this sum of money.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to know what evidence there is in this case that the Treasury notes were lost, and what evidence there is of their amount. Let the report be read.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The testimony in the case is very full and I think conclusive as to all the points that are raised by it. An abstract of it is set forth in the report; but the facts are simply these: the Adams Express Company shipped on board this steamer for their customers a large amount of Treasury notes, much larger than those they claim embraced in the bill. The vessel proceeded on her voyage, the bills being in an iron safe inclosed in an iron-strapped wooden box, and at Havana the box and safe were moved from between decks to the lower hold of the steamer. She arrived at New Orleans during the night of the 21st of March, and early the next morning was found to be on fire. Efforts were made to extinguish the fire, but before they succeeded the vessel, owing to the burning of her hawsers, slid from the levee into deep water and sunk. Diving bells were immediately employed, and they persevered in their efforts for some six or seven weeks; but owing to the accumulation of sand over the vessel they were unable to recover anything except some few pieces of machinery. Nothing, I believe, was got out of her.

The evidence on these points is full and conclusive, as I have already remarked, and shows that these notes are there in deep water, and owing to the character of that river, and the rapid formation of these sand-bars, are probably irrecoverable on that account. But beyond that, they have now been under the water some twenty months, and that would insure their destruction, I think, in the position in which they are. It will be observed that in the bill which the Committee on Finance have reported they have provided that these parties shall give security that the amount to be paid to them shall be refunded if the bills are recovered, and is to be refunded if the safe is recovered or brought to land in any way. The committee consider that these bills are irrecoverably lost or destroyed.

I had in my possession at the last session, but they have been mislaid during the recess, letters from the president and principal officers of several banks in the eastern cities, some three or four, I think three in Boston and one in New York, who state that it is their custom, three of them say, on proof of the destruction of their bills, to refund the amount to those who were their holders. The fourth says it is the custom on proof of loss without destruction. Considering this to be a clear case of destruction, or what is equivalent to destruction, an irrecoverable loss, fortified by these precedents of the common usage of our banking institutions throughout the country, and these being mere circulating bills, notes that go from hand to hand, the United States having received value for them, and as without the production of full proof of the loss of the bills the Government cannot be called on to refund them, the committee thought it was a clear case of justice and right, and that the relief ought to be accorded.

Mr. DAVIS. There are some cases somewhat similar to this before the Committee on Claims, of which I am a member, and I see that this morning another claim of the same character has been referred to the same committee. It is perfectly plain that these cases are going to multiply very greatly in number and amount. Where it is clearly and satisfactorily established that bills have been destroyed, I suppose some such measure as this would be not unjust or improper. With a view to that point, I will ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read, as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of the Adams Express Company for the passage of an act authorizing the issue to them of new Treasury notes in the place of others alleged to have been destroyed while in their custody, respectfully report:

That from the proofs submitted to them it satisfactorily appears that several packages addressed to various parties at New Orleans, and containing in the aggregate $22,080 in legal tender Treasury notes, were, by the said company, together with various other packages, placed in an iron safe, which was sealed and inclosed in an iron-strapped wooden box and shipped at New York on board the steamer Bio Bio, consigned to the agent of the company at New Orleans. The steamer left New York on the 10th of March, 1863, stopped at Havana, where the said box and safe were removed from between decks to the lower hold, and arrived at the levee at New Orleans during the night of the 21st of the same month, and early on the next morning was discovered to be on fire. Every effort was made to extinguish it, but without success, until, in consequence of the burning of her masts, the steamer slid from the levee and sank beneath the surface of the water. Divers were speedily employed, and the use of diving bells and other wrecking appliances resorted to and continued for six or eight weeks, but without other result than the recovery of a few cases of merchandise and some of the machinery and equipments of the vessel. It seems that there is a strong eddy at the place where the steamer sank, and that the wreck was soon buried in sand or alluvion, rendering the further efforts of the divers unavailing, and the recovery of the safe and contents apparently impossible.

From the facts stated, the Treasury notes in question having now been under water more than fourteen months, the committee believe that the destruction of the said notes is complete, even if the safe and contents are not absolutely irrecoverable. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not rise for the sake of objecting particularly to this bill at this time if the Senate are prepared to enter upon this question of paying claims of this character. The Committee on Claims have had a very large amount of this class of cases referred to them, and I had supposed that this case was there. I have had my attention called to it a number of times. We have not yet felt called upon to present to the Senate cases of this kind. There was a paymaster on this very steamer that wants relief, who lost his money. This is a relief bill for the Adams Express Company. There are piles of such bills now before the various committees of this body; and if this is to be established as a precedent to pass all the balance of them I shall oppose it; that is, I shall be opposed to entering upon that work at this time. I do not think we are prepared for it; and I think the Adams Express Company are no greater sufferers than individuals who have lost a vast amount in the same way. I do not know why we should take this case, in the interest, as it is, of a very large and wealthy corporation, and pass a bill for their relief, while paymasters and commissaries, private individuals, have, I think I may be safe in saying, millions of claims of this very character presented before this Senate. Unless the chairman of the Committee on Claims, who has had this question particularly in charge, wishes to enter upon the payment of this class of claims now, I shall ask for its postponement.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—
Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend from Kentucky will allow me I will submit a motion that this bill be committed to the Committee on Claims. As they have similar claims before them I think that probably would be the best disposition of it. I move, therefore, that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS. I was going to make that motion myself.

The motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate now proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution relating to the reciprocity treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, the pending question being on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I sometime ago, when this resolution was under consideration in the Senate, moved that it be postponed until the 6th of January, and the Senate were courteous enough to postpone it under the impression, as it seemed to be from the talk, that I desired to address the Senate upon it; but I had no such desire in particular. I looked upon the measure as one that would be highly disastrous to the best interests of the country. I believed that it resulted not from any broad views of its operation, for I am compelled to say—I regret to say it, but I say it with all courtesy to the Senate—that it seemed to me there was a very great lack of information on the subject, and which the Senate ought to have before they acted upon it; and, to be perfectly candid, I must say that it appeared to my mind the Senate were about to rush upon a course of legislation stimulated by passion and resentment at some fancied wrong that this country was suffering under from the action of these colonial governments.

I was one of those who at the time this treaty was adopted looked upon it with great favor. I looked upon it as a mark and a step in the right direction. I looked upon it as one of those healthful indications of the application of Christian principle to the legislation and diplomacy of nations. I believed that it was an onward path in the march of national morals indicative of a better and a purer and a higher state of things than that which had heretofore prevailed. I believed so then, and I believe so now; and to my mind this proposition to abrogate the reciprocity treaty is a step back from the advancing civilization of the present age to the dark ages of restriction which so long hampered the progress of nations.

I am surprised at the haste with which this proposition is now urged. The nation is about to retrace its well-considered steps from a position which it took so long ago; and at whose instance? Not at the instance of the Committee on Commerce, although the commercial interests are those that are to be most vastly affected by it. Not at the suggestion of the Committee on Finance, from which it should have appropriately been advised if the real reason for this measure was the one that was hinted at by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] that the treaty ought to be abrogated at a time like this when we were looking about us to find subjects of taxation to replenish and to aid our exhausted Treasury. If that was the ground on which this resolution was placed, I would not say a word against it. If it had originated from a purpose and a desire to aid the national Treasury in this hour of the country's peril, to supply men or money for the gigantic effort which we are now making for national existence and national honor, I never would have said one word or one syllable against it. But that is not the ground. The Committee on Commerce have not been heard from. The Committee on Finance have not been heard from. It comes from the Committee on Foreign Relations; and therefore I think it may be considered as coming not from the commercial nor from the financial interests, nor those who represent those interests.

I have been a little astonished also that in this great measure, in this, to my mind, retrograde movement in the national legislation, we should have been called upon to take so momentous and to my mind so disastrous a step without any report even from the Committee on Foreign Relations, setting forth the reasons why it has been recommended at this time. I know that an attempt has been made to kill this treaty by calling it bad names. Even the candid and ingenious Senator from Massachusetts speaks of it not as "the reciprocity treaty," but as "the so-called reciprocity treaty." It has been said that it operates all one way; that it is one-sided.

I am reminded by that of a similar argument that was used to me some twenty years ago, when I first had the honor of a seat in Congress. I boarded in a mess where there were two or three gentlemen from the State of South Carolina. In looking over the census, I remarked that from 1820 to 1830, I think it was—or it may possibly have been the next decade, from 1830 to 1840—while the country had wonderfully progressed, the singular fact appeared that the city of Charleston, in South Carolina, had not only made no comparative increase, but had made an actual decrease; so that at the end of those ten years she was less in population than she had been ten years before. I confess the matter struck me as singular, and I called the attention of the gentleman representing South Carolina who boarded with me to it, and asked him what it meant. He looked at me as if he considered me exceedingly green to ask such a question, and replied at once promptly, "It is the tariff; the tariff does it." I waited a moment, and then inquired, "What particular feature of the tariff is it that has operated so disastrously upon Charleston, South Carolina?" "Well," he replied, "perhaps it would be difficult to put your finger upon the precise feature, but it is the general operation of the whole thing, raising the price of everything that we have to buy and lowering that of everything we have to sell." [Laughter.] Quite as indefinite and quite as unsatisfactory are the reasons assigned by those who urge the abrogation of this treaty.

I have endeavored to look into this subject a little, and but a very little, for I do not represent a great commercial community. I do not represent the city of Boston, whose life is commerce. I do not represent the Empire City, whose daily food and daily breath is commerce. But, sir, I have an interest in common with all the members upon this floor in everything that relates to the welfare of my country, and what relates to the welfare of any part of it, Boston, New York, or any other place, relates to me; and I have taken the trouble of looking somewhat at the operation of this treaty in gross. It may be possible, and I have no doubt that it is so, that some special pleader may put his hand upon some particular article and show that since the adoption of the reciprocity treaty there has been less of it exported from the United States to the British provinces than there was before the adoption of the reciprocity treaty. But, sir, what do the official tables furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury show in relation to the practical operation of this treaty? I will read from a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury communicated to the House of Representatives February 21, 1864, in answer to a resolution of the House of December previous.

It will be recollected that this treaty was adopted in 1854. I have here, in this letter of the Secretary, a statement of the value of the imports into Canada. This table relates simply to the imports into Canada from the United States for thirteen years, from 1850 to 1862 inclusive, with the amounts of duties paid. For instance: in 1850 the total imports into Canada from the United States were $6,594,860, and the amount of duties paid was $1,069,814. They went on gradually increasing, sometimes from year to year varying a little; but in 1855, the next year after the ratification of this treaty, our exports to Canada alone went up to $20,828,676, they being but $15,533,098 the year before; the next year they were $22,704,509, and in 1862 they were $25,173,157. Thus it will be seen that under the operation of this reciprocity treaty the exports from the United States to Canada have increased from six million to twenty-five million annually—more than quadrupled.

I will show you now another table. The value of free goods imported into Canada in 1850 was $791,128; and they gradually increased until they had got up to $19,044,374 in 1862, the last year that there was any return. The value of free goods imported into Canada had increased from considerably less than $1,000,000 up to nearly $20,000,000. Notwithstanding this great increase, more than thirty times, of the amount of free goods, by which the vast amount of exports to Canada went in duty free, the value of duty-paying goods had actually increased from 1850 to 1862, under the operation of this reciprocity treaty to $6,128,783. While the goods imported free of duty had increased more than twenty fold, from less than a $1,000,000, up to $20,000,000, or a fraction less than that amount, the duty-paying goods had also increased at the same time.

I have been told by some persons who probably did not know any better, that Canada had made alterations in her tariff; that while she pretended to have a reciprocity treaty which, as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts says, was a reciprocity treaty only in name, she had altered her own tariff, and made the revenue which she collected burdensome to our commerce. I have here the rate per cent. of the duties paid, furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, by which it appears that the rate per cent. of duty paid on exports to Canada in 1850 was 18.43 per cent., and they have never been higher than 20.64 per cent.; that is, they have risen from 18.43 to 20.64; but that has been decreased since, so that in 1861 the last year named in the tables of the Secretary, the duties were nineteen per cent. I will give the duties from year to year. In 1850 they were 18.43; in 1851, 18.26; in 1852, 18.82; in 1853, 16.94; in 1854, 16.42; in 1855, 15.60; in 1856, 16.13; in 1857, 16.10; in 1858, 19.02; in 1859, 20.20; in 1860, 20.64, which is the highest they ever were; and in 1861, the last year these tables give the rate per cent. of duties, they were nineteen per cent. In other words they were a very small fraction over a half per cent. larger than they were in 1850. That is the legislation of the Canadian authorities in regard to duties; so that the pretense that there has been any unfair advantage taken by way of duties upon the country is a mistake.

The tables which I have just read relate to the imports into Canada. The exports to Canada and the provinces—for there are four other provinces, and I think but four—are given by our Secretary in a table commencing in 1821 and ending in 1863. In 1853 the whole domestic exports to Canada and all the provinces from the United States were $7,404,087. In 1854, the year of the treaty, they went up to $15,204,144; in 1855 they were $15,806,642; in 1856 they were $22,714,697, and so they go on; and in 1863, the last year which the table furnishes, they were $28,629,110.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand the rate of duty which the Senator reads to be the average rate upon all articles.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. While the average rate of duty has been maintained about the same, has there not been a very great increase upon certain specific articles?

Mr. HALE. I am not advised of that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Because, after all, the duties may be arranged very greatly to our disadvantage, and yet the average remain the same.

Mr. COLLAMER. That percentage, I take it, is on their whole importation, free and all.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is the percentage on the whole; but there may be a very great variation on different articles, and yet retain the same average. Therefore, unless we understand how the rates have been averaged on particular articles, I do not see that the average rate answers the complaint at all.

Mr. HALE. I do not know how these tables are made; but I have no idea that they include the free goods.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I cannot believe a word of that, with all respect to the Senator, because the table purports to give the value of free goods, and then in the next column the value of duty-paying goods, the amount of duty paid, and the rate per cent.

Mr. COLLAMER. That furnishes elements enough, I take it, to ascertain it.

Mr. HALE. If I have the slightest understanding of the English language and arithmetic figures, that 18.43 per cent. is the rate of duty on the duty-paying goods.

I was going on with this other table which includes the exports both to Canada and the provinces, with the total of imports from both; and they have increased, as I said, from $2,009,336 in 1821 to $28,629,110 in 1863; and the imports have gone up from $490,704 to $19,299,995. Here are a great number of tables shown and presented, and if they were considered I think they would lead the Senate and everybody else to the conclusion that the treaty is not entirely obnoxious to the charge of being one-sided altogether. It has increased your commerce, and increased it in a very vast proportion.

I am not prepared to go into the details of this matter, because, as I have said, I have not examined it. I was astonished to find a measure like this, which is to affect our commerce so materially and in so important a manner, pressed upon the country without the Senate waiting to get the slightest information from the commercial world upon the operation and bearing of this treaty. This subject is now, while I address the Senate, under the consideration of the Chamber of Commerce of New York. They have had it under consideration. It has been referred to a select committee, and that committee have made a report. I was desirous of seeing that report. I addressed a letter to the Chamber of Commerce expressing my desire to see it, hoping that it would furnish some light that might possibly have some influence here in the Senate. The president of the board wrote to me that the report was a very able one, that it was ordered to be printed, and that as soon as it was printed he would furnish me with a copy of it, which I have not yet received. I believe the report has been made within a week. I understand through the papers, though I do not know it, that the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Chicago have also had the subject under consideration, and they have made a report upon it. I do not know what the character of that report is, but I am told that it is adverse to the abrogation of this treaty. It seems to me, sir, this country if it lives at all must live by commerce; and as commerce is the only mode we have adopted except under the stringencies of war for the raising of revenue, that it would be well for the Senate and for the Congress to hear from that great vital interest of the country which is to be so seriously affected by this measure before they enter upon any hasty legislation on the subject.

Mr. President, there is another question connected with this subject, the question relating to our fisheries. If there has been any one subject upon which this country has been excessively anxious and cautious and sensitive it has been in relation to our fisheries on this northeastern coast. It has been the subject of very difficult diplomatic correspondence. It was so at the formation of the treaty at the conclusion of the war of 1812. So ill-defined were our rights under the existing treaties with Great Britain in regard to these fisheries that immediately preceding the ratification of this reciprocity treaty we were upon the point of war with Great Britain in relation to them. Our fishing vessels had been seized by the British Government within waters which the British Government contended we had no right to occupy. Mr. Webster, who was never supposed to be fond of surrendering any rights of this country, admitted, when Secretary of State, that the construction put upon the previous treaty of 1818 by Great Britain was the right one. We were upon the point of war when this reciprocity treaty so happily adjusted these difficulties. The question arose in this way: Great Britain contended, or the colonial authorities contended and the claim was sanctioned by Great Britain, that the right of the British Government to exclude our fishermen from their waters three miles of the coast was measured from the headland of one point to the headland of another, and excluding our fishermen entirely from the bays and three miles outside of the bays. That construction was resisted by us, but was contended for by Great Britain, and, as I say, it had produced collision and the capture of some of our fishermen. That was all happily adjusted by this treaty.

As I have said, the subject of the fisheries is one upon which this country has always been extremely sensitive. So exceedingly careful have the Congress of the United States been to preserve this right, that now, in time of war, when we are taxing the people to the utmost point of endurance, and they are paying those taxes liberally and cheerfully, this fishing interest is considered so absolutely indispensable to the welfare of the country as a means of training the seamen necessary in war, that when the impression seemed to be pretty general that the fishing bounties were to be abandoned, the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MONNIE]—as he knows how to do as well as any other man—set forth in such strong and vivid characters the claim of these fishermen to the favorable consideration of the Government of the country that he actually induced the Senate to refuse to suspend those bounties to these fishermen in time of war on the ground that they were necessary as a matter of encouragement to the nurture of fishermen who were to fill our Navy; and the law now stands on our statute-book to pay this bounty to these fishermen, and to pay it upon that express and sole ground that the fisheries are necessary as a school of nurture and education for seamen.

I confess that I was a little surprised at the difference with which my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] seemed to regard this question, for it seemed to me that in the sentiments he avowed he went entirely counter to what I understand to be the policy of this country from the time we have been a country, from the Revolution and the war of 1812. If he tells me that the construction that the British Government put upon the old treaty, excluding from three marine miles of their shore, and measuring that shore from headland to headland, does not debar our fishermen from anything that is valuable, I think he is excessively mistaken. I think if the fishermen of this country could be heard on this subject they would say that they would rather give up the bounty than have that restriction restored by the abrogation of that treaty.

Suppose this treaty is imperfect; suppose its operation is not everything that we could wish it to be; and I do not contend that it is, I am willing to believe all that gentlemen say, that there are some things about it which may be amended and ought to be amended. Let me ask the Senator from Massachusetts how does he propose to get it amended? Why, sir, by abrogating the whole of it; blotting it out. What do you surrender by that? You surrender your right of fishing; you surrender the right of the navigation of the St. Lawrence; you surrender the right of carrying vessels down through the Welland canal; you isolate the lakes; and you surrender all that upon the suggestion that after you have done this you can institute some new measure of diplomacy and inaugurate some new treaty by which everything that is valuable to us may be secured. Sir, it is a delusive idea. If you abrogate this treaty it will be looked upon in Canada, it will be looked upon by Great Britain, and it will be looked upon in this country, by some, certainly, as a measure of retaliation springing out of a resentment, which I grant you is just, for some wrongs we have suffered at the hands of these colonies.

But, Mr. President, we had better be a little cautious before we take so decided a step. I understand from the best authority that the Canadian Government are now doing all that can possibly be asked of them by this Government, in their efforts to suppress anything like what has unhappily occurred; that they have called out a very large military force, and that they have offered to our Government almost any measure of relief and precaution that the Government may suggest. I think it is a fact that they have offered, if there are any individuals in Canada in whom this Government have perfect confidence, and whom they would like to have in authority, to appoint them and to commission them. I believe honestly that everything that people and that Government can do that is consistent with their own honor and the most friendly purpose to serve us has been done, and is being done at this moment. If we abrogate this treaty at this time, while those who are favorably disposed to this country are endeavoring to do all their duty and their whole duty to us in this hour, in what condition shall we place them? Sir, I will tell you just exactly what we shall do: we shall strengthen the hands of the rebels and weaken the hands of our own friends.

I think it is a tolerably well settled fact that Canada and the United States will continue for some time, to say the least, to be contiguous and conterminous in territory, and that no action of the Senate can by any means alter that. I take it that the relative relation on the face of the globe of Halifax and Boston will remain very much as it is now for some time to come. The question is, how shall we conduct ourselves in regard to these neighbors, and what is our interest?

Among the reasons that were suggested for abrogating this treaty, or among the consequences of it, it was suggested by one member of the Senate, I believe the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] that it would reduce the great interests of that country, their railroads, &c., to a state of bankruptcy if not of pauperism. Suppose it would; suppose that that suggestion emanated from the profoundest political wisdom, and was eminently true, is it our interest to reduce our neighbors to poverty and to bankruptcy, or is it the interest of this country, a commercial country, that the Canadas and our neighbors, as long as they are our neighbors, shall be prosperous, and eminently prosperous, if they do not by that prosperity impoverish us? What was the great argument with which Henry Ward Beecher electrified England in his visit to Great Britain? He asked them, "What is your interest? To have the country filled up with slaves that buy no cloth, no luxuries, or to have it filled up with an industrious and enterprising free population, who, for their own use and their own interests, will make a market for your productions and your manufactures?" The argument had infinite force in it; and if it had force when it applied to the slave States in their relations to the rest of the world, does it not eminently have force when applied to our colonial neighbors? Is it for our interest that they should be rich, prosperous, wealthy, and enterprising, enabled to buy of our manufactures, and go on as they have, in the short space of thirteen years quadrupling what they buy of us, or to reduce them to bankruptcy and poverty? In doing that we injure ourselves quite as much as we injure them.

These are some of the reasons which induce me to oppose the abrogation of this treaty; but I see that it is a foregone conclusion. I think that gentlemen take counsel of their passion rather than of those broad reasons which relate to the present and the progressive welfare of the country. Our welfare and our progress is bound up with that of the rest of the world, and it is more so with those neighbors that are near and proximate than those who are far off. I believe that this treaty, as has been shown by the tables which have been exhibited, has been eminently wise and salutary in its effect; that under it commerce has grown up and prospered as it has in no other country under heaven. Notwithstanding the vast increase of free goods which we have sent to Canada and Canada to us, the amount of duty-paying goods has increased at the same time; so that all these millions are absolutely added to the commerce of the country by the operation of this reciprocity treaty.

I hope, sir, that until some gentleman can point out some great injury that has been wrought, or has been threatened, or is in store for us, the Senate will pause before passing the measure before it. I hope, at least, that it will not be rushed through at this time. I hope that the Senate will wait until they can hear from the city of New York, which pays so very large a proportion of the revenue collected from customs, and her merchants who feel a lively and vital interest in this matter, and who are now taking counsel upon it, and will perhaps at a very early day be prepared to suggest their views to the Senate upon it.

As I said at the commencement, I have not given this subject an elaborate examination. When it came up it was not my purpose to do it. The most that I wanted was delay that those who were better able to present their views on the subject than I was might have an opportunity to be heard; and I am of the same opinion now. I think that they should be heard upon it. There certainly can be no reason for this haste. If the notice is given, I believe a year must elapse before it will have its effect, and notwithstanding we give the notice the treaty will exist for a year.

Does anybody suppose that the abrogation of this treaty in this manner will have a tendency to make those people listen favorably to any suggestion of ours for another or a new treaty? I believe not. The Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives not long ago made a report on the subject, in which they made a suggestion which I think is an eminently wise one, and one which I think should be listened to at the present time. I desire to read an extract from the report made in the House of Representatives on this subject. The committee say:

"The Committee on Commerce believe with the Legislature of New York that 'free commercial intercourse between the United States and the British North American provinces and possessions, developing the natural geographical and other advantages of each for the good of all, is conducive to the present interests of each, and is the proper basis of our intercourse for all time to come,' and that such measures should be adopted as will fully carry into effect the principles announced by the British minister at Washington in 1859, 'for the confirmation and expansion of free commercial relations between the United States and the British provinces,' and to 'regulate the commerce and navigation between her Majesty's possessions in North America and the United States in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory,' as was intended and expressed by the treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, and commonly known as the 'reciprocity treaty.'"

"The Committee on Commerce would therefore recommend that three commissioners be appointed by the President of the United States to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain in that behalf, with a view to enlarging the basis of the former treaty, and for the removal of existing difficulties."

If the treaty is imperfect and needs amendment, that is the true, statesmanlike, Christian way of amending it. I have no doubt that if this Government came forward in such a spirit and with such a proposition, it would be reciprocated by Great Britain. But if, on the other hand, smarting as we now are under what we believe and what we feel to be injustice on the part of these colonies, we resort to this legislation at this time, in this hour, under such impulses, it will tend to increase and intensify all the bad feelings that have unhappily existed; will, in fact, retard, if not render utterly impossible, any future progress in the line of reciprocity between these two countries. For these reasons, sir, I hope that the treaty will not be abrogated.

Mr. SUMNER. The reciprocity treaty has a beautiful name. It suggests at once exchange, equality, equity; and it is because it was supposed to advance these ideas practically that this treaty was originally accepted by the people of the United States. If, however, it shall appear that while organizing an exchange it forgets equality and equity in any essential respect, then must a modification be made in conformity with just principles.

I mean to be brief, but I hope, though brief, to make the proper conclusion apparent. It is a question for reason and not for passion or sentiment, and in this spirit I enter upon the discussion.

The treaty may be seen under four different heads, as it concerns, first, the fisheries; second, the navigation of the St. Lawrence; third, the commerce between the United States and the British provinces, and fourth, the revenue of the United States.

1. The fisheries have been a source of anxiety throughout our history, even from the beginning, and for several years previous to the reciprocity treaty they had been the occasion of mutual irritation, verging at times on positive outbreak. The treaty was followed by entire tranquillity, which has not been for a moment disturbed. This is a plain advantage which cannot be denied. But so far as I have been able to examine official returns, I do not find any further evidence showing the value of the treaty in this connection, while opinions, even among those most interested in the fisheries, are divided. There are partisans for it in Gloucester, and partisans against it in Maine.

If the treaty related exclusively to the fisheries, I should not be willing to touch it. But the practical question is, whether the seeming advantage in this respect is sufficient to counterbalance the disadvantage in other respects.

2. Next comes the navigation of the St. Lawrence. But this plausible concession has proved to be little more than a name. It appears that during the first six years of the treaty only forty American vessels, containing 12,550 tons, passed seaward through the St. Lawrence, and during the same time only nineteen vessels, containing 5,446 tons, returned by the same open highway! These are very petty amounts when we consider the value of the commerce on the lakes, which, in 1856, was $587,197,320, or when we consider the carrying trade between the United States and the British provinces. Take the years 1857-62, and we shall find that during this period the shipping of the United States which cleared for the British provinces was 10,707,329 tons, and the foreign shipping which cleared during this same period was 7,391,399 tons, while the shipping of the United States which entered at our custom-house from the British provinces was 10,056,183 tons, and the foreign shipping which entered was 6,453,520 tons. I mention these things by way of contrast. In comparison with these grand movements of value the business which we have been able to do on the St. Lawrence seems to be trivial. It need not be considered as an element in the present discussion.

3. The treaty may be seen next in its bearings on the commerce between the two countries. This has increased immensely; but it is difficult to say how much of this increase is due to the treaty and how much is due to the natural growth of population, and the facilities of transportation in both countries. If it could be traced exclusively or in any large measure to the treaty, it would be an element not to be disregarded. But it does not follow from the occurrence of this increase after the treaty that it was on account of the treaty. Post hoc ergo propter hoc is too loose a rule for our Government on the present occasion.

The census of the United States and of the British provinces will show an increase of population which must not be disregarded in determining the origin of this increase of commerce.

There are also the railroads furnishing prompt and constant means of intercommunication which have come into successful operation only since the treaty. It would be difficult to exaggerate the influence they have exercised in quickening and extending commerce. I cannot doubt that the railroad system of the two countries has been in itself a reciprocity treaty, more comprehensive and equal than any written on parchment.

The extent of trade before and after the treaty may be seen in a few figures.

In the three years immediately preceding the treaty the total exports to Canada and the other British provinces were $48,216,518, and the total imports were $22,588,577; being of exports to imports in the proportion of one hundred to forty-six.

In the ten years of the treaty the total exports to Canada and the other British provinces were $256,350,931. The total imports were $200,399,786. According to these amounts the exports were in the proportion of one hundred to seventy-eight. If we take Canada alone we shall find the change in this proportion greater still. The total exports to Canada in the three years immediately preceding the treaty were $31,846,865, and the total imports were $16,589,624; being in the proportion of one hundred to fifty-two; while the total exports to Canada alone during the ten years of the treaty were $170,371,911, and the total imports were $161,474,349, being in the proportion of one hundred to ninety-four.

I present these tables simply to lay before you the extent and nature of the change in the commerce between the two countries. But I forbear embarking on the much-debated inquiry as to the effect of a difference between the amount of exports and of imports, involving as it does the whole perilous question of the balance of trade. In the view which I take on the present occasion, it is not necessary to consider it. The reciprocity treaty cannot be maintained or overturned on any contested principle of political economy.

4. I come, in the last place, to the influence of the treaty on the revenue of our country; and here the custom-house is our principal witness. The means of determining this question will be found in the authentic tables which have been published from time to time in reports of the Treasury, and especially in the report made to Congress at this session, which I have in my hand.

Looking at these tables we find certain unanswerable points. I begin with an estimate founded on the trade before the treaty. From this it appears that, if no treaty had been made, and the trade had increased in the same ratio as before the treaty, Canada would have paid to the United States in the ten years of the treaty at least $16,373,880, from which she has been relieved. This sum is actually lost to the United States. In return Canada has given up $2,650,890, being the amount it would have collected, if no treaty had been made. Here is a vast disproportion, to the detriment of the United States.

Here is another illustration, derived from the tables. During the ten years of the treaty the United States have actually paid in duties to Canada alone $16,802,962, while during this same period Canada has paid in duties to the United States the very moderate sum of $930,447. Here again is a vast disproportion, to the detriment of the United States.

The same inequality may be seen in another way. During the ten years of the treaty dutiable products of the United States have entered Canada and the other provinces to the amount of $83,347,019, while during this same period dutiable products of Canada and the other provinces have entered the United States only to the amount of $7,750,482. During this same period free products of the United States have entered Canada and the other provinces to the amount of $118,853,972, while free products of Canada and the other provinces have entered the United States to the amount of $178,500,184. Here again is a vast disproportion, to the detriment of the United States.

Add to these various results the statement in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has been just laid on our tables, in the following words:

"The treaty has released from duty a total sum of $42,333,257 in value of goods of Canada more than of goods the produce of the United States."—Foreign and Domestic Commerce, 1864, page 93.

This conclusion is in substantial harmony with that which I had reached from an independent examination of the tables.

From these various illustrations it is clear that the revenue of the United States has suffered by the treaty in question, and that in this important particular its advantages have not been shared equally by the two countries. Here, at least, it loses all title to its name.

But the onerous character of this treaty has become manifest in other forms since the adoption of our system of internal revenue. I need not remind the Senate of the extent to which we have gone in seeking out objects of excise, and now there are various propositions still pending in the same direction, seeking new objects; but it is notorious that such taxation is always graduated with reference to the tariff on the same objects when imported from abroad. But here the reciprocity treaty steps forward with its imperative veto. Thus, for instance, the lumber of our country is left free from excise, though I am assured that it might well bear it, simply because no countervailing tax can be imposed upon lumber from the British provinces. Had a tax of five per cent. been imposed upon the lumber of our country, I am assured from those familiar with the subject that we should have received at least $5,000,000; all of which is lost to our annual revenue. But this is only a single illustration.

There are other ways in which the treaty and our excise system come into conflict. Practical difficulties, I am assured, have already occurred in the bureau of internal revenue. But this conflict will be seen in the extent to which the business of the country, and even its agriculture is taxed now. The farmer works now with taxed tools. These considerations, with the increased value of labor among us, must give new advantages to the productive interests of Canada as compared with ours, and tend still further to the unequal operation of the treaty.

Mr. President, such is the result of a candid inquiry into the operation of this treaty, as it concerns the fisheries, the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the commerce of the two countries, and the revenue of the United States. I have kept nothing back favorable to the treaty that could be adequately stated in the brief space which I have allowed myself, nor have I exaggerated its unequal operation.

And now the question is, shall this condition of things be reconsidered? The treaty itself, as if anticipating this exigency, furnishes the opportunity by expressly providing for its termination at the expiration of ten years on notice of one year from either party. Great Britain is free to give this notice, so are the United States. Considering the present state of the country, it would seem to be imprudent not to give the notice. We must husband our resources; nor can a foreign Government justly expect us to continue a treaty which is a drain upon our revenue. In every direction we are now turning for subjects of taxation. Our own people are contributing in every way largely. Commerce, manufactures in every form, are obliged to come to the assistance of the country. I know no reason why the large amounts enfranchised by this treaty should enjoy the immunity which has been thus far conceded to them. An inequality which in ordinary times would have escaped observation becomes too apparent in the blaze of present responsibilities.

Something has been said about accompanying the proposed notice with instructions to negotiate a new treaty. This is entirely unnecessary. A new treaty may not be advisable. It is possible that the whole matter may be settled by Congress under general laws. In all events, there is a full year from the 16th March next in which to provide a substitute, either by negotiation or by legislation. And this remark is applicable to the fisheries as well as to every other interest touched by the treaty. I cannot doubt that the two contracting parties will approach the whole question in the determination to settle it on the permanent foundations of justice and equity; but the first step in this direction is the notice to terminate the existing treaty.

Mr. RAMSEY. Mr. President, a persistent effort has been made to excite hostility against the reciprocity treaty, by enlarging upon the advantages to Canada and the other British provinces of North America under its third article, as if that article, and the commercial exchanges which it authorized, was the total scope of the negotiation of 1854. We hear nothing, or next to nothing, of the extension of our American rights in the Newfoundland fisheries; nothing of the free navigation secured to the western States both of the lower channel of the St. Lawrence river and of the ship canals of Canada; and yet, sir, these are leading and vital provisions in favor of the United States, and were the consideration received for the free exchange of natural products across the northern frontier of the United States. I cannot think that the discussion here or elsewhere transpiring of late has fully considered the historical bearings of this subject; and I propose to present a simple narrative in response to the question, what is the reciprocity treaty? In the answer to this question I shall comprise nearly all that I desire to urge in opposition to the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. Pierce was inaugurated President in March, 1853. He was immediately confronted by a serious dispute as to the rights of American fishermen upon the banks of Newfoundland and the adjacent fishing grounds. At the conclusion of the peace of 1783, the treaty between the United States and Great Britain had secured to Americans the same rights in the cod and mackerel fisheries of the northeast Atlantic coast which they had possessed prior to the Revolution. After the war of 1812 a controversy arose whether the stipulations of 1783 upon the subject of the fisheries were abrogated by that war. It resulted in the convention of 1818, whereby the general liberty of taking and curing fish, although yielded by Great Britain, was most seriously impaired by a provision that the United States renounced forever any liberty previously enjoyed or claimed by the inhabitants thereof to take, dry, or cure fish on or within three marine miles of any of the coasts, bays, creeks, or harbors of the British dominions, except certain districts of Newfoundland and Labrador. The colonies always claimed, and the English Government finally adopted the construction, that these three marine miles were to be measured from headland to headland, and not from the coast line; while, on the American side, it was contended that American fishermen had a right to enter and fish in any of the bays which indent the shores, provided they never approached for the purpose of taking fish within three marine miles of the coast by which such bays were encompassed.

The danger of collision, unavoidable from such a provision, culminated in 1853. In that year, as Lord Elgin once said in a speech at Liverpool—

"A British admiral and an American commodore were sailing on the coast with instructions founded upon opposite conclusions, and a single indiscreet act on the part of one or the other of those naval officers would have brought on a conflict involving all the horrors of war."

President Pierce was from a region of the country deeply interested in the Newfoundland fishery, himself regarding it as "a pursuit connected to no inconsiderable degree with our national prosperity and strength;" and he was naturally solicitous, while avoiding collision with England, to restore the rights secured to our citizens by the liberal treaty of 1783. This feeling prevailed intensely among the people of New England. Mr. Webster, on the 25th of July, 1852, said to his neighbors at Marshfield:

"The most important consequences are involved in this matter. Our fisheries have been the very nurseries of our Navy. If our flag-ships have met and conquered the enemy on the sea, the fisheries are at the bottom of it. The fisheries were the seeds from which those glorious triumphs were born and sprung."

So much for the special interest of New England, and the grave national complication which its embarrassment involved. From an opposite quarter, from the grain-growing Northwest, there came simultaneously a most urgent demand for the free navigation of the river St. Lawrence from its connection with the chain of great lakes to the ocean. On the 2d of May, 1850, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, A. W. Buell, of Michigan, J. A. McClelland, of Illinois, and E. G. Spaulding, of New York, presented an elaborate report, asserting the natural right of great inland communities, situated upon the sources of a navigable river, to pursue its channel to the ocean without material obstruction from any community organized over the mouth or lower sections of the stream, and asking that the application of this principle to the St. Lawrence might be the subject of concurrent legislation or a treaty between the United States and Great Britain, thus transferring a natural right to an international obligation. Others enlarged upon this recommendation, and no one with more eloquence than John A. Dix, while Senator from New York. He said:

"I have no hesitation in predicting that vessels will be laden with wheat at Chicago, Green Bay, Detroit, and Cleveland, and unloaded at Liverpool. Ship-owners, producers, all will be greatly benefited by this free commerce, which will have an advantage in avoiding transshipment between the point of embarkation and the sea or the foreign market."

It was evident long before 1854 that the freedom of the St. Lawrence, with all its immense expansions into lakes, was inseparable from any commercial treaty by or on behalf of the British colonies with the United States.

As early as 1849 the British colonies on this continent sought admission to American markets with their products, which were then, as now, almost exclusively agricultural, animals, and their produce, or products of the forest, mines, and fisheries. Great Britain, by the repeal of all discriminations in favor of the importation of colonial breadstuffs and lumber, and the surrender of all revenue regulations by the colonies in favor of British manufactures, had gone far to establish the commercial independence of the provinces; but there was no alternative after the home Government had definitely established Sir Robert Peel's policy of 1846 repealing the corn laws. Even the navigation acts were made to yield to the new impulse, England proudly asserting her ability to compete with the merchant marine of the world, notwithstanding the commerce of every port in her vast dominions, European and colonial, was placed for the ships of all countries upon the footing of an unrestricted coasting trade. Under such a change of circumstances our colonial neighbors naturally sought to buy and sell in American cities and manufacturing towns. Canada came forward with an overture for the free admission of certain articles, the natural production of Canada and the United States, into each country respectively; but Congress would not entertain the proposition unless extended to the other Atlantic provinces of England, and unless it included an adjustment of the fishery dispute, and also a provision, in the interest of the north-western States, for the free navigation of the St. Lawrence.

Thus the measure took the form of a tripartite treaty, negotiated between William L. Marcy and James, Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, confirmed by the Senate of the United States on the 5th of June, 1854, and passing into operation on the 16th of March, 1855. It has since regulated the commerce between the United States and the provinces of Canada; New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland; but the district occupied by the Hudson Bay Company, now called Central British America, and the Pacific colonies of British Columbia and Vancouver Island, were not included in the treaty. I proceed with a brief review of its stipulations.

The preamble expresses the mutual desire of the contracting parties "to avoid further misunderstanding in regard to the extent of the right of fishery on the coasts of British North America," and "to regulate the commerce and navigation between their respective territories and people, and more especially between her Majesty's possessions in North America and the United States in such manner as to render the same reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory."

By the first article it was agreed that in addition to the liberty secured to the United States fishermen by the convention of October 20, 1818, of taking, curing, and drying fish on certain coasts of the British North American colonies therein defined, the inhabitants of the United States shall have, in common with the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, the liberty to take fish of every kind except shell-fish on the sea-coasts and shores, and in the bays, harbors, and creeks of Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward's Island, and of the several islands thereunto adjacent, without being restricted to any distance from the shore; with permission to land upon the coasts and shores of those colonies and the islands thereof, and also upon the Magdalen islands for the purpose of drying their nets and curing their fish, provided that in so doing they do not interfere with the rights of private property or British fishermen in the peaceable use of any part of the said coast in their occupancy for the same purpose. This liberty was confined to the sea fishery; the salmon and shad fisheries, and all fisheries in rivers and the mouths of rivers being exclusively reserved for British fishermen.

The second article extended the same right of fishery to British subjects on the American Atlantic coast north of latitude 36°.

The controversy in regard to the fisheries having been thus adjusted, that branch of American industry is seldom mentioned, but its commercial and maritime importance is steadily increasing. The census of 1850 returned $3,067,655 as the value for that year of the cod and mackerel fisheries of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, while the census of 1860 shows the product of that year to be $4,183,503. Subject the northeastern fisheries and fishers to the hazards and obstructions of the convention of 1818, instead of the liberal provision of the reciprocity treaty, and the whole country would ring again, as it did in 1853, with the importance of the fishing interest and the wrongs of all interested.

The navigation of the St. Lawrence and the Canadian canals was the subject of the fourth article, which is as follows:

"It is agreed that the citizens and inhabitants of the United States shall have the right to navigate the river St. Lawrence and the canals in Canada, used as the means of communicating between the great lakes and the Atlantic ocean with their vessels, boats, and crafts as fully and freely as the subjects of her Britannic Majesty, subject only to the same tolls and other assessments as now are or may be hereafter exacted of her Majesty's said subjects."

A similar right of navigating Lake Michigan was secured to British subjects. The Government of the United States engaged to urge upon the State governments to secure to British subjects the use of the several State canals on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the United States. And the province of New Brunswick was restrained from the levy of any export duty or other duty on lumber or timber cut in the State of Maine and shipped to the United States through the river St. John.

The State canals have never been opened to British subjects as above suggested.

The importance of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, with its Canadian canalage, to the western producer, is every year more apparent. The values which passed through the St. Lawrence from the United States, (mostly western products,) were $3,505,511 for 1861, and $5,198,920 for 1862. The pressure of western transportation upon the Welland canal is very great, inducing a discussion of the policy of its enlargement; and as the mineral resources of Lake Superior are developed, an Ottawa ship canal will probably be added to the public works of Canada. The West needs them all, and every additional avenue which national or State enterprise can provide, including a ship canal around the falls of Niagara, and from Oswego to Albany. Already ocean vessels are seen not unfrequently at the wharves of Detroit, Milwaukee, and Chicago; and unless Congress shall deprive the Northwest of the undisputed possession of its great natural water communication with the Atlantic, the foreign commerce of the lake coast is destined to a rapid and most auspicious progress. I trust no selfish or sectional crusade will deprive the interior community I represent of these advantages.

And now we come to the provincial side of the account current of reciprocity. The third article of the treaty agrees that the following articles, being the growth and produce of the British colonies or the United States, shall be admitted into each country respectively free of duty: grain, flour, and breadstuffs of all kinds; animals of all kinds; fresh, smoked, and salted meats; cotton, wool, seeds and vegetables; undried fruits, dried fruits; fish of all kinds; products of fish, and of all other creatures living in the water; poultry, eggs; hides, furs, skins, or tails undressed; stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state; slate; butter, cheese, and tallow; lard, horns, manures; ores of metals of all kinds; coal; pitch, tar, turpentine, ashes; timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, sawed, unmanufactured, in whole or in part; firewood; plants, shrubs, and trees; pelts; wool; fish oil; rice, broomcorn, and bark; gypsum, ground or unground; hewn or wrought or unwrought burr or grindstones; dyestuffs; flax, hemp, and tow unmanufactured; unmanufactured tobacco; rags.

I cheerfully admit, Mr. President, that our provincial neighbors have received great and substantial benefits from the facilities of trade secured by this article, but I deny, I entirely fail to perceive, that we have been in any sense losers. The Register of the Treasury Department reports the aggregate of exports from the United States to Canada and other British possessions in North America, from 1852 to 1860, inclusive, to be $195,303,384, of which $140,393,956 have been the growth or manufacture of the United States. During the same period of nine years (three before and six subsequent to the treaty) the value of imports into the United States from British America amounted to $135,555,671.

The course of trade with Canada is fully illustrated by tables of statistics communicated at the last session of Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. They show an average export trade to Canada of $16,826,797 for eight fiscal years following the formation of the reciprocity treaty, while the imports from Canada into the United States for the same period show an average annual value of $16,643,825. The Canadian movement to American markets is almost exclusively of natural productions, admitted free of duty, while upon the imports from the United States to Canada, largely consisting of manufactures and foreign productions, the Canadian people have been charged by their Government with an average taxation (by the collection of customs duties) of $1,747,526 per annum.

As one result of the war, and the advance in the prices of manufactured goods, our exports to Canada are now mostly free of duty. We exported in 1863 from the United States into Canada, $12,339,367 free of duty by the reciprocity treaty, and $6,795,599 free of duty by Canadian tariff—an aggregate of $19,134,966. As the whole exportation from the United States into Canada was $23,109,362, this leaves only $3,974,396 subject to the Canadian tariff, of which the value of $1,855,690 was of articles not produced or manufactured in the United States. In other words, while Canada admitted free of duty $19,134,396 from the United States, the whole amount of our products and manufactures which were subject to taxation by the Canadian tariff was $2,118,706. The average taxation being twenty per cent. the Canadian consumers paid $423,741 into the treasury of the province. The importations from Canada during 1863 were $20,050,432, or an aggregate of trade with the United States of $43,159,794.

I will not extend these statistical statements. They concur with my former impressions, as a citizen of the Northwest, that the treaty is mutual and beneficial. To repeat the language of a memorial from the St. Paul Chamber of Commerce, presented to the Senate January 27, 1862:

"All parties to the treaty have observed its stipulations in good faith. The Americans possess and enjoy their enlarged rights in the British fisheries on the northeastern coast, and the free navigation of the St. Lawrence; neither Government has interrupted the exchanges of the free list prescribed by the third article; while upon a subject properly excluded from the provisions of the treaty—namely, the tariffs of the United States and the adjacent provinces in respect to articles of manufacture and foreign production—there is no legitimate ground of complaint in any quarter. Prior to 1861 the duties by the Canadian tariff were considerably enlarged after 1854, (from sixteen per cent. to twenty per cent. average;) but recently the American scale of duties has been advanced in a still greater proportion. In both cases the changes have been enforced by financial necessity and do not conflict with the spirit or terms of the treaty of 1854."

With these views it seems to me that a recent recommendation of the Detroit Board of Trade, that the treaty should not be disturbed at this time, but that the Department of State, or a joint commission of the Governments interested, should proceed with a revision of existing stipulations, is worthy of our consideration.

I appreciate fully, Mr. President, our financial necessities, but I doubt whether we shall largely increase the revenue on the northern frontier by substituting a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem, or whatever may be the average of the present tariff. Suppose we substitute a duty of five per cent. upon the free list of the treaty, (or any rate which will not materially restrict present commercial intercourse,) as might be readily stipulated by a supplementary treaty, and observe its effect upon the revenues during a period of five years. I have an impression that we should receive far more revenue from such a minimum duty than we would do under a duty six times greater.

Nor can I agree with the opinion so confidently advanced that the British provinces are entirely at our mercy in the matter of their communication to advantageous markets. We may exclude them by restrictive legislation from our cities and thoroughfares, we may subject their people to temporary inconvenience, but under the federal union now proposed of British America, and which is certain to be accomplished, such a policy on our part will force the speedy construction of a railroad to Halifax, and other measures of commercial and industrial independence.

The State of Minnesota has repeatedly urged the revision of the reciprocity treaty, but always in the interest of further freedom, not additional restrictions, of commercial intercourse. Such, if I mistake not, will be the public sentiment of our Pacific States. As already stated, the present treaty is inoperative west of the great lakes. Since its date the provinces of Vancouver Island and British Columbia have been organized on the Pacific coast, and are valuable extensions of the trade of California and Oregon. All these communities should be recognized as parties to any commercial arrangement between the United States and the English provinces of North America. East of the mountains the immense and fertile basin of the Saskatchewan river, whose sources are now ascertained to flow from a gold-bearing region as productive as British Columbia or the adjacent American Territories of Idaho and Montana, is soon to be the scene of a systematic colonization from Canada and England. This region, which, with the Red river settlement, is becoming well known, and is designated as Central British America, will be closely related to Minnesota. The year 1866 will witness the construction of a telegraph from St. Paul through Selkirk settlement, the Saskatchewan valley, and the Rocky mountains, to the northern boundary of British Columbia, destined at no distant date to be extended through Russian America and connect with the line from St. Petersburg. An emigrant route from Minnesota to the Saskatchewan and Cariboo gold fields will be imme-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 14.

diately established, indicating the track of a future international railway; while a new and vigorous policy is announced by the Hudson Bay Company, promising all possible encouragement of settlements and representative institutions in districts hitherto excluded from the world. Central British America will seek close trade and communications with the United States. Why multiply barriers and restrictions against our commercial intercourse in that direction?

The Committee on Foreign Relations have suggested on the face of the resolution now pending an additional reason for the postponement of this subject. They have embodied in the terms of their resolution a declaration that the reciprocity treaty went into operation, "took effect," on the 16th of March, 1855. I accept the authoritative declaration of the committee. Then I turn to the fifth article and find a stipulation that—

"The treaty shall remain in force for ten years from the date at which it may come [came] into operation, and further, until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same; each of the high contracting parties being at liberty to give such notice to the other at the end of the said term of ten years, or at any time afterwards."

I assume, Mr. President, that the concurrence of both Houses of Congress and the approval of the President, as usual in legislation, are essential to constitute the evidence of a "wish" by the United States "to terminate the treaty," and that the "notice" above referred to would doubtless consist of an authenticated copy or an equivalent recital of the resolution which Congress had adopted. The date of such a resolution is therefore a matter of importance; it is the period of time when the "notice" is actually given. If the day upon which the Government of the United States, as one of the high contracting parties, concurs in the final passage or adoption of a resolution of abrogation (or the expression of such a wish) be neither the term of "ten years from the date at which the treaty went into operation" or the 16th of March, 1855, are Senators certain that we are not violating the obligation of a treaty? We are at liberty to give such notice on the 16th of March, 1865—so says the fifth article—"or at any time afterward." The implication is unavoidable that we are restrained from doing so previously. It matters not that the ministerial act of the President is after the 16th of March, 1865—the act of notice, the expression by this Government of its wish and determination will be before that date, and therefore premature and a violation of a treaty obligation.

For this reason, Mr. President, and on account of the general considerations of public policy to which I have adverted, I am opposed to the resolution in its present shape.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will not detain the Senate by any extended remarks on this subject, because I have not investigated it as carefully as probably I ought to do if I attempt to instruct the Senate upon it. My vote shall be controlled by one idea alone; and that is that it is now the interest of the United States, in a pecuniary sense, to terminate this treaty, if we have the right to do so under the treaty, and under the temporary arrangement made between the two Governments. The treaty gives us the right to terminate it in about a year from now, and upon the present condition of facts as they exist in the United States it is plainly and manifestly the interest of the United States to terminate that treaty.

Nations in their commercial intercourse are always governed by their interests, and especially is this so with Great Britain. It is admitted to be so by all her distinguished statesmen. She has always been guided by her interests as a nation, precisely as an individual in the ordinary affairs of life would be guided by his interests. They established for a long time a system of exclusive legislation and tariff laws. They have now adopted a system of free trade. All their laws on the subject of tariffs, and all their commercial regulations, have been based upon their own interests; and they cannot object to us if in pursuance of the treaty with them we should now adopt a policy to carry out our own interests.

When the reciprocity treaty was adopted in 1855, there was then a state of things existing along the border which induced both parties to cultivate kindly relations and the exchange of commodities between them. I have no doubt that Great Britain got a great deal the best of the bargain, especially in the schedule of articles named which should be exchanged free of duty. The treaty has operated from the beginning against our interests; and it can be plainly demonstrated by the tables which are furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, that from the beginning our trade has fallen off and theirs increased, comparatively. I have here a single statement which will show that very clearly:

"The amount of goods exported to Canada in 1855, subject to duty, was $11,449,472, and in 1862 no more than $6,128,783."

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him where he gets that statement from?

Mr. SHERMAN. I read that statement from a speech made by Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, a year ago in the House of Representatives on this subject.

Mr. HALE. I want to remind the Senator that in 1855, when it was $11,000,000, half that time or nearly half, there was no reciprocity treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take 1855 as the first year before the reciprocity treaty. Our exports then amounted to over $11,000,000, and since that time, in 1862, they had fallen off to $6,000,000. These tables are taken, Mr. MORRILL says, and he is very accurate on the subject, from the official statement; and I find them more convenient to refer to in his speech. The treaty also operates very injuriously to us in many respects. Take, for instance, this statement:

"Canadian tables show that for eight years, from 1855 to 1862 inclusive, an average of $9,340,000 of our exports to Canada paid duty, and $10,720,000 were free."

While the goods we receive from Canada come to us duty free, except to a very insignificant amount, they charge us duty on more than half of what we send to them. Can that be said to be reciprocal? Our exports and our imports, our trade with Canada is about equal; we send to them nearly as much as they send to us, but they charge us duties on one half of what we send to them. We substantially admit all that they send us free. Such a statement as that—and it cannot be gainsaid and cannot be denied—shows that the treaty is unequal, and that there is no reciprocity in it.

But, Mr. President, I do not base my vote upon this question upon the trade as it existed when the treaty was made. I have nothing to say as to the wisdom of the treaty. But it is manifest that now in the present condition of affairs this treaty is to our injury. We are compelled now to increase our revenue agents along the lakes more than treble. We are compelled to establish a cordon of posts from the Atlantic coast clear across the continent to prevent smuggling from Canada. We are compelled to increase more than tenfold the expense of the collection of customs on the border by the multiplicity of our agents. We are compelled to establish this whole system without receiving one cent for it. The duties we levy upon colonial produce will not pay one tenth of the expense of our cordon of posts along the line to prevent smuggling. Only the other day the Senate and Congress passed a bill appropriating $1,000,000 to provide revenue cutters to prevent smuggling from Canada; and yet our duties levied on our commerce with Canada will not probably pay this year $100,000. I do not give the figures accurately. I only give them generally.

Under these circumstances, as we are involved in war, when we are compelled, in order to prevent smuggling from Canada, to establish a cordon of posts, a line of custom-house officers, and increase our revenue agents, it seems to me we ought to levy corresponding duties, so that at least our duties on our trade with Canada will pay the expenses we incur.

But there is another consideration. We have necessarily adopted a system of internal taxation. The reciprocity treaty is entirely inconsistent with our present internal taxation. It is an express discrimination against our own industry. The farmer in the West is compelled to pay an income tax; he is compelled to pay a large tax on the transportation of his produce; he is compelled to pay tax in various forms on every commodity he consumes and on everything he raises; while by our treaty with Great Britain all the products of Canada come into our markets free of this duty. While this treaty stands it is a discrimination against every farmer and every mechanic and every industrial interest of the western States. The farmer in Canada may raise his grain and produce and send it to our markets free of duty, and it pays no tax. We cannot reach their railroads; we cannot tax their transportation; we cannot affect them in the least; and yet every interest of our farmers is taxed. It is manifest, therefore, that while we maintain our present system of internal taxation the reciprocity treaty is a direct benefit to the Canadian producer, farmer, and mechanic, and it is a discrimination against our own farmers and mechanics. It seems to me, therefore, for this reason alone, if there were no other, that this treaty ought to fall, or at least ought to be suspended until the time may come when we may abandon the system of internal taxation.

Cases are occurring along the border—I am so informed by persons who are very intelligent—of the greatest hardship. We formerly exported into Canada a large amount of manufactured tobacco. It was more convenient to be made here and sent over there. I believe the exportation before the war was something like four or five million dollars. That whole exportation has ceased, or at least it has fallen off until it is now less than a million. While we send across the line tobacco in the leaf, it is manufactured in Canada and it is smuggled back into our own country, thus evading the very heavy tax we put on tobacco. I am told that a single little vessel crossing the narrow streams that divide us and Canada may bring back into our country enough tobacco made from our own leaf, the duty on which would amount to $100. The tax on some kinds of manufactured tobacco is thirty-five cents a pound; so that a smuggler, or an Indian trader, in a light canoe running across the border, may in a single hour cheat the Government out of an internal tax of at least one or two hundred dollars.

Take also the case of whisky. We expect to derive a very large revenue from whisky. We send over our corn to Canada free of duty. It is there manufactured into whisky; and being an article of small bulk, it may be put into vessels and brought back to us, smuggled in, and it comes in substantially free of duty. In consequence of this system tobacco, whisky, and many other articles are manufactured in Canada merely for the purpose of being smuggled into the United States. It is plain that that system of commercial relations ought not to exist. It is against our interest, and we should not and ought not to tolerate it. Without extending the discussion of this question any further, it seems to me plain and manifest that it is our interest to abrogate this treaty, and either to make another or at least to postpone a reciprocity treaty for some future day. I shall therefore vote for this resolution with great pleasure.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate at much length. I have, however, some views about this treaty which, perhaps, do not exactly fall within the remarks of any gentleman who has spoken upon it. I have been somewhat conversant with the history of the treaty. I had occasion to be. I know that many efforts were made by the Canadian people to secure this treaty from the United States which were unsuccessful. I know why they were unsuccessful. I know that this treaty was finally made, and I think I know why it was made.

In the first place, I wish to have it understood that for myself I am utterly opposed to the regulating of duties or imports by a treaty in any case whatever. I think it at war with the theory of our Government. When the Constitution provides that bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, no measure regulating revenues should originate anywhere else; and all treaties made with a view to shape that revenue, to my mind, are contrary to that provision of the Constitution. I do not mean to be understood as saying that if a treaty is made which provides that it shall be adopted by law to go into effect, and that law is made agreeably to the treaty making the duties, that that law is not constitutional; but I object to that mode of initiating such measures. I object utterly to the House of Representatives ever being invited by the treaty-making power to throw out of their control and out of their reach the shaping of their tariff duties as the circumstances of the country may require them. They should be held in the hands of Congress. The exigencies of times demand it. It should always be there. If we make a treaty providing for duties and discriminations, and even if the House and Senate pass a law pursuant to it, do you not perceive that the House have their hands tied up while that treaty lasts? They cannot repeal that treaty and make a new one whatever may be the exigencies of the country. The honorable Senator from Ohio has very well remarked how we are embarrassed now in relation to our internal duties, which the exigencies of the time require, by the operation of this very treaty. It is to me a matter of astonishment, and always has been, that any House of Representatives ever could be found that would agree to tie up their hands in that way; but they have done it by this treaty, and I think the sooner we get rid of it the better; and I hope that by the lesson which this teaches us we shall be sure to guard against its repetition.

It was that reason which governed my mind, when I had the honor to be in the Cabinet of the country, in rejecting altogether any proposition of a treaty of this character; and I believe the sentiment of the Cabinet at that time was unanimous on the subject. I know that when it was talked of then in conversation with southern friends they were entirely unwilling on policy to make such a treaty, on the ground that they did not wish the Canadian productions to compete with their own in our market. They had sense enough, as we all have, I apprehend, to see that you could not go and make an advantageous or reciprocal bargain with Canada by agreeing to give them the market of this country of thirty million people for the purpose of our getting their market of three million people for the same productions; for they produce the same things we do, with the exception of cotton, I believe. Those articles enumerated in the treaty that are to be passed free of duty are the common productions of the two countries. We open to them a market of thirty million people, and they give us a market of three million. What sort of reciprocity is that?

I have said that southern gentlemen with whom I talked on the subject understood that as well as we did. But how came it about that they ever agreed to it afterward when they were in power? I think I understood the reason. There had been a great deal of restlessness and uneasiness in the people of Canada for a long number of years. There are some elements of that to be found in the French population there at all times; but it had been increasing and had led to open outbreaks in most of them. Much of that was to be ascribed to this feeling: "We are crippled; we have no market for our products; they are taxed in going into the United States so much that we cannot compete there; they do not mean to have foreigners compete in their own market against their own people, and therefore we cannot make a market there; and as to England, since she got rid of her navigation acts and entered upon the system of free trade, we get no advantage from being colonies of England at all; her markets are open to all the world, and we have no advantage in being colonies. We are cut off and competed with there by the United States productions, and yet we cannot compete in the United States." Well might they complain, for they were penned up in that way. That was their condition. They were restless under it; and a very extensive feeling of a desire of annexation to the United States prevailed in Canada. It is very well known. Was it not the policy of England to quiet that feeling if she could? Was it not to the advantage of Canada to get a market of thirty million people here without paying any duties? Certainly. If you could give to Canada a treaty of that kind by which the people of that country might have all the advantage of our market, and not pay anything to our Government, would they not be content then with their situation? Of course they would. And, sir, from the date of this treaty you have never heard of a whisper of discontent in Canada. They can have the whole sweep of our markets, all the advantages of this Government, without contributing a cent for its support. That is their condition.

I remember well that on one occasion here after the making of the treaty, and soon after I had the honor of a seat in this body, when this question came up collaterally, I plainly stated that that was the motive with which that treaty had been made; that it had been made with a view to quiet the people of Canada and prevent their annexation to the North, which might disturb the "balance of power" of our southern friends, and Mr. Toombs, then sitting on the other side of the Chamber, bowed very low to me and said, "We have got the treaty; they have been quieted."

These remarks will show what was the history of it; how it came to be made, in my opinion; why it was made by those who were then in power. It was made for the motives and purposes which I have thus explained, and which they never thought of denying. Indeed they thought the ingenuity with which they had concocted it was rather a feather in their cap.

I acknowledge that I have some prejudice against this treaty. I am a little situated as my old neighbor Judge Chipman was when he was called upon to testify whether a certain witness was a man of truth. He said he was not. He was then asked, "Sir, are you not conscious that you labor under a prejudice against that man?" He answered, "I think it likely that I am; I have detected him stealing two or three times." [Laughter.] I am much in that condition about this treaty.

As to the operation of the treaty itself, I do not think that a man living in a State contiguous to the border and having intercourse with it, as I have had, can be mistaken or need any tables about it. He does not need any of these statistics. We know—the tables so state—that under this reciprocity treaty they have taken from us in eight years about $70,000,000, while we have taken of those very same articles from that three million people to the amount of $114,000,000. I wish to be exact in my statement. The amount received by them under the treaty free of duty since it went into operation was $73,000,000, and the amount received by us from them $115,000,000; and yet we had thirty million people to produce and they had but three million.

Sir, the treaty has been an embarrassment of things here at all times, in every respect. Take an illustration of this kind, for instance: a very large tax is collected in England to a heavy amount on hops; we are now compelled to look to everything we can lay our hands upon in the way of taxation in our present necessities; why do we not lay a duty upon hops? They raise a very heavy amount in excise in England in that way. Ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and he will tell you that you cannot lay a duty on hops because the Canadian hops are in the way. That is one illustration; but I might go on with a great variety. You cannot lay a duty on hops because our farmers are borne down already with their reciprocity treaty with Canada and the price of labor, changing as it does. Sir, it is high time we were rid of it.

Mr. President, I ought here to say in justification of myself that I shall not vote for the repeal of the reciprocity treaty from any feeling of resentment at the present moment, though there has been much occasion for it; because in my State there has been but one opinion about it all the time. They have seen and know its operation there, and there has been but one opinion of it. I believe our State Legislature some time since passed a resolution directing us to endeavor to get this reciprocity treaty ended.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I should like to be informed how early the Legislature of Vermont did that?

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot fix the date now; it has escaped my memory; but it was more than two or three years ago. It has not been since these difficulties commenced.

Mr. FOOT. The sentiment of our State was against it long before this war commenced.

Mr. COLLAMER. Oh, yes; it has nothing to do with the present temporary excitement of the border. That has all occurred within a year, and the Legislature was not sitting then, and they could not pass any resolutions in consequence of that.

Now, sir, in relation to the fisheries, I do not so well understand that subject as the people of Maine do, and they will speak better on that subject than I can. I do not live near the fisheries; I live in the interior, though not quite so far, I believe, as the honorable Senator from Minnesota, who has spoken about it. But so far as I can hear, although all the collectors of the ports on the coast as low down as Connecticut have been written to on this subject, I believe there was but one single report that objected to the termination of the treaty, and that was from Gloucester. I believe Gloucester entertained some different sentiment about it; but I believe that was the only exception. Sir, can it be possible that the Canadians, with their fisheries and their fishermen on the ground fishing right at their door, with the right to send their fish to our market, we having agreed to give them the whole market of America free, do not have an advantage over our fishermen, who have to go in vessels far up that coast and bring them home, and who can only sell them by paying duties at least upon the salt which they have to carry out with which to salt the fish? The Canadians can bring their fish here free of duty and free of taxes. All the expenses of shipping, all the expenses of the outfit and title, and everything of that kind, rest on the American and not on the Labrador man.

The same is true with regard to lumber, for instance. Can our friends of Maine, or in the western country, compete with these people at the present price of labor, &c., in America, when they bring lumber here free of duty from Nova Scotia and Canada? Why, sir, it is impossible.

But in relation to the fisheries, I would ask how many fish do you suppose our people have sold to the Canadians? I have not the means of knowing. But do you think it is a very good bargain for a Yankee and a trader to say to them, "You may bring here all the fish you catch on the coast of Labrador, Newfoundland, and everywhere else free of duty if you let us carry our fish to you free of duty?" Of course they agree to that, and they will bring their fish here; but we never carried one there, and never will.

A word about the navigation of the St. Lawrence. It has been my misfortune to know something about it. In the first place I will say that the navigation of the St. Lawrence is not good for anything to anybody, and never was. It is frozen up six months in the year, to begin with; and in the next place it is so dangerous from the icebergs which form off the Gulf of St. Lawrence that I believe the Canadians have lost no less than five of their steamers within the last three years, and the rate of insurance is from one to two per cent. higher there than from any other port in America, and always has been. They themselves are hard at work subsidizing our friends in Maine to let them have the use of a railroad to get away from the St. Lawrence. How is a trader depending upon the navigation of the St. Lawrence for foreign goods, by which he can only get them once a year, going to compete with a man sitting right down beside him, who brings his goods through the United States, and can get them once in three months? He has got to furnish his whole stock for one year, and lay it by, because he cannot be supplied but once a year. The truth is, this navigation is not fit for anything. I know they have sent out a few ships from the western country. They thought it would be valuable. I did not believe it would be of any value then, and I do not believe it now. Very few of these vessels have ever come back.

Something has been said about the use of the canals on the river; that is, by the Niagara and the Welland canal, and thus down the river. The treaty gives us the navigation of those canals, or rather it does not give it, but says we are to have it on the same terms with their people; that is, paying toll. One would think that that meant to pay exactly the same tolls that they do; but just look at it. They have provided there, since this treaty was made, that if a vessel passing through those canals passes down to, and is destined to, and lands at a Canadian port, it shall have a drawback of so much per cent. upon the tolls. If it comes to an American port it must pay the whole toll, and there is no drawback. If it goes to Montreal, or any Canadian port, then it is to have a drawback. The agreement was that we should be allowed to use these canals on the same terms with them; and they say we do have the use of the canals on the same terms; but we want to go through those canals, and land at Oswego, for instance, or Rochester, or Ogdensburg, or any of the ports of the State of New York; but you cannot have any deduction there. Does not that give an advantage to their people? They say it does not; that according to the very words of the treaty they charge their people the same tolls if they go to the same place.

That is the manner in which we are treated about that; and it is just so about the duties. They make discriminating duties against us. When, in consequence of their increased indebtedness for their internal improvements, they were obliged to raise their duties, and laid them even upon British as well as all other goods, and they were asked by Lord John Russell, "Why is it that you have increased the duties on British goods?" they replied, "We were obliged to do so; but at the same time we changed them, you know, from specific to ad valorem duties, and gave the advantage by that to Great Britain." "Ah, well," said he, "we are satisfied; you have given a satisfactory answer." That is, they had shut out the American people. Look at your tables and see how the exportation of everything subject to duty has been run down, and you will see the truth of this.

I do not think it worth while for me to take up any further time in relation to the subject. I have briefly stated my view of it without going into the details, which I think was sufficiently done by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, in spite of the testimony piled up here against this treaty, I am obliged to think still that if it is to be repealed, we are not the parties to do it, and I propose to tell the Senate why I think so. I propose to speak in behalf of what I believe to be American interests and not Canadian interests; and I suppose it is in defense of precisely those interests that every other Senator on this floor has spoken; and yet, sir, it has seemed to me peculiar that this resolution should have had the history it has had. The measure was inaugurated in the House of Representatives on the first day of the last session. The appropriate committee to consider the subject, as I conceive, the Committee on Commerce, taking it under consideration, deliberated upon it, and although they thought the treaty was not just and equitable in all respects, they thought it ought to be amended rather than repealed. Nevertheless, the House of Representatives did not give us the benefit of its opinion on it until the commencement of this session; then by a majority of votes they passed the resolution which came here providing for giving notice for the abrogation of the treaty. The Senate received the resolution, and by its vote referred it to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Now, sir, this resolution looks toward the abrogation of an existing treaty, it is true, and prima facie, therefore, there would seem to be some propriety in referring it to the Committee on Foreign Relations that we might have their advice as to whether it was likely that its repeal would disturb the concord existing between the parties which made the treaty; but the treaty at which the resolution is aimed relates wholly to the trade between the two countries whose Governments executed it; hence there would seem to have been a manifest propriety in consulting the Committee on Commerce, that we might know how our commerce was to be affected by the proposed action. Moreover, that which the resolution proposes to do is not only contemplated but is expressly permitted by the very terms of the treaty. Manifestly, therefore, no hostility could be engendered by the proposed action, and yet the Senate sought the advice of the Committee on Foreign Relations on an affair which could not possibly disturb our foreign relations, and declined the advice of the Committee on Commerce, when the affair cannot fail seriously to affect our commerce.

It is not for me to say why this direction was given to the resolution by the Senate, but I could not forbear to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the extraordinary fact that when we are asked to join in a resolution which strikes at a trade of millions, we do not stop to inquire how the blow will affect that trade, but only if it will lead to war.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to make an explanation?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. Allusion has been made to the original reference of this subject to the Committee on Foreign Relations, not only by the Senator from Wisconsin, but also by other Senators. I merely wish to say that I believe that reference was according to the traditional usage of the Senate; that according to that usage all questions relating to treaties or negotiations are referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; otherwise the great body of the treaties of the country, relating as they do to commerce, must be referred to the Committee on Commerce, or be referred to some other committee which may be supposed, according to the suggestion of the Senator, to be more particularly interested in the subject. The Committee on Foreign Relations is supposed to be so constituted as to treat intelligently all the topics which become the subject of negotiation. On that account, as I understand it, this question was referred to that committee.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not propose any reconsideration of the action of the Senate had at that time. At least I do not propose to take any vote reconsidering it. I thought, with due deference to the Senator from Massachusetts, that this was a peculiar direction to give the resolution, and I thought it was extraordinary. The Senator from Massachusetts says that it was in accordance with the usages of the Senate. I am so new to the Senate that I no more feel authorized to speak upon the question of its usages than according to the Senator from Vermont my friend from Minnesota was authorized to speak upon the subject of the fisheries. I will not undertake to discuss, then, with the Senator from Massachusetts, certainly, what has been the usage heretofore. I speak of the fact—there is no question about that—that we asked only in reference to an interest which we knew could not be disturbed, and we asked not a question in reference to its effect on the commerce of the country, about which there is at least some doubt.

In due time the Committee on Foreign Relations reported a substitute for the resolution that came to us from the House of Representatives, recommending its passage, as I understand. They gave us no reasons why it should pass, and until today I had to look elsewhere altogether to find any statement of the objections which are relied upon against this treaty. To-day we have heard from the committee, through its chairman; we have heard from other Senators in support of this resolution.

Now, sir, I think I am possessed of the reasons which urge gentlemen on to the passage of this resolution; and what are they? The first objection urged against the treaty is that it is unconstitutional. It is gravely urged here, it has been urged elsewhere—

Mr. COLLAMER. Did the Senator understand me to urge that?

Mr. HOWE. I did.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not urge any such ground.

Mr. HOWE. I stand corrected, then, so far as I said that that objection had been urged here. I am not incorrect as to its having been urged elsewhere that it was unconstitutional. Unquestionably the Senator from Vermont did not say it was unconstitutional. He says he did not say so, and I do not recollect that he used that language. He did say that he did not like this way of regulating trade and regulating duties. He did say that the Constitution gave to the House of Representatives the right to originate revenue bills, and I understood him (although I cannot repeat his language) as urging that when the treaty-making power assumed to make treaties of this character it was trenching on that prerogative of the House of Representatives. If the Senator from Vermont did not mean to carry his argument to that extent I know not what force the argument has here. Elsewhere it has been carried to that full extent.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman's speech may go where mine will not. I did not urge that it was unconstitutional. I did say from a view of the provisions of the Constitution that I thought there was an impropriety in the treaty-making power initiating any such thing; and they ought not, though they may have the constitutional right, tie up their hands in such a way.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Vermont will certainly believe that I have not the slightest wish to place him in any position that he does not choose to occupy himself. Having heard the argument from another quarter I was very likely to misinterpret the exact position that the Senator himself meant to assume. But I know, sir, and you know, that it is very much of an American habit to insist that everything that we do not like is unconstitutional, and that everything we want the Constitution demands; and hence I believe it could be made to appear, if we were to canvass the Senate at the present time, that there are Senators on this floor to-day who would insist that an act of Congress could emancipate all the slaves in the United States; and I believe we could find others on this very floor who would insist that that little thing could not be accomplished even by an amendment of the Constitution through the sovereign power of the people. I am not here to find fault with the habit; like all habits that I know anything about, it sometimes leads us into inconsistency. But in debate upon this very measure elsewhere it was claimed that the Constitution reserved to the House of Representatives the prerogative of originating revenue bills, and that therefore it was distinctly asserted that so far as this treaty was a positive or a negative revenue measure it was unconstitutional. In other words, it was asserted that inasmuch as the Constitution gave the House of Representatives the prerogative of originating revenue bills, so far as this treaty did or did not propose to raise revenue, it was unconstitutional.

I think that is carrying the argument a great deal too far. I think it is extending the prerogative further than any one is justified in extending it. The power to originate revenue bills is no more distinctly or broadly given to the House of Representatives than is the power to make treaties given to the President and the Senate, and if any treaty which they may make can be added to upon the ground that it trenches upon the prerogatives of the House of Representatives, we have the same right to say that every act of the House of Representatives infringes upon the prerogatives of the treaty-making power. In other words, if the prerogatives of the House of Representatives are to be protected and defended, and if they are paramount to the prerogatives of the treaty-making power, I do not know when or where a treaty can be made without consulting the House of Representatives.

We have been told elsewhere that in bills of supply in the British Parliament, so jealous are the Commons, that in the preamble the name of the House of Lords is omitted, the enacting clause reciting the grant as wholly their own. However valuable this may be to us as a piece of constitutional history, I think it much more important to this debate to remark that in bills of supply enacted by Congress a very different principle prevails. They do not go in the name of the House of Representatives alone, and if they did attempt to go in the name of the House of Representatives alone they would not go far. Unquestionably, that is a valuable feature in the British constitution; but the same feature, I do humbly submit, is of no sort of value here. It is a valuable feature there, because the Commons of England are the only representatives who derive their authority from the people of England and are responsible to the people of England; but every department of our Government is directly or indirectly amenable to the people and derives its authority from the people.

I must insist, however, that this compact of 1854 does not infringe upon the prerogatives of the House of Representatives for two reasons which seem to me conclusive. The first is, that it does not assume to raise revenue, but simply to regulate trade; and secondly, because it is not a bill but a treaty. And I want to say further that the treaty-making power is not to be held subordinate to the prerogatives of the House of Representatives, nor even to the legislative power of Congress.

To Congress is given the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations; and if that power is paramount to the treaty-making power, Congress may impose what restrictions it pleases on trade with one nation, and give what freedom it pleases to trade with another; and yet most of our commercial treaties contain a stipulation in effect that no restriction shall be imposed on the trade of the nation contracting which is not imposed on the trade of the most favored nations. Are such compacts as that unconstitutional? They are if the treaty-making power is subordinated by the Constitution to the authority of Congress.

Congress has power under the Constitution to declare war; but it having declared war, cannot the treaty-making power make peace? Congress is bound by the declaration of war if its authority is paramount to the treaty-making power. Congress may "provide and maintain a navy;" but is the treaty which restricts the naval armament on the lakes unconstitutional? I have never heard this asserted.

I think the objection that this treaty is unconstitutional is not only unsound but it comes very late. Both branches of Congress have affirmed the validity of this treaty, if it needed any affirmation, and the Government has acted under it already for ten years. Assuming, therefore, that the treaty is a valid one and will stand if you let it, let us look a little further and see whether you ought to let it stand.

But it is objected that the treaty operates unequally, and that our neighbors instead of ourselves appropriate the lion's share of its advantages. It is said it has but the name and not the substance of a reciprocity treaty. If the fact be so, that is a sufficient reason for its repeal, and there was no necessity for resorting to an objection so groundless as that of its unconstitutionality. And I think it fair to assume that if the fact had been so, no such objection would have been raised. I think it evident that if the opponents of the treaty could have established its injustice they never would have asserted its unconstitutionality; and I think it fair to assume that if the fact had been so, if its injustice could have been established, no such objection as its unconstitutionality would have been raised. I think it evident that if the opponents of the treaty could have established its injustice they never would have asserted its unconstitutionality; and I think it equally evident that if they had not utterly failed to maintain its unconstitutionality they never would have ventured to assert its injustice in the face of the official evidence we have of its actual effects and operations.

In the desperate endeavor to make a case against the treaty, its enemies drift about from one fallacy to another, hoping out of many groundless cavils to construct one solid reason. The struggle is a vain one. We might as well hope out of a great deal of sea foam to construct a quarry of granite.

What is the injustice with which the treaty is charged?

First, it is said that in four years prior to the treaty we imported of free goods $4,107,392 in value, and of dutiable goods $15,002,634; whereas in four years after the treaty was adopted it is said we imported of free goods $59,418,925, and only $2,150,394 of dutiable goods.

I give you these figures because I find these figures in the arguments which have been made against this treaty elsewhere, and because I see in them an attempt to stun the American Congress with an array of figures upon the assumption that figures must always mean something, let you find them where you will. But what does this mean? What is the only significance of this array of figures? It means just this, and no more: the treaty is gravely assailed, that treaty which transferred a large number of articles from the taxed list to the free list, because after it was adopted more free goods and fewer taxed goods were imported than before the treaty was adopted. Sir, do you think the negotiators of the treaty, those who made it and those who ratified it in this Senate Chamber, anticipated any other effect from it than that? When they said that almost the entire of our raw material might come, and come free, which had before been taxed, did they not expect that more free goods would be imported and fewer taxed goods than had been before?

That is the first objection against the policy and the justice of this treaty. That is significantly pronounced to be "the first effect of reciprocity." It is the first effect of reciprocity. If any one sees fit to find fault with it I do not.

But, sir, if in this respect the treaty sins against American interests, I ask does it not also sin against Canadian interests; for the very same tables will show you that in the very same years before the treaty, to wit, from 1850 to 1853 inclusive, Canada took from us of free goods only $4,165,413, and after the treaty, in the same years as before, from 1856 to 1859 inclusive, Canada took of free goods $35,911,820? Then, if the treaty increased our imports of free goods, it increased their imports of free goods; if it sinned against our interests it sinned against their interests. The fact is that it is precisely the effect both parties contemplated and knew must follow.

Again, it is said that in 1858 we imported from Canada of dutiable goods only $313,953, while Canada imported from us of dutiable goods $4,524,503. This is called "the next exhibition of reciprocity." Now, sir, observe here is an attempt to condemn a treaty which has been in operation ten years, by stating its operation for a single year, and this is not the only character or nature of the attempt. They attempt furthermore, by these arguments, and the like arguments have been repeated here to-day by two or three who have spoken in support of this resolution, to make us condemn this treaty which regulates a trade in certain articles, by piling up before us what is done in the trade in other articles which the treaty does not touch. And that is not all; they attempt to stun us here to-day, as they have before elsewhere, by telling us of the immense amount of dutiable goods which we send to Canada since the negotiation of the treaty, and contrasting it with the small amount of goods that we buy from Canada, as if we are actually being ruined by the amount of dutiable goods that our Canadian neighbors purchase from us.

The pretense really is no less than this: that we are impoverished by every dollar's worth of goods that we send abroad and sell to other countries. The argument is that we are in danger of being ruined by the amount of goods foreign countries purchase from us. If this is so we shall have England in a very uncomfortable place in a short time, for we are purchasing goods very largely of her; she is sending a great many taxed goods to us, which we take. I supposed that the fact that we were able to send goods abroad in spite of duties levied on the boundaries, in spite of all restrictions, was an evidence and an element of our wealth.

I shall not dwell longer on these objections. Really they cannot be insisted upon; they cannot be believed in. The treaty is not to blame because we buy and sell more free goods since it has been contracted than we did before. The treaty is not to blame because Canada continues to buy from us goods which the treaty does not make free and we do not buy from her goods which the treaty does not make free. This is not the fault of the treaty.

The next accusation is of a graver character. It is said that by the treaty "the ancient laws of trade have been subverted, and our exports to Canada, which formerly exceeded our imports, are now greatly less;" that "they sell to us, but go elsewhere to buy." This is a grave accusation; and if it were true I myself should insist upon the repeal of this treaty; for I hold that in times like these it is of the very first importance that we limit our purchases from abroad to the lowest figure, and I hold that it is one of the great faults of our system of finance at the present time that we are more ambitious of getting revenue from duties than we are to limit and restrict our foreign debt. But I do not concede that the fact is as stated. The evidence is to the contrary. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made upon a call of the House of Representatives on the 1st of February, 1864, which has been referred to in this debate already, shows a balance of trade in our favor in every year except the years 1860 and 1861. If that report tells the truth, instead of the ancient laws of trade being subverted, the ancient laws of trade are preserved. The balance of trade between us and Canada used to be in our favor before the treaty was made, and according to that report it has been in our favor every year since the treaty was made, with, as I said, the exceptions of 1860 and 1861.

In 1860 he states the account as follows: our imports from Canada were $23,851,381, while our exports were $22,706,328. That would show a balance against us, if these figures are correct, in that year of $1,145,053. For 1861 he states our imports at $23,062,933, and our exports $23,741,613, making a balance against us of only $317,320.

The fact that these small insignificant balances are stated against us in two years out of ten, and that from a trade growing from $12,000,000 to $40,000,000, would not be a grave offense in the treaty, I think.

But, sir, there are very strong, if not conclusive, reasons, for believing that this account is not correct. In this account made from our own Treasury Department our exports to Canada for these years are stated at less than they are in the Canadian reports. For 1860, in this account our exports to Canada are stated at $14,083,114, whereas the Canadian reports state our exports for that year at $17,273,029.

Our exports to Canada in the report of our own Secretary of the Treasury are stated for 1861 at $14,361,858, while the Canadian reports state them at $21,069,388. If the Canadian statement of our exports is correct, then in these years, as in all other years, there has been a large balance of trade in our favor under the treaty.

But it is urged again that we exported in 1863 to Canada no less than $3,502,180 in gold coin, and from that fact the inference is rashly drawn, as I conceive, that no less than $10,000,000 in coin or its equivalent are annually exported to settle our balances. Because in a single year it was found that there was an export of $3,000,000, it is supposed that we must have exported $10,000,000 to settle our balances; and while enforcing that argument upon us they forgot to tell us that in the very same year there was imported from the very same country through one single port of ours no less than $4,892,195 in coin. If an export of $3,000,000 in gold warrants the conclusion that $10,000,000 are annually required to settle our balance, what is the inference from an import of $4,000,000 for the same year?

Again, it is objected that "in the first four years after the treaty came into operation we received of the list of articles named in the treaty $28,721,691 in value more than Canada received from us." This is urged as the most flagrant offense in the treaty. "If this be reciprocity," it is said, "the less we have of it the better." I agree with the sentiment entirely, but not with the fact. The difference was great, but not so great as is alleged.

Our trade in those years was as follows: our imports were $49,708,139, and our exports were $30,015,051, making a difference of $19,693,088, instead of $28,721,691, as was stated. Even of such reciprocity I have no hesitation in declaring that I should have said the less the better, and we have been having less and less of that kind of reciprocity ever since. I have given you the statement of our trade in the first four years after the treaty was made, let me give you the condition of the trade in the last three years for which we have reports. In 1860 our exports to Canada, (for I am now speaking of our trade with Canada alone, and it is said truly that our trade with Canada is much the largest item of the whole commerce, and it is also said that our complaints against Canada are much greater than against any of the other provinces,) our exports to Canada of goods made free by the treaty were in 1860 $7,069,098, while our imports were $16,300,377. There was a large balance against us. In 1861 our exports were $9,980,937. Our exports had increased. Our imports for the same year were $14,293,922. Our imports had decreased. In 1862 our exports were $14,430,026; a large increase, and our imports were only $12,807,364; a still greater decrease. In those three years the aggregate of our exports was $31,480,661, and the aggregate of our imports $43,401,663. The difference against us for those three years was $11,911,002, whereas the difference against us for the first four years, as we have seen, was $19,000,000. But I have stated here only our trade with Canada.

Mr. FARWELL. If the Senator will permit me, as I do not propose to say anything on this subject, I should like now to inquire of him whether these figures as to the exports of the last three years are not based on the currency value?

Mr. HOWE. They are the values taken from both the Canadian and the Treasury reports.

Mr. FARWELL. But the currency value of our exports is their basis, no doubt, which would make quite a difference.

Mr. HOWE. I have not considered that question; but before we can judge correctly of what this trade really is we must take into consideration what it was with the provinces other than Canada during the same years.

In 1860 we exported to the other provinces mentioned in the treaty, of free goods $7,502,839, and we imported from those provinces of these goods $4,227,819, a balance largely in our favor. In 1861 we exported to the same provinces $7,133,734, and we imported but $3,719,701. In 1862 we exported to these provinces $7,369,905, and we imported from them but $2,856,990. The aggregate of our exports to these provinces for these three years was $22,006,678, and the aggregate of our imports was but $10,804,510, so that whereas there was a balance against us for those three years' trade with Canada in the articles made free by treaty of $11,911,002, there was a balance in our favor in the trade with the other provinces in the same articles, almost precisely equivalent to it, to wit $11,201,988.

Now, I cannot forbear to call the attention of the Senate to one very peculiar fact, that during these four years (and it was equally true of the six years during which the balance of trade under this treaty was undeniably against us, and largely against us) we never heard a word of complaint about it. It is only now when the balance is in our favor, when we begin to derive some positive advantage from it, that we witness this clamor for the speedy and prompt abrogation of the treaty.

Put the statements of our trade with the Canadas and the other provinces together, and they show that there was a balance against us in 1860 of $5,956,259; there was a balance against us in 1861 of $898,952; there was a balance in our favor in 1862 of no less than $6,136,177.

Again, Mr. President, it is said that what articles can now be exported to Canada free under the treaty had the same freedom to be so exported prior to the treaty; that mere self-interest would have compelled an adherence to that policy whether the treaty had been made or not. Here we are told that we secured no advantages under the treaty, but gave great advantages; that what goods we can export free under the treaty we could have exported free under ordinary laws before the treaty was made. If the fact were so, this of itself would undeniably be a reason for repealing the treaty; but the fact is not so, and how the statement could have been made in view of the official facts before us all, I cannot well conceive. I will quote again from the report which has been referred to so often. In 1855 we exported to Canada $7,725,572 of the goods made free by the reciprocity treaty. In the same year we exported only $1,653,632 of goods which were free by ordinary laws. Without reading the state of the trade for each year from that time down to 1862, I will content myself, having given the exhibit for the first year, with referring to the last two. In 1861 we exported of goods made free by the treaty to Canada $9,980,937, and of goods which were free by ordinary laws we exported only $1,878,510; in 1862 we exported of goods made free by the treaty $14,430,626, and of goods which were free by ordinary laws only $2,083,451; and with these facts before us we are told that we get no advantages under the treaty, but that what we can send free under it we could have sent free under ordinary laws before the treaty was enacted.

Again, it has been urged here and elsewhere that hostile changes have been made in the Canadian tariff since this treaty was enacted. Sir, I shall not enter into any defense of Canadian legislation. I hope, for the honor of mankind, Canada has legislated for her own interest; and I wish to God I could feel that we were about to legislate for our interests here. If Canada has taken better care of her interest than she has of ours, her government have simply done their duty to their people. I wish to-day I could know that the American Congress would take better care of the interests of the American people than I believe, than I almost know will be taken of the Canadian people by the repeal of the treaty. No man tells us that Canada has legislated in violation of the treaty; and if Canada had legislated in violation of the treaty, it would not have prejudiced us; but outside of the treaty I suppose Canada has done what she could for the protection of her own interest. Is not the field of legislation as wide to us as it was to them? Do we need to whine here before the world in order to obtain a little sympathy because of Canadian legislation?

Besides, sir, we are told that the temper of the provincial government is not such as to entitle them to favor. This is undeniably true. Who stands here pleading for favor to the Canadian people? I am asking for favor for our own people. It is in the name of American interests I ask that this treaty shall not be struck down. Who asks for any favor to the Canadian people or the Canadian interests? I admit they have exhibited a bad temper; that is no reason why we should not exhibit a good one. I admit that they have not been always amiable; that is no reason why we should not be sometimes judicious. We need not lose sight of our senses because they have lost possession of their temper. I have heard, I believe, not of men, but of children, being mad enough to bite their own noses off. I never saw the duty enforced by statesmen until this debate sprang up.

Again, sir, we are told that the pines of Maine, of New York, and of Michigan, must wait for the ax until the black forests of the provinces have been culled and exhausted; that the timber lands of our own States, exposed to this unlimited Canadian rivalry, are indefinitely postponed, and will not be cleared and fitted for cultivation while timber at a less cost can be obtained any where this side of Labrador. That is a dark picture which ought to frighten us, perhaps, and certainly it would seem on the face of the thing that it ought to frighten a representative whose constituents are so largely interested in the value of pine lumber as are my own. Nevertheless, I cannot consent to look pale even before this picture. In point of fact, the pine forests of Maine and of Michigan and of New York are not waiting a bit.

The whole export of lumber from Canada, in 1859, was $3,556,691 in value. In 1860 it was $10,051,147. In 1861 it was $3,693,638. This is the export of Canadian lumber that is to submerge the lumber interests of the United States! And what are these interests? In 1860 the value of the product of lumber in Maine alone was not less than $6,784,961, almost equal to the whole of Canada. In New England the product of that year was valued at $12,069,895. New York in that year produced $12,489,418. All the middle States produced $26,455,005. Wisconsin, the State I represent, although in that year lumber would scarcely pay the expense of manufacturing it, produced $4,836,159, and I venture to say, without any figures on the subject, that Wisconsin has in the past year manufactured more lumber than Canada ever exported in a year in her life. The total production of lumber in the United States in 1860 was $95,912,286 in value. I do not think our forests will have to wait till the forests of Canada are exhausted. I think our forests can stand in competition with the forests of the world.

Mr. RAMSEY. With the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, he yielding the floor for the purpose, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 11, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. WILLIAM H. CHANNING. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIST OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Clerk of the House, transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 26, 1842, a list of the clerks and other employes in his office; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF ENLISTMENTS.

Mr. WILSON, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 82, to encourage enlistments and to promote the efficiency of the military forces of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ILLINOIS CENTRAL RAILROAD.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent of the House to order the printing of a report made from the Committee on the Judiciary at the last Congress by Mr. Porter, of Indiana—an elaborate report on a question of public interest, which, from some oversight, was not ordered to be printed. I only want the ordinary copies ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROOKS. What is it about?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is in regard to the right of the Illinois Central railroad to charge freight on troops, arms, and other munitions of war.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RELIEF OF CHAMBERSBURG.

Mr. COFFROTH, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and are hereby, requested to report, by bill or otherwise, an act for the relief of the people of Chambersburg, Pennsylvania.

RELIEF OF NAVY CONTRACTORS.

Mr. CHANLER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of a commission to settle and adjust the claims of certain contractors with the Navy Department for reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. All those contractors are banded together in this joint resolution looking to extra compensation, a practice in legislation to which I make objection. I object to the introduction of the bill for that reason.

BRANCH MINT IN OREGON.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to relocate the United States branch mint provided for by the act of July, 1864.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. McBRIDE. I ask consent of the House to make a statement in reference to this bill. It will be recollected that a bill passed at the last session establishing a branch mint in Oregon, and fixing its location at Dalles City. It is well known that at the time of its passage there was considerable controversy in regard to the proper location for the mint. That controversy was in my State one of a good deal of warmth, and, among the friends of different localities, somewhat acrimonious. There were differences among gentlemen on this floor representing the rival interests as to the proper point, but after full consultation we agreed upon Dalles City as the most eligible, and it was named in the bill. Subsequently the Legislature of Oregon met, and, differing with myself in the action taken, have memorialized Congress on the subject, and have asked the removal of the mint to Portland, Oregon. In obedience to their instructions I present this bill, and shall ask, when the memorial arrives, which it has not, that it may be referred to the committee having charge of the bill. I thank the House for its courtesy, and move that the subject be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

WITNESSES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. WILSON. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on the Judiciary, for action at this time, a bill to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and for other purposes," so far as the same relates to witnesses in the courts of the United States.

Mr. SPALDING objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

The bill was received, and read a first and second time. It provides that the third section of the act indicated be amended by adding a proviso that in actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians, in which judgment may be rendered for or against them, neither party shall be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with or statement by the testator, intestate, or ward, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court.

Mr. GANSON. I move to strike out the words "or required to testify thereto by the court."

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York will not press his amendment. In many States, including that of Indiana, in matters of probate the court is expressly authorized to examine a party; and certainly great benefit may arise from the exercise of that power by the court, and that provision, above all others, should be retained. It would be unfortunate if a court could not call upon a party before it, being an executor, administrator, or guardian, to testify touching any fact connected with the matter before it; and I think a very great mistake will be made if this feature of the bill is stricken out.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that the proposed amendment will not prevent the opposite party from ascertaining from the executor, administrator, or guardian, any fact which they may be personally cognizant of. It merely prevents them from becoming witnesses in their own behalf.

I desire to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that he shall so amend the provision as to make the rules of the common law, as they existed independent of statute provisions, prevail in reference to the determination of the admissibility of witnesses. I do not believe there has been any improvement by legislation upon the common-law rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will remark, in answer to what has been said, that the cases to which this provision specially applies are ordinarily cognizant by the courts. Claims against estates are generally ex parte, and it would be an unfortunate state of the law if the court itself, the common guardian of estates and of orphan children, was not permitted to call upon a party present before it, presenting his claim, to testify to a given fact. The court would not do it except in cases of necessity, and to deprive them of that power would, in many instances, work injustice. It does seem to me that the provision can do no harm, and in many cases would be productive of much good.

Mr. GANSON. I will suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that this bill has no effect whatsoever upon the local laws of the States, as it only relates to proceedings in the Federal courts, and they are not courts of probate anywhere. I am opposed to vesting a discretion in the court as to whether parties shall be called upon and compelled to testify.

Mr. HOLMAN. I referred to the local power of probate courts mainly for the purpose of illustrating a principle, for there are cases analogous pending in the United States courts, and in which the same power ought to be exercised by the court.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I do not see the difference taken between the court asking a question of a witness and the opposite party asking it. In point of fact, there is no such thing as the opposite party having the right to ask a question of a witness or of a party. It is all done by the court, and cannot be done without the permission of the court. All a party would have to do if he desired a question to be put would be to suggest it to the court, and the judge would propound the question. It is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. WILSON. I believe the provisions of this bill conform to the statutes of most of the States in which the rule of evidence has been so changed as to admit parties to testify in their own behalf; and therefore it conforms more nearly to the rule in force prior to the act of 1863, which adopted the rules of evidence of the several States in the courts of the United States. And inasmuch as it conforms to the usages and laws of a majority of the States where this rule has been adopted, I think we had better pass the bill in its present form; and I therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The question recurring first on the amendment offered by Mr. GANSON, it was put; and there were, on a division—ayes 40, noes 51.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative, making a quorum.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF B. A. BAYLEY.

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the benefit of the heirs of B. A. Bayley, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

REPORT OF INTERNAL REVENUE COMMISSIONER.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Superintendent of Public Printing be authorized to print five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the accompanying tabular statement, for the use of the office of Internal Revenue.

REPORT OF CHIEF ENGINEER KING.

Mr. PIKE also, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred, under the rule, to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the usual number of copies of the report of Chief Engineer King upon the iron-clads of Europe be printed for the use of the House, and five hundred extra copies for the use of the Navy Department.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed and made the special order for Wednesday of next week.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. EDGERTON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or amending so much of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, as imposes a duty of six dollars per cent upon the value of real estate which a widow may acquire as the successor of her deceased husband, to the end that such tax or duty shall not be imposed upon the value of the real estate which the widow may acquire as doweress or heir of her husband by operation of law independent of his power of alienation and of the claims of his creditors or heirs at law, or which she shall acquire by gift or devise in lieu of her dower or other legal interest in her deceased husband's real estate; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I now insist on the regular order of business.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the business in which the House was engaged at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. C. A. WHITE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. C. A. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, this is a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to prohibit the existence of the institution of slavery throughout the entire territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and conferring upon Congress plenary power to pass all necessary enactments to enforce this provision of the Constitution. I do not propose at this time to enter upon a discussion of the abstract question of slavery. This, sir, is not so much a question of expediency, in my mind, as a question of right and of power, and as such I propose to discuss it to-day. There are many questions entering into the discussion of this question which are purely questions of expediency; such as the propriety of submitting to the people an amendment to the fundamental law of the land at a time when we are engaged in a most terrible revolution, and when the public mind and the public attention are riveted upon the events which are transpiring daily in our midst, and when it would be almost impossible to secure to this amendment that careful and serious consideration which it demands at the hands of the American people and of the American Congress.

But, sir, I maintain that we have no power, that the Congress of the United States has no cognizance of the subject-matter under consideration so as to affect the status of individuals; that it is solely and exclusively within the power of the States; and that the fifth article of the Constitution providing for amendments does not confer upon the Congress of the United States any jurisdiction or any power beyond the grants and delegations of power plainly and distinctly written down in the Constitution. The very term "amendment" is itself a word of limitation. This is not a change, an alteration, a modification, an enlargement, or a diminution of any provision already existing in the Constitution, but it is a supplement added to the Constitution—a separate, independent, distinct, substantive clause, disconnected with any grant or delegation of power written down in the Constitution.

Did the States, when they ratified the Constitution of the United States, intend by the fifth article of that Constitution to confer upon two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States unlimited power? If the construction claimed by gentlemen upon the other side be true, it is so. All then that you would have to do in order to make the Congress of the United States as omnipotent as the Parliament of Great Britain would be to change the fifth article of the Constitution, and provide that a majority of a quorum in Congress might amend the Constitution, and that would confer upon the Congress of the United States as plenary, omnipotent, unlimited power over every subject of legislation, ay, sir, it would make the Congress of the United States as omnipotent as the English Parliament. Does any man believe that the people of the States who adopted this Constitution, jealous as they were of the encroachments of centralized power, would have incorporated any such provision as that in the Constitution if they had so understood it?

I maintain, therefore, that the proposed amendment of the Constitution cannot be made of binding force and effect upon the States except by the ratification and consent of the States given in the exercise of the sovereign power of the States; that even the Legislatures of the States have not the power to give the consent. Sir, it is written down in the Constitution, tenth amendment, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law."

What is "process of law?" It imports day in court and trial by jury. Is not the right of the master to the service of the slave property? Those who made our Constitution for us and the States that ratified it so understood. I will not allude to the express provisions of the Constitution in which we have a direct recognition of the right to service in slaves as property in fixing the basis of taxation and representation, and in other respects. Every one of the original thirteen States while the constitutional Convention was laboring to effect the completion of that instrument was a slave State; and at the time of its adoption each State except one was a slave State.

That is property which the local municipal law recognizes as property. I cannot accept the doctrine of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH], that that is property which God makes property. Why, sir, I think that he would have great difficulty in tracing the title of his land if he would attempt to trace it to that omnipotent source. Adopting that doctrine, he would find a link missing in the chain of almost every title in the land.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether if the municipal law should declare him property that would make him property?

Mr. C. A. WHITE. My answer is, that if the local, municipal law provided that another man should have property in my service, my service would be his property. The guarantee of the Constitution is for the enforcement of the local municipal laws by the concentration of the power of the whole people. The parent has the right to the service of his child; he has a property in the service of that child. A husband has a right of property in the service of his wife; he has the right to the management of his household affairs. The master has a right of property in the service of his apprentice. All these rights rest upon the same basis as a man's right of property in the service of slaves. The relation is clearly and distinctly defined by the law, and as clearly and distinctly recognized by the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I would like to put another inquiry to the gentleman. I understand him to announce the doctrine that any man is property who is made so by municipal law.

Mr. C. A. WHITE. That, sir, is not the question.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I wish now to ask the gentleman what he understands by the phrase in the Declaration of Independence in regard to man's "inalienable right to liberty." In the opinion of the gentleman, has any man an "inalienable right to liberty?"

Mr. C. A. WHITE. I will come directly to that question—the doctrine of inalienability of rights.

As I was proceeding to argue, that is property which the local municipal law makes property. Everything that we have in this material universe is the gift of God to man for his sustenance, for his support, and for his comfort. This beautiful world and all its treasures were given to mankind in general. They were originally no more the property of one man than another. They were given for the common use of all. But the necessities of society required that there should be separate and distinct rights of individuals with reference to this world and its products; and the appropriation of them by individuals is recognized by the municipal customary law and by the fundamental law of the land. Gentlemen who claim that it is a violation of "the inalienable rights of man" for one man to hold property in the labor of another, might as well claim that it was a violation of "inalienable rights" for one man to appropriate to himself to the exclusion of others any part of this common gift of God to man, bestowed as a common heritage. This is the result of the doctrine. It is a leveling principle; it is agrarian in its character, and once entered upon there is no telling when to stop.

The right to service in slaves, then, is recognized as property. That right of property cannot be taken away from any person except by "due process of law." "Due process of law," as I before remarked, imports day in court and trial by jury. The only power, then, that can reach this question is the omnipotent sovereignty of the State, which rises above and overshadows, controls and molds, every other power and every other right and interest. Why, sir, the right to possess and enjoy property is essential to the very existence of man. We could not live without it. It is guaranteed in the Constitution. Maryland and Missouri have abolished slavery. How did they do it? They did it by the exercise of the sovereignty of the State, and consistently with this provision of the Constitution, guarantying the right of individuals in property. They did it by conventions representing the sovereignty of the State. They did it consistently with the provisions of the Constitution, because the Constitution itself recognizes the sovereignty of the States.

Sir, I am a believer to the fullest extent in that doctrine which has been denounced upon this floor as a damnable heresy—the absolute, unqualified sovereignty of the States. And I believe it is because these States are absolutely and exclusively sovereign that they may, in the exercise of their sovereignty delegated to conventions for the purpose, dispose of this institution of slavery, and that, too, consistently with this provision written down in the tenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, what is sovereignty? It is defined by our law-writers to be the supreme power in the land. There can be but one supreme power; supreme is superlative; there can be none greater. There cannot be more than one supreme power over the same subject-matter at one and the same time. If the Congress of the United States is supreme and sovereign the States cannot be supreme and sovereign. If the States are supreme in power the Congress of the United States cannot be. It is an absolute absurdity and monstrosity to allege the contrary. Why, sir, we should then be in a worse condition than that child who was claimed by two mothers; we should be torn to pieces by these two omnipotent powers. Sovereignty is a thing that inheres in a State, it cannot be parted with, it cannot be alienated. The States could not dispose of their sovereignty.

Now, what is the sovereign power in a State? Is it this beautiful statuary we see around us here? Is it these marble halls? Is it these ornamented columns? the exquisite tapestry we see around us? Is it the Congress of the United States, with the President and the Supreme Court? Is that the sovereignty of the nation—the sovereignty of the State? No, sir; the people are the State. The people are the sovereigns. The people never parted with their sovereignty. For the sake of convenience and from the necessities of the case, millions of people scattered and dispersed over a vast extent of territory must act through agencies and through instrumentalities in making their sovereignty felt and demonstrating it in the administration of government.

We are, sir, here to-day nothing more nor less than the agencies appointed and designated through the proper forms established by the sovereign power in the State to execute their will in the administration of the Government, according to the limitations of the powers which they themselves have imposed upon us. Was it the United States who sent us here as a consolidated mass? We are elected here by the people of the States. The Constitution provides that we shall be. It provides for the apportionment of representation among the States, and that States shall elect members of Congress, and that the State Legislatures shall elect Senators, and that each State acting independently, freely, voluntarily, by its own volition, shall select electors of President and Vice President, and certify the result here. It provides that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint the judiciary. Thus every officer, every man who represents either of the separate and distinct coordinate Departments of the Government, derives his power mediately or immediately through the people of the States by their free, voluntary action in the exercise of the power of sovereignty.

What is the Constitution of the United States? It is nothing more nor less than the prescribed form adopted by the separate and distinct sovereignties through and by which these agencies shall be appointed, and placing limitations to the powers which they shall exercise. And that is all there is of it, delegating the powers that they shall exercise, and limiting the powers to the States. That is the whole scope of the Constitution.

What are the constitutions of the States? They are not the delegations of power, because the State is sovereign, and the constitutions of the States are limitations of power upon the Legislatures, State agencies appointed for the purpose of administering the regular objects of government. One is a delegation and the other a limitation of powers, and we of the Federal Government can only exercise such powers as are granted, and the State government cannot exercise any powers that are prohibited, but it may exercise all that are not prohibited.

Why, sir, you might as well attempt to make me believe that a man can be the subject of two omnipotent Gods, as be the subject of two sovereignties.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. C. A. WHITE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Does not the Constitution of the United States provide that that Constitution and the laws made in pursuance thereof and the treaties made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. C. A. WHITE. Why certainly it does. Mr. KELLEY. If it be supreme, what other, under your argument, can be supreme?

Mr. C. A. WHITE. It is supreme because these sovereign States, each one speaking for itself, has said it shall be supreme; and it is because we are simply the agents and representatives of these supreme and sovereign powers that it is supreme acting within the scope of the powers they have delegated to us.

No, sir; I claim that the States have not, by any provision in the Constitution of the United States, expressed or implied, conferred upon the Congress of the United States jurisdiction over this matter, that they have never parted with or alienated their sovereignty or any part of it, and indeed they could not part with or alienate it.

But it is claimed that the fifth article of the Constitution delegates this power, and gives the power to amend over every subject, and that it is limited only by the discretion of Congress and of the people. Now, sir, this, to my mind, is an absurdity. I do not believe that there is a State in this Union—certainly not one of the original thirteen States—that would have adopted this Constitution with any such understanding. Why, sir, if that proposition were true, what might not three fourths of the States do? They might impose all the burdens of taxation upon one quarter of the States. I do not believe that any such power as this belongs to the United States, or to three fourths of the States, or can be enforced in the shape of a constitutional amendment.

Now, sir, what is this proposition, and who are most to be affected by it? Why, the eleven States of this Union that now have no voice upon this floor have millions of dollars of property staked upon this issue, and which you propose simply by force of this amendment to wrest from their possession at once without any compensation without any process of law, and in violation of all those great fundamental principles of right, justice, and law, which obtain among civilized and Christian nations. But I am here told that these people are absent of their own wrong. The fact that they are not here gives us no additional power, and confers upon us, as a political body, no additional rights. It is as a question of power and right that I discuss this question. That they are not here does not affect the question of right. Those States are the real parties interested in this matter, except, perhaps, the State of Kentucky. And it is proposed to affect these material rights of these parties without their consent here, and without their consent by means of a ratification of this provision. Now, sir, it is very clear to my mind that this cannot be done.

Mr. Speaker, the discussion upon this subject has been chiefly upon the abstract question of slavery itself. Now, sir, I am not here the advocate of slavery, or the apologist of slavery, and I have no interest in the institution, except so far as I am interested in it in common with every other citizen of my State. But, pass this constitutional amendment, and will it affect the status of individuals within the States designed to be affected by it? Will that make a single man free? If slavery goes down, if go down it must, it will be under the sturdy and stunning blows dealt upon it by your armies; it will be by the application of force to that institution. It will be by driving the rebels to that state of extremity that they will be compelled to crowd the list of their armies with their slaves. I believe that if we drive that people to that extremity and force them to enlist their three million slaves into their armies, with the promise of freedom for their service, that annihilation of slavery by these means will sound the death-knell of the Union forever.

I do not believe with some gentlemen upon the other side of the House that this war is an instrument in the hands of God for the purpose of working out His designs with reference to this institution of slavery. I do not believe that God writes His decrees in the blood of brother shed by brother. I do not believe that this war is of God. I believe further that if this institution is a heinous sin against God, and an offense against the laws of humanity and civilization, as gentlemen claim it to be, that those laws ordained of God from the foundation of time for the government of the moral and material universe, will finally work out the eradication of this institution peaceably, quietly, without any disturbance of the elements of society.

I believe that these are the instrumentalities through and by which the institution would have finally been disposed of. The heated, unwise, angry discussions for the last thirty years on this question in Congress and out of Congress have done much to strengthen the institution of slavery. Each side has gone to extremes, the one just as far as the other. If we had kept open every avenue of approach to the hearts, consciences, and affections of the people of the South; if we had quietly and peacefully, as Christians, in the spirit of our holy religion, talked over this matter, compared our views and sentiments, thrown open our pulpits to the ministers of the South as to the ministers of the North, and they to us, the work of overthrowing slavery would have been advanced far more than it now is; Maryland would have been free long before this; Kentucky would have been free; Delaware would have been free; Virginia would have been free; and the same influences that operated upon those States would hover in the tier of States lying below until finally the institution would have been wiped out without the effusion of a single drop of blood. Sir, it is to the exercise of these influences and to the arbitrament of the laws of God, governing the moral and material universe, that I would leave the institution of slavery. I would not give the life of the least of our soldiers in the field for the freedom of a hundred negroes; I am for committing the arbitrament of this institution to the determination and solution of those laws.

Sir, what will be the consequences flowing from this provision if it can be enforced and carried out? It is not so much a provision to free the slaves as it is a provision to obstruct and prevent the return of the seceded States to the Union. I will not say that it is intended as an obstruction to prevent the restoration of the Union, but I will say that that will be the only effect of this constitutional amendment if you adopt it. You have already, God knows, thrown obstructions enough in the way of the return of those States. Your schemes of confiscation and of emancipation and of proscription have retarded restoration; and now, by your scheme of constitutional amendment, you will render the restoration of the American Union upon the basis of the fathers an absolute impossibility, and render the restoration of a permanent and lasting peace, founded in the affections, in the consent, in the good-will which every citizen owes and feels toward his Government, an impossibility for ages to come.

I have therefore constantly opposed all these schemes, because I have desired the restoration of the Union of these States, and because I have, in the exercise of the best judgment I could bring to bear, believed that all these measures could only have the effect of obstructing the passage of those States back into the Union. This war having been commenced ought never to have been prosecuted beyond that point at which the people against whom it is waged would have been willing to come back into the Union upon terms of perfect equality, terms that would secure their rights and us our rights, and perpetuate their liberties and our liberties; and, sir, the war is carried on against God and against humanity and civilization when it is prosecuted beyond that point. We have no right to impose new conditions of union upon the people of the South, only so far as the dumb eloquence of numbers and power gives us the right.

But, sir, let me now look at the humanity of this measure. What will be the effect of turning loose in our midst here more than three million men without property, at a time of great political commotion, when all the foundations of society are broken up, and while we are convulsed by a terrible revolution that is rocking the land from one end to the other? What will be the effect of turning loose this mass of people? Where will they go? What do you propose to do with them? Do you propose to enfranchise them, and make them "before the law," as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] says, the equals of the white man; give them the right of suffrage; the right to hold office; the right to sit upon juries? Do you intend, in other words, to make this a mongrel Government, instead of a white man's Government? Do you intend to degrade the United States of America to the low condition of the provinces of Central America? Is it for that that we are wasting our blood and our treasure? Have we no higher aim or purpose than this in this great struggle in which we are engaged?

That, as I said before, will be the effect of throwing this people on their own resources. They cannot remain South. If you liberate the negro by the bayonet, the tenure by which he will hold his liberty will be only that by which you have given it to him; he will be free just as long as the soldier sets his bayonet between the slave and the master, and no longer. The exodus of the negro race from all these States is absolutely necessary if it would be free. Where can the negro go? Certainly not to the cold regions of New England. Its types of industry, manufactures, are but illy adapted to the nature and capacity of that race.

The Mississippi valley where we are engaged in the simpler pursuits of agriculture is destined to be the home of that people. There we have prejudices, and those prejudices are things which are of ourselves a part. We cannot eradicate them if we would. Force the emancipated negroes upon us, make them our equals before the law, place in their possession the balance of power in this country, let them control the elections and dictate who shall manage the Government of the country, and what will be the result? It is easily understood. Civil commotion and internal strife will follow, however much we may regret it.

The only way, then, to a restoration of a permanent and lasting peace, a peace that will give strength and stability to the Government, and win to it the hearts and consciences of the American people, is to find some basis on which all can stand, which will secure the rights of all, and perpetuate the liberties of all.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment an act (H. R. No. 595) to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831.

That it had passed with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House,

An act (H. R. No. 607) to provide for an advance of rank to officers of the Navy and Marine corps for distinguished merit; and

An act (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1865.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (S. No. 385) authorizing the President to appoint a Second Assistant Secretary of War; and

An act (S. No. 365) in relation to pensions.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY—AGAIN.

Mr. SMITHERS. Mr. Speaker, after the elaborate discussion which this question has received, it ought perhaps to be deemed superfluous to add anything to the matter which has already been adduced in support of the pending proposition.

The locality from which I come, and the people which I represent, are the only considerations which induce me to trespass upon the patience of the House, already sufficiently taxed. Representing a constituency governed by laws tolerating and regulating the institution of African slavery, it is scarcely proper that I should permit the vote to be taken on a measure so important and so material to their interests, without a brief presentation of the reasons which induce me to support it. In doing so I shall not deal with the humanitarian phase of the question, or argue the share slavery has had in originating or maintaining the existing rebellion.

The immediate practical effect of this measure is to abrogate the possibility of slavery in Kentucky and Delaware, and it is in view of the fact that I have the honor to represent the people of the latter State, that I feel it incumbent on me to offer any suggestion in relation to it. Satisfied that the measure is constitutional and beneficial, not only to the Republic, but eminently to my immediate constituency, I cheerfully accord my vote to the passage of the bill.

In arguing the constitutionality of the question there has but one objection been proposed that strikes me with any degree of plausibility. The power of amendment is so clearly conferred by the Constitution, and the mode so distinctly pointed out, as to preclude question or even cavil as to the authority or the method. Unless the Constitution be itself unconstitutional, there can be no difficulty in the exercise of the power so far as this House is concerned in originating this measure. That instrument has explicitly provided for its own amendment. This power was distinctly surrendered by the States and the people, save only in the two cases expressly mentioned, and except as to them exists without limitation. So in the ratification by the Legislatures or conventions to which it is to be referred; the power is expressly delegated to three fourths to bind the whole, and the act of the requisite number is agreed and declared to be considered as the act of the whole as fully as if each had formally assented and actually adopted the proposed measure. The only question which remains is whether the subject of African slavery is properly and legally within the purview and fair intendment of prohibition by constitutional amendment; and here the objection is raised that we invade the domain of private rights and destroy the vested interests which individuals have in a subject of property.

The mistake of those who propose this objection seems to me to consist in not sufficiently distinguishing between the taking of the thing and the abolition of the tenure by which it is held. I do not entirely agree with those who allege that slavery is impossible in law or necessarily unconstitutional. It has been too long established, too clearly recognized, not only by the acquiescence, but by the express sanction of the Constitution and the repeated adjudication of the courts, for me to deny its legality or doubt the validity of the right. Its origin lost in the remoteness of antiquity, practiced at some time by every nation of the earth, it vindicates its lawfulness by the universality of its existence, and cites as the monument of its title the common consent of mankind. And the sentiment that "that is property which the law makes property," however condemned by the moralist or reprobated by the humanitarian, must be respected by the jurist and accepted by the legislator.

The nature of the right, however, is material in determining the question presented for solution, and the quality of the recognition is equally material in deciding the extent of our constitutional power. How far soever into the past the beginning of the enslavement of mankind may have extended, it is unquestionable that it has its origin in force. It claims no natural sanction for its existence, nor in its operation is it confined to any race. The white man equally with the black has been the subject of its oppressive jurisdiction. The slave pens of Algiers have confined Christian captives until they were haled forth to the auction block; and our boasted Saxon ancestors wore around their necks the symbols of bondage. In this country it has existed from its earliest settlement, and in every colony it found forbearance, if not active effort for its introduction and maintenance. It obtained in Massachusetts as well as in South Carolina, and that it spread more rapidly and endured more firmly in the latter is due perhaps quite as much to the quality of the climate and the adaptation of the soil to the productions rendering its labor remunerative as to the superior morality or intelligence of the inhabitants. Though thus universally practiced, its injustice was too patent not to be recognized, and its tendencies too deleterious not to be mourned. Its existence became soon to be tolerated rather than encouraged, and at the adoption of the Constitution there is abundant evidence, not only of the hope but the expectation, that it would soon cease to prevail. And in this connection it ought not to be forgotten that its introduction into Indiana was denied even by southern slave-owners against the repeated petition of the inhabitants. The invention of the cotton-gin gave a fresh impetus to its expansion, and by rendering it more valuable stimulated its growth. The inventive genius of New England furnished the inducement, and the cupidity of the master, in estimating his pecuniary advantages, lost sight of the wrong.

Mr. Speaker, I am no apologist for slavery, but I cannot be false to truth by willfully perverting history. The necessary characteristics of slavery are bad enough; it is of itself and in itself wrong enough; its concomitants and consequences are injurious enough to deserve universal condemnation without attributing to the master qualities which sink him below the level of mankind.

It is not true that wanton cruelty and unmitigated oppression were universally or even ordinarily exercised toward the slave. The fact that from four hundred thousand, at the adoption of the Constitution, the race has increased to four million in the space of less than eighty years, is a sufficient evidence that their treatment has been generally humane.

In this respect the slave-owners of the South present a marked and laudable contrast to those of the West Indies, where a different policy prevailed. In the latter it was the accepted maxim that it was cheaper to import than to raise; more profitable to kill than to maintain. The result was visible in the effect. While in those islands at the time of the emancipation there were fewer slaves than had been imported, in the States they have increased to tenfold their original number.

The title by which they are held, and the nature of the property recognized and protected, form the material subjects for our consideration in answering or avoiding the objections proposed to the pending measure. Whatever this right is, it exists only by the laws of the States in which the institution obtains. It has no warrant in nature; it finds no sanction in the enumeration of the subjects of property over which dominion was given to man by the Creator. Whether existing by force of custom, or by immemorial usage, or by positive enactment, its origin is human and not divine. So existing it was confined to the locality in which the custom obtained, or over which the law recognizing it was capable of enforcement. If the slave escaped beyond this jurisdiction, if the master carried him beyond its confines, the bond which obliged him was loosed, the tenure by which he was held was dissolved. The owner could neither retake or detain. That such was the light in which it was regarded by the framers of the Constitution is manifest from the necessity of the clause authorizing the recapture and requiring the surrender. The language in which it is couched is guardedly framed. In this provision it is expressly and intentionally declared that—

"No person held to service or labor in any State under the laws thereof shall, by escaping into another, be deemed to be discharged."

The tenure by which such person was held was declared to be the municipal law of the State—that and that only was recognized as the foundation of the claim. When such law ceased to exist, either by the act of the constituted authorities of the State or by the intervention of a superior power rendering it null, the right was at an end by the abrogation of the authority by which alone it had existence. The property or thing is not taken, but the law is repealed under and by virtue of which we could set up any claim to a slave. The operation of the amendment is upon the law, not upon the subject; its effect is to convert into a man that which the law declared was a chattel; but this effect only followed as the result of ousting the jurisdiction which enables the courts to take cognizance of the claim of the master.

The Constitution specially ordains that—

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, * * * shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Providing in terms for its own amendment, the same high and overruling sanction pertains to every provision subsequently ordained in conformity with the mode prescribed.

In conferring this power I have said that the people imposed no limitations except in the particulars specified, and in adopting the very clause they refuse to incorporate a provision which from its connection and language by necessary construction was intended to protect the institution of slavery from destruction by constitutional amendment. Nor to this question of power is it material whether the Constitution is a compact between States or an organic law emanating from and founded upon the express sanction of the people. In the one case it would inure as a surrender by the States of a right of sovereignty, and would operate upon them in their political capacities as parties to the agreement; in the other as a limitation by the people upon their own power when acting through the agency of State organizations. Nor in the exercise of this power is there any just pretense of right to compensation. This claim inures under the special provision of the Constitution, and then only when private property is taken for public use. It has no reference to the action of the people in ordaining a Constitution, nor are communities restrained by any such limitations in exercising sovereign power over the personal or proprietary rights of the subject in settling the principles of government. Without a provision saving the right there is no restriction; the mode or extent of its exercise depends upon the will of the sovereign.

By the arrêt of France abolishing slavery in her colonies, it was done immediately, unconditionally, and without compensation. Great Britain in performing an act of similar character recognized the propriety of payment to the master for the loss of the service of the slave. In either case it was a mere question of expediency, and each sovereignty regulated the matter according to its own discretion.

Having no doubt, Mr. Speaker, as to the right of Congress to initiate this measure, I pass to the consideration of the question whether in voting for it I should act in conformity with the sentiments of my immediate constituents.

Slavery has obtained in the State of Delaware by force of the general customary law to which it everywhere owes its existence, and is regulated by statutory provisions without ever having received the sanction or support of constitutional recognition. Though established by immemorial usage, maintained by force of habit and education, and operated as a political machine, it has never been regarded with affection by the people. Founded only in custom, it has obtained no place in the organic law of the Government, and may at any time be abolished by an ordinary act of legislation. Nowhere does it exist in so mild a form—the master subject to so many restraints, or the slave guaranteed such substantial protection.

The wise and humane sentiments prevailing from the earliest period impressed themselves upon the legislation of the State, and prevented its growth by prohibiting the introduction or extradition of a slave except under specified conditions and stringent regulations.

Regarding him as a person entitled to the protection of law as well as the subject of property in a modified sense; it forbade the master to deal with him as an ordinary article of commerce, by preventing the exportation for sale. It kept his value reduced to the price justified by the demands of a purely agricultural region, in which his labor had no peculiar value, and by prohibiting the introduction from abroad it announced its judgment that such species of population was neither beneficial nor desirable.

Not only is this sentiment manifested by the general legislation of the State; but on more than one occasion the Representatives of the people have expressed their opinion in unequivocal and memorable terms.

In the contest which occurred as to the admission of Missouri, a resolution was adopted by the General Assembly with entire unanimity in the House of Representatives and with but two dissenting voices in the Senate, declaring that in the admission of any State into the Union it was not only the right but the duty of Congress to require, as an inviolable condition, the fundamental provision that it should forever thereafter be free from slavery.

Whatever opinion may be entertained as to the right to exact this condition there can be no doubt as to the judgment of the State in relation to its propriety. In 1845 in the discussion which ensued concerning the acquisition of Texas, the Legislature resolved that slavery was a moral, social, and political evil, and denounced the project of annexation as designed for its extension and perpetuation, and at the following session in 1847, having gone before the people upon the principle of that resolution and being sustained by their votes, the General Assembly adopted the Wilmot proviso.

It is unnecessary to recur to subsequent events to account for the apparent decline of the anti-slavery sentiment in Delaware. In the general abandonment of their manhood by the friends of liberty throughout the whole country we participated, and the hand of freedom went back upon the dial. Again it is moving forward and is fast upon the hour of noon.

Of all those who voted for me I do not know one who would not vote for this amendment; and I am well assured that of those who did not support me there are hundreds, perhaps thousands, who will hail with joy the accomplishment of this great measure of justice, tranquillity, and security.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, an impartial listener to the discussion here for the last few days might reasonably come to the conclusion that all those gentlemen who did not favor the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States were either enemies of the Union or supporters of the institution of slavery. Sir, on behalf of the constituents whom I have the honor to represent, and on my own behalf, I deny the imputation, and I ask the attention of the House to the reading of a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives July 22, 1861.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Resolved, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in revolt against the constitutional Government and in arms around the capital. That in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country. That this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, in the interpretation of that resolution, in the wise and truly national spirit it exhibits, are to be found the views of my constituency. Sir, the able arguments on this question that have been presented to the House render it assumption on my part to occupy their attention longer than briefly to state that my vote will be found recorded against the amendment on this ground, if no other, that in a time of civil war the laws of society lose their force, and are seldom supplied by those of humanity; the ardor of contention, the pride of victory, the memory of past injuries, the sense of future dangers, all conspire to render the public mind incapable of judging calmly, much less of changing the organic law of the Constitution which the greatest minds have pronounced the greatest monument of human wisdom.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I will not discuss the question of political power involved in this amendment. I will consider only the question of expediency.

It is not, sir, the hour of peace and prosperity, but of misfortune, that tests the principles of a Government and the fortitude of its people. The gravest question that ever forced itself on any nation—the gravest because it affects the fortunes and freedom of uncounted millions—is that which we are solving. Will this nation pass through the fiery ordeal resisting the countless tendencies to absolutism of power inevitably incident to a great war, and preserve the form and substance of its Government unimpaired? I trust in the God of our fathers that we shall; but if we do, sir, the virtue and fortitude of our people will stand without a parallel in the history of mankind. That the public mind should be active in seeking expedients to avert the impending danger is but natural. That the several departments of this Government should seek to usurp power on the ever-present plea of public necessity conforms to the experience of other nations. That a great party, flushed with victory, should seize upon such a moment to carry out a leading idea of partisan faith, however much to be deplored, is but the nature and instinct of party. These are but natural, and against them our fathers have arrayed the just divisions of political power, for experience had shown how public danger and apparent necessity had ever suggested the usurpations which changed the foundations of government. But it is remarkable, sir, and a painful consideration, that in the Constitution of our country, so long the subject of eulogy in all quarters of the globe, should be found the cause of our misfortunes, and in its amendment their only remedy.

Two bills are pending in this House to amend the Constitution: the one to abolish the institution of African slavery, the other to authorize the Federal Government to impose an export duty on the products of the United States. The one measure affects the domestic policy of certain States, and especially the State of Kentucky; the other imposes a direct tax on the labor and products of the States of the Northwest, ever seeking a market beyond the limits of our own country. My colleague, [Mr. ORIN], in his very able advocacy of the one measure, a few days since, did not inform the House or his constituents of his views of the other. It is true it was not the subject of debate, but the question was natural, when you begin to amend the Constitution, where will it end? To weaken our rebel enemies is the argument for the one measure; the absolute necessity of increased taxation is the argument for the other. Who shall foretell, sir, what other necessities for amendment will appear? The sanctity of that venerated instrument once impaired, the harmony of its provisions destroyed, and who shall tell of the wreck which party spirit will make of the title-deed of our freedom?

Gentlemen assume that the Constitution is responsible for slavery and bewail the error of our fathers. Sir, this assumption is not true. The Constitution is in no sense responsible for slavery. The whole theory of the Government is that the States alone control their domestic affairs; no power of local domestic government is delegated to Congress: "the powers not delegated are reserved to the States or to the people." If in the judgment of our fathers African slavery had been inconsistent with a republican form of government, it could have been abolished under the power to "guaranty to each State a republican form of government." But Washington signed the bills to admit Kentucky and Vermont into the Union with their respective domestic policies. Generations had confirmed this interpretation of the Constitution. To preserve the comity of the States persons fleeing from justice or from engagements for service or labor were to be surrendered up; this provision neither establishes nor recognizes slavery. You do not even in your amendment propose its repeal. It would be proper if slavery never existed; the words do not imply slavery. As a citizen of a free State, as a Representative of a free people, I thank God that the Constitution of the United States, the object of our love and veneration, is not responsible for any form of human servitude. It organizes States possessed of domestic sovereignty into a sovereign nation; it charges upon the Federal Government the duty of maintaining the integrity of that nation, to represent it in the family of nations, nothing less, nothing more. In domestic affairs the States are foreign to each other. I am in no sense responsible for the domestic policy of Kentucky. You are not, sir. I would resist interference in her domestic affairs as I would resist even with arms her interference with the domestic policy of my own State. Such was the universal doctrine of our fathers. Such has ever been the doctrine of the Democratic party of the free States. Yet, sir, for not interfering you charge the Democratic party with being pro-slavery. Sir, what is more unjust and ungenerous and untruthful than party spirit? The Democratic party pro-slavery because they insist on the right of the States to domestic government! Sir, the charge brands with pro-slaveryism every illustrious statesman of the Republic, from Washington and Adams to Webster and Clay, and the great army of heroes who survived the Revolution and bequeathed to you the legacy of free government. Instead of a reproach it is the highest encomium upon the Democracy of the free States that they have resisted the rage of fanaticism in their fidelity to the principles of these illustrious men.

It is not to be questioned, sir, that many, I may say most, of the earlier statesmen, even of the southern States, were impressed with the belief that slavery in any form was a crime against human nature, but States were forming a Government, and the harmony and strength of that Government depended as much on their domestic sovereignty as on the national sovereignty of the Federal power, and looking to the freedom of the white race, everywhere else enslaved, they organized government on that foundation, content that each State should be responsible to God and humanity for the exercise of its domestic powers, and three generations, the most fortunate in history, were faithful to the compact. The Democratic party of the free States are neither the advocates nor the apologists for slavery. Democracy and slavery are natural enemies. Impressed with the value of free labor, there is not a Democrat in the North who would not resist the establishment of slavery in a free State, for what free people, sir, have ever failed to regard their own institutions the best? In opposing this amendment the Democratic party are not controlled by a desire to preserve African slavery; they oppose it because they are for the Constitution just as it is, just as our fathers made it. They oppose it especially at this time, when impending danger demands the united energies of every friend of free government—of Kentucky, against whom this measure is especially directed, as well as of every other State of the Union—wherever, indeed, a citizen is found loyal to the Constitution of his country; we need the united energy of them all. The Constitution is the common standard around which the friends of freedom may rally. In the gathering darkness leave us at least this pillar of light.

Mr. Speaker, there is one feature of this debate which must have struck the impartial hearer with astonishment. I speak with deference. I refer to the intemperate vagaries indulged in by gentlemen on this question of slavery, greatly to the dishonor of our country, and manifestly unjust to its history. Slavery is but an incident to our Government for which the nation is not responsible; an unfortunate legacy from the remote ages. It may be assailed without tarnishing the fame of the Republic. Yet gentlemen, like the reformers of France, would invalidate all the cherished traditions of the past to open up their new era. Thus it has become the rage to underrate the value of our Government. My colleague, [Mr. ORIN], usually so conservative, will excuse me for illustrating by reference to his able speech on the pending question. Looking upon the past, once so cheerful, my colleague only sees eighty years of infamy and dishonor. How miserable have been our people! Only by a kind dispensation of Providence could they have been unconscious of their misery! A dreary and desolate retrospect. Not a ray of light illumines the eighty years of the past. We shrink from its history. We would deny our fathers and claim that we are aliens in the land of our birth. If my colleague is right how cruelly our people have been deceived in indulging the belief that they were the happiest people on the face of the earth! Yet still it was a pleasant delusion, and he ought not to have torn away the veil and exposed our wretchedness.

According to my colleague whatever the last eighty years has produced has been the effect of slavery. To the undistempored imagination he is conceding infinitely too much to slavery. I think it is entitled to no such credit; but to him slavery is alone responsible for the past, and he wants a new era, something better than the old. "It [slavery] laid its hand on our nervous system and the nation became palsied." When was this, sir? Was it in the great Revolution or in the second war for independence? Was it in establishing a great empire in the Northwest and prosperous States on the Pacific? Was it in the war with Mexico, or when Abraham Lincoln called for seventy-five thousand men to uphold the Constitution, and then for more and more and more, until the tramp of our gallant armies shook the continent? When was it, sir, that the mighty energies of this nation were palsied? "For eighty years it has molded the legislation of the country." What, slavery such a legislator! He gives slavery too much credit. I deny its claim to any such honor. Our system of laws has been deemed the best in the world by our credulous people. In four years of ample power you have only repealed two of the many thousands which have been enacted, one approved by Washington and the other by Fillmore. If these laws are the offspring of slavery, why does not my friend introduce a bill to wipe out the infamous record? "For eighty years it has controlled the foreign policy of the Government." That foreign policy has preserved an unexampled peace and given us an empire extending from the Gulf to the Pacific. Franklin and Adams and Jefferson and Clay and Bancroft were not deemed mean ambassadors, and until now were not deemed minions of the slave power.

But my colleague reaches the climax when he declares that "for eighty years it has made the American name a hissing and a byword among the nations of the earth." And what nation, sir, has been so prosperous and free that it could afford to hiss at this ignoble Republic? Is it Great Britain, sir, after being twice scourged from our soil, and twice beaten by our navies upon the ocean; a nation, sir, that holds millions of her own people in servitude, oppresses Ireland, planted slavery on these shores, and for a century has held a hundred million of the people of Asia in hopeless slavery? Is it France, sir, with the iron heel of a usurping tyrant on the neck of prostrate millions, and holding millions more on the soil of Africa, in the seat of the ancient empire of Carthage, in abject slavery? Is it France that could hiss at America, the France who, to replenish an exhausted treasury, sold us an empire already cursed with African slavery? Is it the despot of Russia or of Austria, or the petty despotism of Portugal or Spain, or the still pettier despotisms which mar the face of Europe, where labor toils on from age to age without hope, and from the oppression of which millions have fled to our shores? Are these the favored nations, sir, that can sneer at our Republic? Or does my colleague refer to the Ottoman empire, with its uncounted millions of serfs? Or upon our own continent, to Brazil, an empire founded upon African slavery; or to Mexico, where African slavery, it is true, is abolished—Massachusetts herself could not complain of her radicalism—but where the flag of the eagle floats no more, and a people once a republic weakened by internal feuds trembles at the tread of a petty scion of a race of tyrants, and these nations applaud when a republic is blotted out—is it unfortunate Mexico that can hiss at the only Government on earth that could have saved her from a fate more terrible than death? Is it Switzerland, whose hardy sons come in thousands from her rocky ramparts, where freedom defies the rage of tyrants, to a republicanism purer than her own? Where is the nation, sir, on God's green earth, that stands so erect and spotless in the light of freedom that it can hiss at the dazzling brightness of this Republic, unless it be tyrants who, like reptiles, hiss at the sun that warms the nations into life? No, sir; with all her imperfections and her faults, even in the present hour of her adversity, in all the elements of human happiness, of justice, and liberty, she stands the first among the nations, not a "byword" to the nations, but the hope of the downtrodden poor, and a terror to tyrants. No son of America can afford to defame his own country.

"For eighty years it has commanded the Army and Navy." What does my colleague mean? Have not the Army and Navy been well commanded? From Washington to Grant, have ever more consummate soldiers commanded armies? From Paul Jones to Farragut, have ever greater captains swept the ocean? Army and Navy! Is my colleague ashamed of their history? I blush at the question. Does my colleague eulogize slavery, or does he condemn the Army and Navy? But again: "For eighty years it has robbed the American people of their rights under the Constitution." Who has done this? Slavery, slaveholders, the southern people represented in the Federal Government; Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Clay, Crittenden, nay, Washington himself was one of the robbers; yet in that period seven powerful free States have grown up and flourished on soil freely surrendered by a slave State to freedom. Yet for eighty years we have been robbed of our constitutional rights, and, what is worse, by the very men who made the Constitution; and our cowardly fathers have submitted to it, nay, more, my worthy colleague, a Clay Whig, submitted to it himself for a quarter of a century, and the elder and the younger Adams and Fillmore and Webster submitted to it, and Silas Wright and Cass and Douglas, and all the great masses of the ever-growing and increasing free States. What vile dishonor if they did submit; if they did not, why defame their memory?

"It has defiled the judicial ermine and corrupted every department of Government." How could my colleague live in a country so infamous? Why has divine justice spared such a country?

I had thought, sir, that no son of America could speak thus of her judiciary, of whose distinguished members it has been said by one of the purest of American scholars, they "distributed justice with the same independence and impartiality to the helpless alien and the mighty Napoleon, to the humble citizen and the corporation, to public officers and to States. Neither awed by power, nor influenced by patronage, nor seduced by talents and learning, nor corrupted by wealth; serene, courteous, and dignified, amid intimidation and calumny they have never forgotten what was due to their own honor and usefulness, or to the character of their country;" they have been "the pride and honor as they have been the good genius of these United States." Thus, sir, all that is pure, and noble, and virtuous, must be blackened and turned into ashes, and the very dead defamed, that the public faith may be destroyed in the excellence of our Government, that party spirit may riot on the ruins of its Constitution. How much more like a patriot does John Quincy Adams review the history of his country for thirty-six years, which gentlemen are now accustomed to characterize as a tissue of infamy, corruption, and fraud:

"The year of jubilee since the first formation of the Union has just elapsed; that of the declaration of our independence is at hand. The consummation of both was effected by this Constitution. Since that period a population of four million have multiplied to twelve; a territory bounded by the Mississippi has been extended from sea to sea; new States have been admitted to the Union equal to those of the first Confederation; treaties of peace, amity, and commerce, have been concluded with the principal dominions of the earth; the people of other nations, inhabitants of regions acquired not by conquest but by compact, have been united with us in the participation of our rights and duties, of our burdens and blessings; the forests have fallen by the ax of our woodmen; the soil has been made to teem by the tillage of our farmers; our commerce has whitened every ocean; the dominion of man over physical nature has been extended by the invention of our artists; liberty and law have marched hand in hand; all the purposes of human association have been accomplished as effectively as under any other Government on the globe, and at a cost little exceeding in a whole generation the expenditure of other nations in a single year. Such is the exaggerated picture of our condition under a Constitution founded upon the republican principle of equal rights. To admit that this picture has its shades is but to say that it is still the condition of men upon earth."

How different from the language of this hour! Now the shades and imperfections alone are seen, and the rich blessings conferred by the Constitution inspire no gratitude. My colleague would reform the Constitution that we may have, "in truth and in fact, a republican form of government." The great statesmen who formed the Constitution believed that they were establishing, "in truth and in fact, a republican form of government." Were they or are these reformers deceived? What list of names in the world's history compares with theirs, Washington, Hamilton, Franklin, Madison, John Rutledge, and all? Yet politicians would question their wisdom and reform the instrument which has created this great Republic, and which, for sixty years, even party spirit has not dared to assail. Sir, that Constitution has been the source of our greatness, and is now the only ark of our safety.

It is said, sir, that the doctrine of State rights is the cause of the present war, and this amendment, while apparently aimed at slavery, is in truth an attack on the rights of the States; not of some, but of all, at least by the establishment of a precedent. Amend this Constitution now and future amendments will be easily effected; the argument of necessity is never wanting. Begin, and consolidation is inevitable, and then, sir, how long will the public liberty survive? I deny, sir, that the doctrine of States rights now so generally sneered at by those who desire a strong Government, has contributed to this rebellion. The pretended right of secession is a most infamous perversion of that doctrine. Mr. Madison declared it to be "a colossal heresy." There is not an intelligent man in America who in truth believes that one State or eleven States have the right to destroy the Government. The proposition is monstrous; it was a dishonest pretense that could have deceived no citizen. The rebellion is the offspring of the fierce partisan feuds between the politicians of the North and the South and the remorseless ambition of the southern leaders, and slavery was the pretense, as the tariff was in the days of Jackson. It was not the assertion of a right, but an appeal to revolution. I have ever asserted, sir, that it was the solemn duty of the Federal Government to maintain the Union, a duty from which it could not escape; and if, sir, in this appeal to arms on the dishonest pretense of protecting slavery, which has moistened the land with the best blood of the Republic, slavery has perished, there will be no tears shed over its grave. It is a just retribution for an unspeakable crime.

Mr. Speaker, is it necessary to amend the Constitution to abolish slavery? My colleague has said that nothing can shield it from its inevitable doom; no act of ours is necessary to secure that result. Viewing the present posture of affairs, I concur in this opinion. Let us see the present status of the question. Maryland, Missouri, and Louisiana have abolished slavery. The negroes of Tennessee capable of labor have been enrolled into your service; so to a great extent in Kentucky. The proclamation of the President does in fact (I do not argue the question, you assert its validity) abolish slavery wherever our armies occupy the soil, and what more could a constitutional amendment effect? This covers the whole ground, except in Kentucky. In that State bills are now pending in both branches of her Legislature to abolish it. I must say, sir, that I should greatly prefer seeing Kentucky, with her thousands of gallant soldiers in your Army, by her own act dispose of this question, than to see it forced upon her by the power of the Government. It would argue better for the future and the public safety. In view of the passing events, I trust, sir, she will consider it her interest to abolish slavery, but the question should be left to the judgment of her own people.

In any event, under the present policy of the Government, if the armed rebellion is overthrown African slavery is dead. I do not discuss the subject, but assert what must be apparent to all. If the South arms her slaves in the cause of the rebellion African slavery is dead, no matter what are the fortunes of the war. In my judgment the fate of slavery is sealed. It dies by the rebellious hand of its votaries, untouched by the law. Its fate is determined by the war, by the measures of the war, by the results of the war; these, sir, must determine it, even if the Constitution were amended. Therefore I oppose the amendment, because, admitting the full force of your arguments, it is unnecessary, a dangerous precedent without a benefit.

In the recent election the people decided that the war should be prosecuted for the maintaining of the Union; that question overshadowed all others; the decision would have been the same no matter which of the great parties had triumphed, for the Union was to be maintained at every hazard. But this question was scarcely heard of in the canvass. It would have divided public opinion, for the Democratic party are for the Constitution as it is; the people are devoted to the old charter; but on the abstract question of slavery there is no division of opinion in the free States. Upon that question, sir, there can be no parties in the North.

Other issues loom up in the future. By the side of this bill is another measure which indicates your real policy; it is the entering wedge to the idea that the freedom of no class of men can be secure unless they be citizens of the Republic and invested with the right of suffrage. I refer to the next bill upon your Calendar. I but state the fact, sir, to indicate the ultimate purpose, the inauguration of the new era which is to open up the golden age. Where are we drifting, sir? Will this reorganize civil government in the South? Unless, when their armies are overthrown, we can reorganize civil government there on the general consent of the masses, standing armies are inevitable, a continued increase of the tremendous public debt, and, more dangerous if possible than all, the boundless and corrupting patronage of the Executive, for unless, as a result of the war, we restore the Union the sacrifice of our gallant sons will be in vain. If by these visionary schemes you prolong the war, and realize all the vagaries that reformers have dreamed of, will the laborer, bending hopelessly under the burden of public exactions, feel that you have advanced the real cause of freedom?

I am no apologist of slavery. I know no argument for its defense. I would to God there was not a slave on the face of the green earth. I have over indulged the hope that time and Providence would relieve this nation from the reproach and still preserve the public liberty unimpaired; but such are the embarrassments of the question in providing for the very people you would in theory incorporate into the body of your citizens, that in dealing with it as a practical question, even a son of Massachusetts, with absolute military and civil power, in Louisiana, only changes the form of slavery and converts the slave into a serf. But these are but the incidents of the pending measure. It is upon the amendment of the Constitution that we decide.

My colleague says, "The old foggy has become an antique relic." He need not have reminded us, sir, that the precepts and example of our fathers were forgotten. The condition of a once prosperous country too painfully reminds us of the fact. The presence of eager reformers pressing forward to mutilate the Constitution, to tear down the venerated landmarks, reminds us too well that Washington and Adams and Jefferson and Jackson and Clay and Webster are dead. The grand old republicans who so long guided the councils of the people are no more, and new statesmen, remodeling the elements of government, treading with arrogance where the old masters would have trembled, threaten to rob their country and the world of the fruits of their wisdom and labors. Seeking to be guided, sir, by their precepts, and knowing of no light so sure as the light of experience, I am for the Constitution, the grand old Charter, as it is, and if I err, sir, it is in following the most illustrious examples.

Mr. CRAVENS. Mr. Speaker, before the debate closes on this proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, I desire to say a word or two merely to place myself right in regard to the vote I shall give. The speeches made by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have tended to leave the impression that those who vote against this measure are influenced to do so by a desire to protect and perpetuate the institution of slavery. I am only authorized to speak for myself, and in doing so I declare that no desire to perpetuate slavery will influence my vote. I shall vote against the amendment because I think this is not the proper time to make radical changes in our fundamental law. I shall vote against it because I believe there could not be that fair, free, and unbiased deliberation had by the whole people on the question that its importance demands, and because, in my judgment, it will not remove from the halls of legislation a question that has been a disturbing element for more than half a century—I mean the question of the condition of the negro, irrespective of his condition as a slave. I believe that the passage of this amendment will multiply rather than diminish our troubles upon that subject. The men who commenced and have continued the agitation of slavery up to the time of its culmination in the present civil war will not be content to let the subject rest with the mere abolishment of slavery by constitutional amendment; it will still be the apple of discord while there is any considerable number of that poor and unfortunate African race on our soil. I have nothing to satisfy my mind that it is any part of the policy of the abolitionist to deport these people when they are liberated; they must therefore be diffused through the free States or allowed to remain where they are. I believe, as a general proposition, that the people of the free States are opposed to the diffusion of emancipated negroes among them. They must then remain where they are; and that being the case, who does not at once see the many perplexing and dangerous questions which are to grow out of the adoption of the amendment at this time?

If we assume the responsibility of liberating three or four million slaves by the operation of this amendment, will we not impose upon ourselves the moral obligation to provide for and support all that large number of helpless women and children, decrepit and old, who would become mendicants or wandering outcasts without such protection from us? To my mind this duty is plain; and I do not desire to incur such fearful responsibilities in the face of the obligations resting on us to provide for and look after the comfort and welfare of those of our own race who, in large numbers, have been rendered helpless by the operations of this terrible war. There are many reasons which satisfy my mind of the impolicy of passing this measure at this time. I have not had occasion to question the constitutional power of Congress to submit an amendment, provided it is done in the mode and manner prescribed by that instrument. Taking it for granted that we have the power, I am induced to vote against it on the grounds of policy and expediency.

I do not think that this question entered sufficiently into the considerations which determined the late election in favor of the present Administration to amount to an instruction to the present Congress to pass the amendment. And if I so thought I should find my justification in voting against the amendment in the overwhelming vote of my district for my successor, who entertains sentiments upon this and other kindred questions in accordance with my own. I am satisfied that under the laws of war and the incidents attending it, the problem of slavery is being rapidly worked out. I think slavery is dying, and will eventually die if we will but address ourselves to the one great subject—the restoration of the Union—by putting down the rebellion. Already too much attention has been given to this subject of slavery. I think the rebellion would have been ended long ago if we had never said a word on the subject.

I had not intended to and would not have said a word on this subject had it not been for the persistent efforts on the other side of the House to place us in a false position before the country.

I have not attempted to elaborate or even enumerate all the reasons that control my vote against the amendment.

I am in favor of progress and reform, but when it is proposed to change the fundamental law of the land I would prefer that it should be done in the calm hours of peace rather than amid the storms of rebellion and war.

I look upon this measure as another stumbling-block thrown by the party in power in the way of Union. To the already excited and hostile mind of the southern people this proposed amendment will appear as a measure of vengeance, dictated by power arrogant with success, and not as an olive-branch of peace.

It is hopeless to make a constitutional Government permanent in the establishment of which the great mass of the people have been deprived of a free choice. Such choice we well know cannot be had in the present condition of the southern States which are the theater of war and most to be affected by the proposed change of the Constitution. In forcing this radical change on an unwilling people will you not sow the seeds of discontent and future revolution? Let well enough alone. Slavery cannot be saved. Prolong not by needless legislation here or elsewhere the evils and dangers which have attended the progress of its dissolution under the blows it has received in the house of its friends. Would it not be wiser, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, to leave this question where the Constitution leaves it, to be dealt with by the States? Time and events are rapidly doing their work in the minds of the southern people. Will not the immediate forced abolition of slavery be dearly bought if it shall involve a distraction or even a weakening of our Federal system of government? Entertaining the views I have expressed on this subject I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, after the length to which this argument has gone, and the able manner in which the subject has been presented on both sides of the House, it would seem to require some apology from me for offering any remarks of mine; and the only and best apology I have to offer is to say that my remarks shall not be extended. I esteem it a great honor to be a member of the present Congress, if for no other reason, at least for the opportunity which it affords me of casting my vote for this resolution. No matter what errors I may have committed on other questions since I have been a member of this body, no matter to what extent I may approve or disapprove of my votes on them, I do know that I shall approve of the vote which I shall cast upon this question to the last day of my life.

I do not propose to enter at length into the arguments for and against the institution of slavery. I look upon the question, whether or not the institution ought to be abolished in a proper way, as having been settled by the people at the last election, and the verdict rendered upon that occasion I hold must and will be carried out, if not by this, at least by the next Congress.

But I propose to examine some of the arguments against this measure which have been offered by gentlemen upon the other side of the House. It is assumed upon the other side of the House, by gentlemen who it appears to me ought to understand the laws of the land, that we have no power to abolish the institution of slavery. This is a very singular position for any legal mind to take. Why, sir, the institution of slavery is not among the reserved exceptions in the Constitution of the United States. Wherever power was not intended to be given to the people to alter their fundamental law, it was so expressed in the body of the Constitution, and the institution of slavery does not appear in that instrument as one of the subjects to be interdicted from the action of the people upon their organic law.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] says, however, that the power does not exist in Congress to pass this measure, because the people in framing the Constitution did not commit the subject of slavery to Congress; that the power to alter the Constitution extends only to those subjects which were committed to the Government of the United States in the formation of the Constitution. I do not so read that instrument. And if I did I would deny the fact upon which he bases his argument.

Sir, the question of human liberty is committed by the Constitution to the people of the United States. I have always supposed that the framing of the Constitution and the formation of our Government were for the express purpose of perpetuating and preserving the liberties of the people. And upon the very threshold of that instrument I find authority for that position. We are told, in the preamble of the Constitution, that—

Showing that this very subject was before the framers of the Constitution, and in direct and positive language committed to the Government of the United States, to be exercised whenever the people, in a constitutional way, should call upon that Government to exercise it.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] takes another position—a very strange position for any man to occupy at this late day of Christian civilization—and that is, that the condition of slavery is the proper and normal condition of the negro. I thought that that doctrine belonged to the past days of the Republic. I thought that when the dominant party that ruled this country for so many years went down, that doctrine went down with it. And it may be said, to the credit of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, that few, very few, probably none but the gentleman from New York, has advocated so strange a doctrine.

What! the normal condition of a human being, his natural and normal condition, is to be that of a slave! What is the argument in favor of that position? What reason can be alleged for it? I suppose the gentleman will fall back upon the only one that can be presented; that is, that the condition of the negro now is that of a slave. Well, if he should fall back upon that reason, I will reply to him that the same argument might have been made against our forefathers when they raised the standard of revolution against the Government of England; they might have been told they were then subject to the Government of England, and therefore should remain so. According to this doctrine whatever is is to be continued, right or wrong.

The gentleman's own ancestors were slaves as abject as any in the South. It has been but a few centuries since the gentleman's own ancestors were bought and sold with the land upon which they lived. More than that, it has been but a few centuries since our mothers were themselves forced, by despotic law and custom, to submit themselves to liberties upon the part of their masters, and probably the little Norman blood that exists in his veins, if any does exist in the veins of that gentleman, is derived from that circumstance.

Suppose some wise statesman of that day had told our ancestors, when they were being bought and sold, that it was their normal and proper condition, because it was then their condition, what would the gentleman's ancestors have said in reply to that argument? Ah! when the question comes to be turned the other side up; when the question comes to be put to a man, whether he himself will submit to be a slave, then it is time for him to say that slavery is the normal and natural condition of a human being.

I remember that, at the last session of Congress, a question was propounded to one of my colleagues [Mr. THAYER] something like this: whether he maintained that there existed power in the people of the United States, under the provision of the Constitution allowing them to alter their organic law, to so alter it as to establish slavery in any State where it does not now exist. The answer to that question is easy. Power can do anything that is possible to it, and when the people of the United States resolve by physical force to enslave any portion of a free people, I know of no means but resistance with the sword to prevent it. But I do say that there are some things that are not within the limits of human legislation. It is not within the limits of human laws to legislate away the soul of man; we cannot deprive him, by any process of legislation, constitutional or otherwise, of his free agency; we cannot legislate away his liberty. No man can sell himself. Hence no man can empower his Government to sell him.

Now I call the attention of the legal gentlemen on the other side of the House to a question which I propose to put to them, and which I want answered with all calmness and honesty; and in order that it may not be misunderstood I have reduced it to writing, and will read it. I desire the gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who will probably follow me in this discussion, to have his attention particularly directed to it, and I should be obliged to him for a clear and decisive answer.

By the fifth article of the Constitution of the United States power is given to three fourths of the States to change the terms of the compact at will, (except in the single item of representation in the Senate,) against the consent of the remaining States. Now, I desire to ask those who urge the principle of State sovereignty against the pending resolution whether the States, by subscribing to that article, did not, ipso facto, surrender their sovereignty; whether a State, entering into even a mere treaty with other States, by the terms of which the treaty may be altered at will by the others against its consent, can, after that, and under the treaty, still claim to be sovereign. It looks to me as if those who deny the power to pass this pending resolution, upon the ground of State sovereignty, will find it very difficult to answer that question in such a way as to justify the position they are taking.

But it is said, again, that we ought not so to alter the Constitution as to abolish slavery in the absence of the seceded States. It seems to me that that argument comes with a very bad grace from those who are even the apologists of the doctrine of secession. It is not our fault that those States are not represented here. We did not drive them away. But for their own mad act their own Representatives might be here engaging in this discussion and aiding the gentleman from Kentucky in preserving his darling institution and keeping his specimens of humanity.

But, again, it is a grave question—a question which, I believe, divides the opinion of lawyers in this country—whether or not the resolution passed by us will require the assent of three fourths of the whole number of States, including those that have seceded, or of only three fourths of the States represented in the Government at the present time. I do not pretend to offer an opinion, at this time at least, upon that question, though I entertain one. But if it requires three fourths of the whole number of States to assent to the measure, how are the States that are not represented here injured? If they were represented here, or if they were in a position to vote upon the question and were all united, it would make no difference if three fourths of the whole number were against them. If, on the other hand, but three fourths of those represented in the Government are necessary, then I fall back upon my former answer, and say that it is no fault of ours that they are not in a position to vote upon this question when it shall be submitted to them. And I say further, that inasmuch as these things require time, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States itself was not adopted by the last State that ratified it until three years after it had been submitted to the States, there is yet time for those States to repent, to return to their allegiance, and cast their votes upon this question.

One of the gentlemen on the other side of the House objected to the passage of this resolution because he thought we were interfering with the province of the Almighty. He says that if it is the design of the Almighty to abolish the institution He will do it in His own good time. I most heartily assent to the last branch of the proposition; but I say, in reply, that the Almighty's own time has come, and He is abolishing the institution now by our means and by its own act. We are asked, "Why not let the process which is now going on, and which is liberating slaves day after day, go on until the institution shall have been abolished by war?" Mr. Speaker, I would be perfectly content to let the institution share the fate of the rebellion; I would be perfectly content to let the war power exterminate it. But I sincerely hope the war will not continue long enough for that, and then it will become a grave question, a question upon which the people and the legal minds of this country will be greatly divided, whether or not the proclamation which has been issued during the time of war, and under the war power, will not fall to the ground upon the return of those States to their allegiance. At present, without having examined the question, I incline to think it will, and with the fear that such may be the decision of the highest tribunal of the land, I will vote for this measure in order that so great a calamity as the extinction of the rebellion without slavery may not befall the American people. Why, look to it. In our very armies there are men, owned by the laws of the States from which they come, fighting for your liberty, Mr. Speaker, and mine, occupying the position which, but for them, might be occupied by your sons and mine, and saving our blood by the spilling of their own. I ask whether we are going to suffer the remotest risk of those men being returned to slavery after upholding the banner of the United States against rebellion; whether we are going to suffer the smallest risk of their being so returned after their gallant conduct. I, for one, am not willing; and upon that ground, if upon none other, I would vote for the pending resolution.

It is said that we are imposing new conditions upon the people of the seceded States, and that we will, when we have changed the Constitution, be doing the unreasonable thing of compelling them by force to come under these new conditions. Why, sir, we are imposing no new condition. The condition we are imposing is a branch of that very compact into which they entered when they came into the Union with the other States. When they subscribed to that Constitution they subscribed to every part of it. They subscribed to the power given to the people of the United States, against their will, to change the organic law of the land. And that fifth article of the Constitution is as much a part of the Constitution as any other part of it. It is under that part we are now acting. We are imposing no new conditions. We are simply exercising a power given to us by them at the time of the formation of the Government, and expressly embraced in the old conditions.

But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLOY] takes high ground upon this question. He opposes the resolution upon the ground of humanity. He says that it would be a cruel act to turn upon the world all of these negroes. It is strange that an appeal should be made to humanity in favor of an institution which allows the husband to be separated from the wife, that allows the children to be taken from the mother; ah! that allows the very children of the deceased slaveholder himself to be sold to satisfy his merciless creditors.

We are told that cruelties do not often occur under the institution of slavery. I grant that. I believe that as a body the slaveholders are a humane class of men. When I know the regard I have for my horse I can entirely assent to the proposition that the slaveholder shall be kind to his own negro, shall feed him well, clothe him and be proud of him. But that does not take away my dislike of the whole institution. The very danger of the evils which I have described, arising from the institution, is enough to cause me to do away with it. I would not rest in my bed if I believed the next morning, in the event of my death, my children might be sold to pay some creditor, though they might be darker than I and offspring of my crime.

Events like this gentlemen on the other side will not deny have occurred, are occurring, and will constantly occur so long as the institution of slavery exists in the land.

But, Mr. Speaker, I presume that the other gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had a little different view of the humanitarian side of this question. The question of humanity with him was probably the four hundred specimens of humanity whom he claims to own, and who, by the laws of nature and of God, have the same right to own him that he has to own them. If his regard for his property, his fondness for humanity in that sense, stimulates his zeal and fires his eloquence, I admit he has reason.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that, although never a political Democrat, I was never afraid of trusting the people with any question, and I cannot appreciate the modern Democracy that fears to let this question go to the people lest they should decide it in their own way. Let us take the initiatory step; let us pass this resolution, and I believe it will be passed, and by this Congress. Let us pass this resolution, and submit it to the States. Let us at least hope that the next President of the United States will be inaugurated over a Republic wholly free and wholly devoted to the civil and religious liberty of all the people within its borders.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House long to-day. When this subject was under discussion at the last session of Congress I endeavored to maintain by argument that three fourths of the States did not possess constitutional power to pass this amendment. I endeavored then to point out wherein this particular amendment was of a nature not embraced within the power granted. I shall not touch that specific point to-day. I had arrived at that conclusion after mature deliberation. I have listened with great attention to the opinions of gentlemen on the other side of the House who disagree with me. I have heard my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY,] the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. CRESWELL,] and I have listened to the sweeping declaration of my colleague [Mr. COX] who sits behind me. I have endeavored to weigh impartially the arguments which they have adduced in support of their opinions. I am constrained to say that I have heard nothing which has in the least degree weakened my faith in the conclusion at which I had arrived. It is because I cannot go beyond this question of power, because I am not at liberty to consider any other question, that I shall confine myself exclusively to its consideration.

I will not do my colleague from the Toledo district [Mr. ASHLEY] the injustice to suppose that in his argument on Friday he intended to make a complete reply to the proposition which I endeavored to sustain at the last session.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, the right of revolution. I know what are its limitations and its sanctions. Its origin is not in written constitutions; its sanctions are not in penal enactments. Its home is in the human heart; its origin is in the aspirations of man for progress; its sanction is the ultima ratio from whose dread judgment there is no appeal. The minority of the people may, if they can, subvert this Confederation, and establish in its stead a consolidated unity. Much more may a majority. Three fourths of the States may abolish this republican form of government, and, to use the illustration of my colleague, [Mr. COX,] may elect the King of Dahomey to be their autocrat; and then, responsible in the present only to the nations and to God, and responsible in the future only to the ages and to civilization, they may draw their sword, and if they have the power impose that form of government upon the dissenting States.

But I beg my colleagues [Mr. COX and Mr. ASHLEY] to remember, and I beg gentlemen who differ from me to remember, that the right of resistance is as perfect; that the duty of resistance is more absolute; and that the cause of those who resist is sacred in the eyes of God and man, and will, if they are successful, command the admiration of the world, and crown them with the fame which belongs to patriots and heroes.

But, sir, we are not discussing that right of revolution, nor yet the right of all the States to amend this Constitution. We are discussing the powers of change which are granted by this written Constitution. We are discussing the powers of change which by that instrument are given to the majority, and the obligation of obedience and of acquiescence which is imposed upon the minority. I suppose it will be admitted as a maxim, subject to no controversy, that wherever there is a constitutional power in the majority to change the Constitution there is a correlative duty upon the part of the minority, peacefully, and immediately to acquiesce. Wherever there is the right of resistance in the minority, there is no right of amendment in the majority.

I have endeavored to maintain that the right of amendment granted by this Constitution is limited in two ways. First by the letter of the Constitution itself, and next by the spirit and intent and scope of that instrument, and by the idea which underlies it all as a foundation.

My colleague who sits behind me, [Mr. COX,] and my colleague from the Toledo district, [Mr. ASHLEY,] admit that the power of amendment is limited by the letter of the Constitution itself, but they assert that it is limited by that rule and no other. This is the answer made to my argument on this special amendment. It avoids the objections I took to it, and asserts in reply the unlimited power. I shall not repeat those objections. I beg gentlemen to remember that this is not a question of revolution or of physical force; it is not a question of abstract right or of natural justice, but of power delegated by the written text of the Constitution itself. From the times of the ancient prophets he was an honorable and upright man who stood by his word though it led to his own injury.

Now I desire to ask gentlemen whether it is true that the power of change in that Constitution is limited only by its written language? There are but three points in which that Constitution, by its letter, could not be changed. The first was the right of importation of slaves before 1808; the second was the rule of taxation, and the third was the equality of representation in the Senate. The prohibition of change in one article was necessarily limited by the article itself to the year 1808. My colleague from the Toledo district, in the speech which he made the other day, told us with reference to this point:

"If I read the Constitution aright and understand the force of language, the section which I have just quoted is to-day free from all limitations and conditions save two, one of which provides that the suffrage of the several States in the Senate shall be equal, and that no State shall lose this equality by any amendment of the Constitution without its consent; the other relates to taxation. These are the only conditions and limitations."

I deny it. I assert that there is another limitation stronger even than the letter of the Constitution; and that is to be found in its intent and its spirit and its foundation idea. I put the question which has been put before in this debate, can three fourths of the States constitutionally change this Government, and make it an autocracy? It is not prohibited by the letter of the Constitution.

Mr. ASHLEY. Did my colleague understand that by my speech I claimed that—

Mr. PENDLETON. I understand exactly what the gentleman claimed, and I am endeavoring to run to its extreme the premises upon which the gentleman stands to-day, in order to convince him of the weak point of his argument.

Mr. ASHLEY. I said in my speech that any amendment republican in its character—

Mr. PENDLETON. I will come directly to the limitation which the gentleman put upon the power. I need not ask my colleague from the Toledo district what answer he will make to that question, because I have it already. He would say "No; that change is not within the scope of the power of amendment given to three fourths of the States." Why? It is not forbidden. It does not come within the two classes of limitations and conditions asserted by my colleague. Why is it that this change cannot be made? I will tell you why. It is because republicanism lies at the very foundation of our system of government, and to overthrow that idea is not to amend but to subvert the Constitution of the United States; and I say that if three fourths of the States should undertake to pass an amendment of that kind, and Rhode Island alone dissented, she would have the right to resist by force. It would be her duty to resist by force; and her cause would be sacred in the eyes of just men, and sanctified in the eyes of a just God. Let me go a little further. Can three fourths of the States make an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which shall prohibit the State of Ohio from having two houses in its Legislative Assembly. My colleague would not agree to that. Why not? It is not prohibited in the Constitution. The letter of the Constitution is not against it. It is an amendment which may be republican in form; it contravenes no tenet of republicanism that a Legislature shall be of one house only. Why could it not be done? Because the equality of the States lies at the very foundation of our system, and also because the control of the States over their internal affairs is equally at its foundation. And I know my colleague too well to suppose that he would not join with me in saying that such a usurpation of power on the part of three fourths of the States would justify our own State in drawing the sword.

Sir, can three fourths of the States provide an amendment to the Constitution by which one fourth should bear all the taxes of this Government? It is not prohibited. To be sure there is a rule in the Constitution that taxation shall be uniform, but that provision, according to the theory of my friend from Ohio, is revokable and changeable as the rest. The gentleman knows that that amendment would not be within the scope of the power granted to three fourths of the States, and that it would justify resistance.

Can three fourths of the States, by an amendment to this Constitution, subvert the State governments of one fourth and divide their territory among the rest? It is not forbidden; I read no prohibition in the language of the Constitution, and yet my colleague would not contend that could be done. He would justify resistance.

Can three fourths of the States so amend the Constitution of the States as to make the northern States of this Union slaveholding States? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. THAYER] at the last session said that in his judgment it might be done. I know that the majority of this House would repudiate that doctrine. I would repudiate it myself. Believing, as I do, that the Federal Government can no more make a slave than it can make a king, I, for one, would be ready to resist it to the last extremity.

Mr. THAYER. I think the gentleman from Ohio does not precisely quote the answer that I gave to the question that he has just referred to. If I recollect rightly the answer which I gave to the question upon the occasion referred to, it was that so far as slavery could be rendered lawful, a constitutional provision making it lawful in all parts of the United States would have a binding and legal effect upon the people of the United States.

Mr. PENDLETON. I understood that to be the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and if I expressed myself clearly I meant so to represent him, and I meant in behalf of myself to repudiate that proposition, for I do not believe that it lies within the power of three fourths of the States to give to the Federal Government the power to make the citizens of a State slaves within its jurisdiction.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman still, I think, fails to apprehend the character of the answer which I gave to his question. I have never conceded that an amendment or a law of the barbarous character suggested by the question would have a moral force or a moral obligation upon the people of the United States. But what I said, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio was, that it would have the force of law, the force of an amendment of the Constitution; that the law, if it was opposed to the inalienable rights of the people of the United States, would be, if I may use a contradictory expression, an unlawful law, a law which you could not enforce, a law contravening the inalienable rights of the citizens of this country.

I hope, sir, that I have made myself understood. I do not wish to be placed in the position which the last remark of the gentleman from Ohio assigned to me, of saying that either a law of Congress or any amendment of the Constitution which could be adopted by the people of the United States could introduce slavery into a State, but I say that so far as it would have the effect of law it would legalize it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I would not do injustice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as I believe he well knows. I go a step further than he does. I say that it would not be binding in morals; I say that it would not be binding in law. It would be illegal. It would be void. It would have no more sanction than that which the power of those who chose to impose it would be able to give to it. It would be binding on those who would come within the power of the sword of those who made it, and on no other.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, if that be the position which the gentleman designs to occupy, I should like to have that gentleman inform the House where any portion of the people of this country derived the power to make any other portion of the people slaves in the first instance.

Mr. PENDLETON. They did not derive it from the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WILSON. I ask where they did derive it.

Mr. PENDLETON. They did not derive it from the Constitution of the United States. They did not give to the Constitution, or rather to the Government of the United States which the Constitution formed, the right to interfere with it where it existed. I will not be drawn now into a discussion with the gentleman as to the origin of slavery, nor to the law, which lies behind the Constitution of the United States and behind the governments of the States, by which these people are held in slavery. When that subject is pertinent I will not hesitate to enter into the debate. Perhaps he and I might not differ about that. But I am discussing the question which is put forth so ostentatiously by the other side of the House, that under the Constitution—not by the right of revolution—under its clauses and provisions, there exists the power to make this amendment.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly, sir.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I rose a moment ago, as the gentleman knows the esteem in which I hold his ability on these questions, to state this to him, and to make an inquiry. It seems to me that he has taken the extreme ground of the extreme abolitionists, so frequently denounced by his political associates on this floor and at the other end of the Capitol, of a higher law than the Constitution itself. I state that as a preliminary to the inquiry which I propose to make. He is referring every proposed amendment to the individual opinion of a man as to whether it accords with the spirit which underlies the Constitution and irrespective of its letter. If that be so, it is a direct appeal to and an adoption of what has been obnoxiously styled the higher law as maintained by extreme abolitionists time and again. Now, I wish to ask on this identical logical point to be derived from his premises, did not those who framed the Constitution affect the subject which he declares now to be incapable of amendment, when they prohibited every State from increasing its interest in slavery by any importation of the people from abroad who could increase it, and in what respect this amendment differs in kind from that incorporated in the Constitution itself, which declares to the States that they shall not swell by one, after the year 1808, the slaves they then had within their borders? I ask him on principle, not on detail, on kind, not in degree, what the difference is.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, it is well for gentlemen to understand exactly the position which their antagonists occupy before they go into a discussion of the kind suggested by my friend from Iowa; and I would like him to answer the question whether or not he believes, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. THAYER,] that the adoption of an amendment of the Constitution, such as I alluded to, would legally carry the institution of slavery into the northern States.

Mr. KASSON. I will answer that question directly the gentleman frankly and clearly answers mine.

Mr. PENDLETON. The gentleman says he will answer my question as soon as I answer his. I say they did not touch this question of slavery in the States, or the power of each State over its citizens. I say to him that I was very unfortunate if I did not make myself clearly understood in the proposition that I was arguing. I was considering the powers guaranteed by the instrument itself. I was considering only those powers, and I expressly distinguished between the right of revolution and the right under which gentlemen claim that they have the power to make this amendment.

For all purposes of this argument I have only sought to place myself on the Constitution of the United States, and not to invoke the authority of any law higher than it. I have taken extreme cases. I told my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] that I intended to take extreme cases, because it is only by extreme cases that the soundness of principles can be measured.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] in order to fully understand the theory upon which he is conducting this argument, whether he believes that the States, acting in what he calls their sovereign capacity, have the power or the right to make a portion of the people of a State slaves?

Mr. PENDLETON. That is a question which I will discuss with the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] whenever it is pertinent to the subject in hand.

Mr. WILSON. I was going to suggest to the gentleman that I understood his theory to include that. If I misunderstood him, then I ask his pardon.

Mr. PENDLETON. The question which we are discussing to-day is not the power of the State government to decide the status of the people within its boundaries. But the question is as to the power reserved in this compact of confederation to its constituents, which are the States.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] yielding the floor to any further interruption.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope my friend will not object to any questions until I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk then read the following rule of the House:

"While a member is occupying the floor he may yield it to another for explanation of the pending measure as well as for personal explanation."

The SPEAKER. The rule is a very broad one. The Chair does not see how the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] can be limited in his right to yield the floor to any member who may desire to ask him a question.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to say that he dissented from the doctrine that the power to amend the Constitution was an unlimited power. I wish to say that I also dissent from that doctrine. I do not agree that under the article of the Constitution authorizing amendments we have the right to amend the Constitution so as to establish slavery, or to invite the King of Dahomey to rule over this country. I think the limitation, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] will bear with me a moment longer, is found in the preamble, as follows:

One provision of the Constitution is that in a certain way it may be amended. Whenever it is amended it must be amended, in order that it may have both moral and legal force, in conformity with the objects for which the Constitution was framed, as set forth in the preamble. And an amendment which tends to "a more perfect union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquility, to provide for the common defense, to promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," is an amendment which, when made according to the form prescribed in the Constitution, is both morally and legally binding upon the people of the country. But if it be made in violation of those great objects, although it may be legally operative, it has no moral force. The argument would be, in my mind, that the amendment we now advocate is in conformity with those objects, while an amendment to establish slavery would be contrary to them.

Mr. PENDLETON. I see that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWWELL] appreciates very well the argument I am now making, and he has separated himself from my colleague from the Toledo district, [Mr. ASHLEY,] and my colleague who sits behind me, [Mr. COX,] and other gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, in drawing the distinction as to the character of the amendments to be made. He repudiates the doctrine which those gentlemen have asserted, that the prohibition upon amendments is limited only to the letter of the Constitution itself.

Mr. ASHLEY. My colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] will do me the justice to say that I was careful to make the limitation that no amendment could be made anti-republican in its character.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will do my colleague no injustice. I was repudiating the doctrine of the right or constitutional power of three fourths of the States so to amend the Constitution as that they may carry the institution of slavery into these northern States. I was seeking to impress upon gentlemen the argument that there were other prohibitions than those which were contained in the letter of the Constitution. I declared my belief, and I repeat it, that it is not within the power of three fourths of the States to impose upon the dissenting States such an amendment. Authority over the status of its own citizens belongs to each State. It cannot be deprived of it.

Mr. GOOCH. I will ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] whether in his opinion the men who made the Constitution could, at the time they made it, have prohibited the institution of slavery within the United States.

Mr. PENDLETON. In my judgment the Constitution of the United States would never have been ratified by nine of the States with such a provision in it.

Mr. GOOCH. That is not my question. I ask the gentleman whether in his opinion they could have prohibited slavery without violating any of the essential and fundamental principles of the Government.

Mr. PENDLETON. They could have prohibited it, and it would have been binding upon those States which ratified it, because it was in the power of each State to give up to the Federal Government the decision of the status of its people; but the other States cannot claim to make that decision except by express grant from each State.

Mr. GOOCH. I would ask the gentleman a still further question: whether by the adoption of the Constitution and the amendments to it the States have not conferred that power upon the constitutional majority, or upon that power which they have authorized to amend the Constitution.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think they have not; or else I would not have been denying the power for the last half hour. I have been endeavoring to show that the limitations in the letter of the Constitution were not the only limitations upon the power of amendment. And I have done it for the purpose of leading gentlemen of this House to a conclusion I am prepared to take. I have shown that you cannot, under the power of amendment, contravene the letter and spirit of the Constitution; that you cannot subvert republicanism; that you cannot destroy the liberties of the States; that you cannot decide the status of the citizens of the States. I would lead them to the conclusion that there is no power on the part of the Federal Government—on the part of three quarters of the States I intended to say—to adopt the amendment that is now proposed; and that if you do it, if you attempt to impose that amendment upon the dissenting States by force, it will be their right to resist you by force, and to call to their aid all the powers which God and nature have given them to make that force effective.

Now, sir, I do not intend to do my colleague from the Toledo district [Mr. ASHLEY] the least injustice in stating his argument. He felt the force of the suggestions which I have endeavored to present. They occurred to a mind accustomed to anticipate the objections which may be made to the position which he assumes. Having laid down, in the broadest possible terms, that the conditions and limitations imposed upon the power of amendment are only those which are expressly declared in the Constitution, he follows it up by a declaration that, "in my judgment, Congress may propose and three fourths of the States may adopt any amendment republican in its character and consistent with the continued existence of the nation, save in the two particulars just named."

Why does he impose those two further limitations? There is no guarantee in the Constitution that the Federal Government shall be republican in form. There is no prohibition of a change of the Federal Government to a different and anti-republican form. The gentleman's own admission overthrows the foundation upon which his argument rests. And I would like to know from the gentleman where there is a prohibition upon the right of three fourths of the States to dissolve the Confederation. He says that any amendment must be "consistent with the continued existence of the nation." I deny it; I say that three fourths of the States can dissolve the Confederation. They can annul the Constitution. They can dissolve the Union; but they cannot take away from the constituent States those powers which were reserved, not only by the letter, but by the spirit and the intent and design of the instrument itself.

But this speech of my colleague contains another remarkable statement, to which I desire to call his attention. Following the line of argument which seems to have been adopted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOOCH,] in the question which he put to me just now, my colleague says:

"Mr. Speaker, I presume no man, not even my colleague, will deny that when the thirteen colonies or States assembled by their representatives in Convention to make the present national Constitution, they might have abolished slavery at once. Or, if the theory of the old parties is true, that a republican Government may authorize or permit the enslavement of men, which I deny, they could have provided for the emancipation of all slaves in twenty or fifty years, if they had seen fit; and if the people of nine States had voted to ratify such a constitution slavery could not, after the period named, have existed by State law and in defiance of the national Constitution, either in one of the old thirteen States or in any one of the States admitted into the Union since its adoption."

Does the gentleman mean to say that the ratification of nine States would have prohibited the institution of slavery in the thirteen States? Does the gentleman mean to say that the ratification of nine States would have made the Constitution binding upon the thirteen? If that is the gentleman's view, then I ask by what authority such a ratification would have had such an effect? I read in the Constitution itself that "the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." Does the gentleman still contend that the provisions of the Constitution ratified by nine States would have been binding upon the thirteen?

Mr. ASHLEY. Intended, Mr. Speaker, to say this: That the ratification of the Constitution by nine States of the old Confederation practically made them a nation. It is true the clause of the Constitution quoted by my colleague declares that none but the States adopting it would be bound by it. Yet, practically, if adopted by nine of the thirteen it made the whole, with all the territory belonging to them, a nation. Undoubtedly the framers of the Constitution believed that if it was adopted by nine States the practical effect would be to force the other four to adopt it. I have no doubt such was the understanding of the members of the convention, and certainly such was the practical effect of it.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is a most extraordinary proposition. It might be true that, in the course of time, and by the power of conquest, or by the moral influences which a Government composed of nine States would have exerted, the other States would have been persuaded to come into the Union, but I deny that any one State would have been bound by any ratification except that proceeding from the State itself. The theory which the gentleman has explained to us just now, and which, as contained in his speech as printed in the Globe, I honestly thought, in my simplicity, to be a misprint—this theory explains what the gentleman means when he tells us that the Federal Constitution does not clothe any of the States with the attributes of sovereignty. Of course it does not. Nobody ever pretended that it did.

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose that nine States had at that time ratified the Constitution, while the other four did not; would those other four have been members of the Union?

Mr. PENDLETON. No, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. So I say. But suppose that three fourths of the States now ratify an amendment while the remaining fourth do not, are the States refusing to ratify still members of the Union?

Mr. PENDLETON. That will depend upon the character of the amendment, and whether it is in pursuance of the authority granted.

Mr. STEVENS. If the amendment should be adopted by three fourths of the States, while the other fourth refuse to ratify it, do the non-agreeing States go out of the Union or remain in it?

Mr. PENDLETON. If the amendment be without the scope of the power granted, legally they remain in the Union, and the other States go out. [Laughter.]

Nobody pretends that the States are clothed with the powers of sovereignty by the Federal Constitution. Nor does that instrument necessarily strip them of the sovereign rights which they had before the Constitution was made. The States have sovereign powers to-day except so far as that Constitution, by their voluntary act of adoption, has taken those powers from them. They do not derive power from the Federal Government. It inheres in them, and I would like to inquire of my colleague from the Toledo district, [Mr. ASHLEY,] if he denies the sovereignty in the States because they have agreed to suspend, or, if you please, to delegate certain powers of sovereignty which would otherwise belong to them, upon what basis can he pretend there is sovereignty in the Federal Government, which has not now and never had any authority except that which is expressly delegated to it by these States themselves.

But, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is led by his anxiety to pass this amendment into the declaration of another doctrine, which although not entirely novel, is somewhat new upon this floor. He holds to the doctrine that ordinances of secession destroy State governments, but do not affect the relations of the States, that is, of the territory and the people to the Federal Government. He holds that an act of secession is an abdication by the people of their rights but not a release from their duties; that it destroys, not the tie which binds them to the Union, but their form of Government, leaving them subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and its absolute sovereignty with all the rights of local government, and he deduces from this the conclusion that the seceding States have no voice on this amendment, but are absolutely bound by it. That doctrine was promulgated by a Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] nearly three years ago in a series of resolutions presented to the Senate, and my colleague will remember that they met with no more indignant response than from the honorable, able, learned, and patriotic gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. THOMAS] who then had a seat upon the floor of this House.

The gentleman from Ohio took the instance of Florida. Florida, owned by the Federal Government as a Territory, brought up from a condition of infancy to that maturity, is admitted into the Union. Shall we claim that Florida may on the instant, by the passage of an ordinance of secession, separate herself from this Union and declare that her Union-loving citizens are traitors if they adhere to the Union? Does the gentleman forget that he does not strengthen his argument by citing the instance of a State made out of territory which belonged to the Federal Government? When Florida became a State she became a State with all of the powers and authorities, with all of the rights, all of the dignities, all the elements of sovereignty which Virginia herself had. Yet the gentleman declares that such a State, admitted into this compact by the act of the Federal Government and of the State itself, does not occupy the position of the original States, but that it—more than they—is remitted by the act of secession to a condition of pupillage, and that its people—more than others—are obliged to obey the Constitution—in whose amendment they have no vote—which three fourths of the States, States represented here, may impose upon them.

Mr. YEAMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield if I have time. How much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment. He will see the necessity for being brief.

Mr. YEAMAN. If the Constitution as an original compact of government was binding only upon those who did ratify it, then I ask whether by ratification they did not give the amending power to three fourths of the States.

Mr. PENDLETON. I have been endeavoring for three quarters of an hour to answer that question.

Mr. YEAMAN. What number of States can amend the Constitution?

Mr. PENDLETON. In some particulars, where the power is granted, three fourths of the States can. In other particulars it cannot be done except by the consent of all of the States bound by it.

Mr. YEAMAN. That brings me to the question I wish to ask the gentleman, and that is this: what is there in this particular amendment which makes it an exception to the general rule, and takes it out of the operation of the amending power?

Mr. PENDLETON. That question I have fully answered on another occasion in this House. It does not lie within the scope of my argument now. The doctrine of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] to which I have just referred, is as large in its operation, though I think hardly as logical or conclusive, as the position taken by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] That gentleman is famous more for a sledge-hammer power of logic than for its scholastic accuracy.

He says that we are in a condition of war, and that war absolves all compacts. It deprives the citizens of seceding States of their rights under the Federal Government, and absolves the Federal Government and the people of the adhering States from the obligations imposed by the Constitution; and, therefore, he told us, and with an emphasis we could all understand, that no State should be re-admitted into the Union unless it came back carved by the Federal Government out of territory conquered by the sword.

Now, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to be careful how he asserts that doctrine too far. He would go upon the maxim that what is broken in one thing is broken in all. "Fracta in uno fracta in omnibus." Let him be careful lest he may find that it will dissolve the tie which binds these northern States one to the other, and they be remitted to their original position of independence. Let him be careful, lest when the passions of these times be passed away, and the historian shall go back to discover where was the original infraction of the Constitution, he may find that sin lies at the door of others than the people now in arms.

Mr. JENCKES. May I interrupt the gentleman to ask him a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly, if the gentleman will not consume too much of my limited time.

Mr. JENCKES. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that when the history of this time should be written that the sins of and the cause of this rebellion might be laid to the doors of others than those who are now in arms against the Republic. I ask him in the presence of this House and of the American people, at whose door that sin shall be laid, wherein that sin consists, and by whom it was committed? Let the gentleman place it on the records of the history of this country.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am not surprised that the gentleman is touched by what I have said upon this subject. It might be he misunderstood somewhat the exact force of the words I used. But there have been in the neighborhood of the gentleman, there have been within his own State or near it, there have been in the northern States, within the free States, attempts constantly to infract this Constitution; and that I believe, as I believe I stand here to-day.

Mr. JENCKES. Name the men.

Mr. PENDLETON. I could do so, but I did not say that the sin of this rebellion might be laid at the door of other people; I said to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and if the gentleman from Rhode Island stands beside him he too may regard it—I said to him, let him beware how he pushed the doctrine that a compact broken in one part is broken in all, lest it might be found that in the past the compact of confederation has been broken elsewhere than in the South.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PENDLETON. I must decline for the present. I should have concluded what I had to say but for these interruptions.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Just one moment.

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I find in the Congressional Globe of 1860-61 a proposition, made, I think, from the committee of thirty-three to amend the Constitution by interposing this article:

"No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."

On looking over the yeas and nays upon that amendment I find that the gentleman from Ohio voted for the amendment.

I wish to inquire of him, if in the winter of 1860 and 1861 it was necessary to amend the Constitution by putting into it an article thereafter prohibiting such an amendment of the Constitution as would interfere with slavery, why it is that we cannot now adopt an amendment prohibiting slavery?

Mr. PENDLETON. The gentleman ought to know too well the history of that period in which he was an actor to ask me that question. He was, as I, a member of this House at that time, and he knows that charges were made upon the Republican party that they designed to do what their history has shown that they have done, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States, and that proposition of amendment was offered, I think, by a gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Adams) to test the good faith of the Republican party.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no; you are mistaken.

Mr. PENDLETON. Was it not offered by Mr. Adams? Well, it was offered at all events to test the good faith of the Republican party.

[Here the hammer fell, the hour having expired.]

Mr. ASHLEY. I move that the gentleman have leave to proceed.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire but five minutes more.

By unanimous consent the leave was granted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? [Cries of "Oh no."]

Mr. PENDLETON. Well, not if it is to press the point, which I have already answered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not think the gentleman from Ohio has answered the point.

Mr. PENDLETON. Sir, I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I understand that at that time the power to amend the Constitution so as to interfere with slavery was not denied. I find that the vote of the gentleman from Ohio for this amendment of the Constitution which should prohibit and prevent further amendment of it allowing us to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the States was an admission by him of the power of Congress and of the people to so amend the Constitution. If it was not, why did he vote for the amendment?

Mr. PENDLETON. As I said before, the gentleman ought to know, if he does not know, that the power of amendment in this particular was not then admitted by anybody who agreed with me. Some gentlemen claimed it; quite a large body of men claimed it; but I will venture to say that he will not find in the debates that preceded the vote on that amendment the admission of any member who sat upon this side of the Chamber or of a dozen men who sat upon that side of the Chamber, that the power resided in three fourths of the States to make this amendment. They denied that the prohibition was necessary; but, admitting that there was no power, they did agree, inasmuch as it was not expressly stated in the Constitution, to vote for that amendment in order that in all future time it might be the subject of no question whatever.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Nobody at that time, I think, denied the power of Congress and the people to amend the Constitution in this regard.

Mr. PENDLETON. Upon that point we differ entirely. The gentleman sat here and so did I. We had our own views of public policy, as we have now. It may be that we understood differently the positions which various gentlemen and parties occupied at that time.

Mr. COX. I will simply say in answer to what has fallen from my colleague, that at the time those resolutions were pending this question of power was discussed, and for one, I held then as I hold to-day, that we had the power under this amendatory clause to reach slavery pro con, and the only question is whether we shall use that power as then for the benefit of the country or abuse it as now it is sought to be abused.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman is correct in regard to that, and, as I said before, nobody denied the power. The slaveholders upon the floor of Congress at that time themselves admitted the power, and were constantly charging that we intended to exercise that power. For the purpose of quieting their fears in that regard, the committee of thirty-three was raised, who reported this article, and it was passed through the House by the requisite two-thirds vote. It was done for the purpose of quieting the fears of the slaveholders who were then threatening to dissolve the Union because they charged us with the intention of interfering with slavery by an amendment of the Constitution, which they all admitted we had the power to do.

Mr. PENDLETON. I dissent entirely from the proposition of my colleague, as well as from that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH.] The gentleman and I differ about it. We cannot settle it. I say, and I am prepared to show by the debates that took place at that time, that the same claim was made then which I make to-day. It was because it was believed that that opinion was not assented to by the extreme gentlemen who had just then come into the administration of the Government, that it was deemed necessary by themselves to put forth this declaration confirmatory of the absence of power on the part of three fourths of the States.

But my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] differing on many particulars, agree in this, that the power of their logic is such that no honest man can dissent from their conclusions, and that those who do not intend to vote with them for this amendment are actuated either by sympathy with slavery or by sympathy with the rebellion. Sir, I repel with indignation the insinuation; I repel it with that honest warmth which is consistent with the personal respect which those gentlemen know I feel personally for them. I say it is unworthy of them; that it is unworthy their high character, unworthy of their position in this House. It is the art of the demagogue to ascribe unworthy motives to an act which may in fact be honest.

This Constitution demands the highest admiration of my intellect. It has received the profound homage of my heart. The oath which I have taken commands me to perform that duty which my intellect and my heart impose upon me; and I intend, through evil and through good report, through whatever storm of popular disfavor, to stand by it, as I understand it, even to the end. I love my whole country, South as well as North; and it is because I love it that no act of mine shall retard the restoration of peace or the reconstruction of that Union which made it all my country. I am a northern man; I have their prejudices; I love my section; I love its people; I love its institutions; I am jealous of its honor; and no act of mine shall stain the luster of the fame of its good faith. I am a citizen of Ohio. It was the home of my fathers, as it is the home of my children; and I will stand by this Constitution because I wish to preserve forever the rights and dignities of my State, and maintain forever the liberties of its citizens.

I am not influenced, therefore, by any peculiar love for the people of the South; by any peculiar regard for their institutions. I stand unmoved by the considerations which have been addressed

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 13, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 15.

to us. It is nothing to me that gentlemen from slaveholding States approve this amendment; it is nothing to me that the tide of the popular sentiment runs in favor of it; it is nothing to me that we of the northern States who believe as I do stand alone, if alone we must stand. I intend to do my duty as I understand it, and I am prepared for the consequences be they what they may.

But, Mr. Speaker, if I were influenced by the motives which gentlemen on the other side attribute to me, it would be easy for me to fall into the current of public opinion which is carrying them so rapidly away. It is because I am not that I occupy the position I do to-day. The time is fast passing away when under the influence of your policy and your legislation the southern States or people will have the least interest in your laws. Your legislation has turned to ashes the golden fruits of your military success. Your policy has verified the alleged causes of secession. Gentlemen must not be misled by the syren voices that come up to them from captured cities of the South. They woo you but to ruin. If you misunderstand them they will lead you as willing victims upon quicksands and rocks.

If you drive the southern people by your military power to the last extremity, and superadd, as the majority of this House desire, emancipation of slaves, confiscation of property, destruction of local governments, destruction of State constitutions, division of territory—if that be your policy, they will liberate their slaves, they will arm their negroes, they will break down the only barrier that separates them from the sympathies of all Europe, and, aided by the moral force, if not the material power of Europe, they will establish their independence, and your Union President will sign the treaty of dissolution. And then, in exchange for free Maryland with her slaves enfranchised and her white citizens enslaved; in exchange for free Missouri with her slaves enfranchised and her white citizens decimated by the vengeance of the guerrillas, we will have given up this Union with all its benefits, and have subverted a form of government the fairest and freest, the most bountiful in blessings in the past and the most hopeful of blessings in the future, that God in His mercy ever vouchsafed to man.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I am not sorry to have heard, in this House of Representatives of the American people, as a finality, as I believe, of the controversy which has divided and distracted our land, the proposition stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] He has improved upon the school of his master. He looked upon a dissevered and divided Union, a compact of States. We have now a phrase by which this nation is designated by one who expected to have been one of its chief executive officers as "a compact of confederation." For the first time, I believe, in the history of this country has that phrase been used with reference to this form of government. And I am astonished that he, a citizen of Ohio, a State sovereign and independent, as I understood him to say, should have used a phrase like that in defining his position when departing from the councils of the nation. Well is it for the nation that those of that school should not be retained in its councils. If we are not a nation, what are we? "A compact of confederation?" I doubt, if the gentleman had weighed the meaning of those words, whether he would have used that phrase.

But let me make the point upon him which I did in the question that I put. I ask him, and ask all who may follow him on the same side, to answer my question. I do not agree with what he says in reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] "broken in one thing, broken in all," referring to the Constitution. I arraign before the American people the gentleman from Ohio and all who are of his school of politics, and I ask him or them to frame an indictment against a man, a State, or a party in this whole country that has committed, I will not say a fracture of the Constitution, because that would be a matter of fact, but that has done anything to break the Constitution. Let us hear what it is, here and now. While we are attempting to amend the Constitution let them place it upon record. Time and time again we have asked them for it. Now we have that accusation from the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON.] Let him put it upon record in such phrase as he chooses. He knows well how to do it; no one better. Let him answer it now, or let him and all who are with him stand mute.

But the question now before the House seems to be simply this: can we amend the Constitution in the way in which the Constitution itself says it may be amended? Whatever it may be called, written compact between the States, a declaration of the rights of the people, a convenient expression of what the people meant to be their rights forever thereafter; describe it in whatever phrase you please, can any one say that it cannot be amended in the precise way in which those who framed it intended it should be amended? What answer have we to that? Why, sir, the answer of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] is that that power is to be used but not abused. Abused! abused! to amend the Constitution in this manner? I say to that gentleman, and all who are with him, not only before this House and this country, but before the world, that it is a misuse of language in this age of the world to charge us with abuse of power when we place ourselves in the direct line of the eternal forces acting out God's justice upon this earth.

Again, I say to gentlemen—and when I say it I simply mean to raise the points that they may be answered, and that the answers may be placed upon record if any one chooses to give them—why, as a matter of expediency, should this not be done? I heard the venerable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] say, the other day, with lamentations, almost with tears, that the result of this thing was to use those enfranchised people as a political power in the States. Has not slavery been an element of power ever since it had a recognized existence in this country, ever since it was first tolerated by this Government? And shall it be objected to by the friends of freedom that the freedmen, the enfranchised men, will be an element of power in a republican Government? Strange language is that, it seems to me.

But in this contest slavery commenced the fight; it chose its own battle-field; it has fought its battle, and it is dead. In the course of our victorious march that battle-field has come into our possession, and the corpse of our dead enemy is upon it. Let us bury it quickly, and with as little ceremony as possible, that the foul odor of its rotting carcass may no longer offend us and the world.

Mr. SMITH obtained the floor, and then, (at twenty minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 12, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D.D., of Washington, District of Columbia.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th ultimo requesting information concerning an arrangement limiting the naval armament on the lakes, a report from the Secretary of State on the subject.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the message and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 657) to amend the third section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th day of June, 1865, and for other purposes," so far as the same relates to witnesses in the courts of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. COLLAMER. There was a bill (S. No. 390) introduced by me yesterday relating to the postal laws which I desire to have printed. It is somewhat lengthy, and the committee need it printed for the purpose of understanding it. I therefore move that it be printed with the letter of the Postmaster General accompanying it.
The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Jane G. Swisshelm, praying that provision may be made for the employment of women as corresponding, reading, briefing, and copying clerks in the Departments; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Philadelphia, officers of the Loyal League of that city, praying for a modification of the existing laws in relation to the raising of troops by means of local bounties; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. FARWELL presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Maine, praying for an appropriation to place steam whistles upon Cape Elizabeth, Matineus Rock, and Quoddy Head, for the better security and protection to the navigation upon the coast of that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HENDRICKS presented the memorial of Dennis Nolan, representing that he occupies a strip of land, not susceptible of cultivation, between the inclosure of the light-house and the shore of Lake Michigan, at Michigan City, and proposing to buy or lease it from the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw the papers in the case of Nott & Co.

On motion of Mr. DIXON, it was Ordered, That Henry Kellogg have leave to withdraw his papers in relation to his claim for indemnification for losses sustained in preparing to make and making bricks for the Washington aqueduct.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 388) further to provide for the verification of invoices, reported it without amendment.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. POWELL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of James Guthrie, president of the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, and D. Ricketts, president of the Jeffersonville railroad, praying that the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing railroad bridges across the Ohio river" may be so amended in the fourth section thereof as to permit them to construct a railroad bridge at the head of the falls of the Ohio fifty-four or fifty-six feet above low-water mark without the required span of three hundred feet, and that it be made a postal route for the United States mail, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. The committee think it is a matter that properly belongs to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I therefore move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, without previous notice, in relation to the subject of that petition.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 392) supplementary to an act approved July 14, 1862, entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

EXTRA SESSION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution asking if any legislation is necessary to enable the President to call an extra session of Congress without giving sixty days' notice, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate, and recommend its indefinite postponement. In making this report I will state that there seems to be a misapprehension in regard to sixty days' notice being necessary in convening an extra session of Congress. I have been unable to find any law requiring any definite notice to be given, and believe that no legislation is necessary, inasmuch as the President may convene an extra session of Congress upon such notice as he thinks proper as the law now stands.

The report was concurred in, and the resolution was indefinitely postponed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 391) authorizing an adjustment of the claims for lands heretofore confirmed to any State; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COWAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 394) for the relief of the parties in a cause pending in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, wherein Emily F. Wiley is plaintiff and Marshall Brown and others, defendants; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COUNSEL FEES PAID BY THE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, be each directed to inform the Senate what amount was paid or allowed in his Department for attorneys or counsel fees of every kind and description, exclusive of the regular salaries paid to the Attorney General and the respective district attorneys during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, and, so far as practicable, from that period to the 1st of January, 1865, giving a list of the names of the persons employed, the amount paid each, and out of what fund.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HALE. I did not hear the whole of the resolution, and I do not know but that I should be in favor of it; but I think it would be well to add at the close "and the services for which those fees were paid."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to that except that I think it will make the report very voluminous.

Mr. HALE. I think we had better have those words in the resolution. I have some particular reasons for wanting them in.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall make no objection to adding those words in the appropriate place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois modifies his resolution by inserting the words suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

COMMITTEE ON VENTILATION.

Mr. BUCKALEW submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) 1. That the joint committee on ventilation and improvement of the Halls of Congress be authorized to examine witnesses and employ a reporter.

2. That the members of the Committees of the two Houses upon Public Buildings and Grounds be added to the said joint committee upon ventilation, &c., for the purpose of deciding upon any plea or proposition of improvement which may be before said committee for consideration.

SALE OF INDIAN LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call up Senate joint resolution No. 92 that it may be acted upon at the present time. When it is taken up I can in a single moment explain to the Senate the necessity for immediate action upon it.

The motion was agreed to, and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 92) to postpone and prevent the sale, for less than their appraised value, of certain Indian lands in Minnesota was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that so much of section three of an act for the removal of the Winnebago Indians, and for the sale of their reservation in Minnesota for their benefit, approved February 21, 1863, as provides that no portion of their reservation shall be sold for a sum less than their appraised value before January 1, 1865, nor for a less price than $1 25 per acre, unless otherwise provided by law, shall be amended so that it shall not be lawful to sell any portions of the lands within the limits of the reservation for a less price than their appraised value prior to January 1, 1866, nor shall any preemption claim (unless already attached) to any portion of the lands be held to be valid unless such claim shall be established and the purchase-money for such claim paid prior to the 1st of January, 1866.

The second section provides that so much of section three of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for the removal of the Sisseton, Wahpaton, Medawankaton, and Wahpakoota bands of Sioux, or Dakota Indians, and for the disposition of their lands in Minnesota and Dakota," as provides that no portion thereof "shall be sold for a sum less than their appraised value before January 1, 1865, nor for a less price than $1 25 per acre, unless otherwise provided by law," shall be amended so that it shall not be lawful to sell any of the lands for a less price than their appraised value prior to January 1, 1866; nor shall any preemption claim, not already attached to any portion of the lands, be held to be valid unless such claim shall be established and the purchase-money for such claim paid prior to January 1, 1866.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not precisely understand the reason for the postponement of these sales. I presume the chairman of the committee can state it to the Senate and perhaps satisfy everybody about it. I have always noticed that when sales of this kind are postponed with a view of getting more than $1 25 an acre for the land we hardly ever get it. We have had considerable experience on this subject. If these lands can net to the Indians, as I understand they can, $1 25 an acre, in my opinion that is as much as they will ever get. I have seen two or three instances where postponements have been made without effecting any good.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the honorable Senator from Kansas that since these lands were surveyed there has been but a very brief period, as I am informed from the Department, for the lands to be offered for sale at their appraised value.

Mr. POMEROY. How long?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But a few weeks after the schedules were made out and put in such shape that the lands could be advertised.

Mr. RAMSEY. If the Senator will allow me, the appraisement on the lands on the Sioux reservation only reached the Department since the 1st day of January, 1865; so that the object of the law is entirely defeated, and the Indians would not get one cent above $1 25 an acre, although the land is worth three or four times that amount. Hence, this resolution is indispensably necessary in order to prevent the sacrifice of those lands.

Mr. POMEROY. If it is only to extend the time for a short period, I will not object to the resolution; but I want to know of the Senator from Wisconsin, if these lands are occupied, whether there are preemptors upon them now?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will explain to the Senator and to the Senate in a single moment the whole purpose and scope of this resolution.

The act of 1863 provided that none of these lands should be sold at less than their appraised value previous to the 1st of January, 1865, which is the first day of the present month. It has been but a very short time since these lands were advertised, or any portion of them put into market so that they could be offered and sold at their appraised value. But the 1st day of January having arrived, the lands since that date have been open to preemption, and I suppose that some persons perhaps in Minnesota may have entered on some of these lands after that date, and their rights to preemption may have attached in such a way that it is impossible for us by legislation to deprive them of their rights which have accrued. The resolution itself, therefore, excepts those which have already attached; but it proposes to postpone and prevent any more preemptions attaching to these lands for one year, so that they may be sold at the appraised value.

It will be remembered by the Senate that the Winnebago tribe of Indians were not at all involved in that war in Minnesota; yet there was such a feeling of hostility aroused by the war which was brought on by the Sioux, that there seemed an absolute necessity of taking some measures for the removal of the Winnebagos as well as the Sioux. The Winnebagos have been removed from the State of Minnesota, and these lands are the fund by which we are still to support these Winnebagos; and it seems to me it would be very wrong to allow preemption claims to attach to these lands until there is a fair opportunity for them to be sold, one year at least.

So, also, in relation to the lands belonging to the Sioux, the same provision is contained in this joint resolution. I think it but just. The Department are urgent to save these lands, or the funds to grow out of them, for the benefit of these Indians. I think there can be no objection to its passage.

Mr. HARLAN. I think there is a little ambiguity about the language of the resolution as it now stands, and I therefore desire to propose a couple of amendments to it. In section one, line fifteen, I move to strike out all after the word "claim" to the end of the section, in the following words:

(Unless already attached) to any portion of said lands be held to be valid unless such claim shall be established and the purchase-money for such claim paid prior to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1866.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Be valid made after the passage of this act.

So that the clause will read:

Nor shall any preemption claim be valid made after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move a similar amendment in section two, to strike out all after the word "claim" in the fourteenth line to the end of the section, in the following words:

Not already attached to any portion of said lands, be held to be valid unless such claim shall be established and the purchase-money for such claim paid prior to the 1st day of January, A. D. 1866.

And to insert:

Be valid made after the passage of this act.

So that the clause will read:

Nor shall any preemption claim be valid made after the passage of this act.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I see no objection to these amendments if the Senator thinks they make the resolution clearer and more satisfactory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution relating to the reciprocity treaty.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854, the pending question being on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned yesterday I had just submitted some figures giving an exhibit of the actual lumber export of Canada as compared with the lumber product of the United States. I desired, if I could, to persuade the Senate and to persuade the country that there was no danger that $95,000,000, which is the value of the American product, would be swallowed up by $10,000,000, which is the value of the Canadian export. But it must be remembered that this quantity of lumber which I have already given as the export of Canada does not all come here, by any manner of means. On the contrary, of the $8,500,000, in round numbers, which was the export of Canada in 1859, only something over $3,000,000 found its way to the United States. Of the $10,000,000 which was exported by Canada, in 1860, something over $3,800,000 worth found its way to the United States; and of the $8,600,000 which was the export of Canada in 1861, only $2,065,870 found its way to the United States. And yet Senators here seem to be alarmed that the lumber interests of the United States are to be overwhelmed by this slight and insignificant importation from Canada. In point of fact this $2,000,000 of lumber in value is received at different points and melts away in the vast consumption of the United States, and I dare say is little felt anywhere.

The port of Chicago, which is one of the great lumber markets in the country, the greatest lumber market in the Northwest, which would be likely to feel this importation as soon as almost any point, makes this return of the Canadian lumber trade: in 1860 there was received at that port, from Canada, of lumber unmanufactured $11,453 in value; in 1861, $15,710; in 1862, $19,425; in 1863, $43,268; in 1864, $92,378. Of manufactured lumber not a foot has been received in that port for five years.

I feel, therefore, great confidence in saying that this new-born sympathy for the lumber interests of the United States is not called for. They do not stand in need of it. They are doing very well; and I think the lumbermen of this country will feel much less grateful for this sympathy when they are made to understand what it really leads to; for what is the proposition that was submitted to us yesterday? They propose to rid the American lumber interest of a competition which arises from an importation of about two million dollars in value. For what? To put the Government in a position in which it can levy a tax on the American product of five per cent. In other words, you propose to drive $2,000,000 of Canadian lumber out of our market, and save our lumber interest from that amount of competition; and the equivalent for doing this is that you will take $5,000,000 directly from the pockets of our manufacturers. The lumber product of the United States is not less than $100,000,000, and if you put five per cent. upon that, they have to pay directly $5,000,000 as a consideration for being relieved from this competition of $2,000,000. I think the lumbermen of the United States can do without this sympathy. I am sure they cannot do with it.

But, sir, there has been an attempt to excite our jealousy against our Canadian neighbors. The sentiment of envy has been appealed to in aid of this resolution. We have been pointed to magnificent railway improvements which are said to have cut their way through Canadian forests, as if they were the effect of this treaty of 1854. Well, sir, they have a railway running through Canada, I believe. It is a pretty important highway, I suppose; but we are not entirely destitute of railways in the United States. We are taunted with the railway system of Canada, as if the produce of the United States found its way to our own markets by wagon trains. But our produce does not go to market in that way. Sir, I cannot help feeling a little humiliated and mortified when any statesman, speaking for the United States, attempts to excite our envy toward the people or the government or the trade or the prosperity of Canada. If we are reduced to that it is time we were wiped out as a nation.

So far, sir, I have been considering objections, not as they were made here in the debate of yesterday, but as I had found them stated elsewhere, before any objections were presented to the Senate. I have taken them from the lips of a Representative who is understood to be the author of this measure. I thought it fair to infer that if he could not sustain the resolution it could not be sustained, and I think I have succeeded in showing that his defense falls very far short of sustaining the resolution. Yesterday the resolution was advocated on this floor, and somewhat different grounds were urged in support of the resolution.

Yesterday we were told that we should repeal this treaty of 1854 to enable us hereafter to lay duties on our imports from Canada, and to enable us also to impose taxes on our productions which are named in the treaty. That was urged by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER;] that was urged by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN;] neither of whom I see in his seat; that was urged by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] also, who is not in his seat.

The argument falls from the Senator from Ohio very naturally. To impose taxes seems to be his forte. He has an idea, I think, that the normal condition of man is to pay taxes. [Laughter.] I have never known him to avow a willingness that anything should go untaxed except perhaps Catawba wine and silver spoons. When he urges us to repeal this treaty in order that he may get a new hold of the pockets of the people, it is all right; but I insist that we have a right to milder doctrines from the Senator from Massachusetts. He has no right to be so greedy.

Besides, sir, if we must have money, do you conceive it to be absolutely necessary that the money should be collected off these specific items? Senators tell us that the Treasury is needy. Well, supply the Treasury. Must you wait until some commodity comes to you from Canada before you pay your taxes? I once heard of a Massachusetts lawyer who insisted that a fee was so essential to enable a lawyer to do business correctly that he never would trust himself to draw a deed for himself without taking a five dollar note from his wallet and putting it in his vest pocket. [Laughter.] I never really believed the statement; but since I have found a Massachusetts statesman who insists that he cannot pay his dues to the Government until he has been furnished a foreign commodity on which to pay them, I am less incredulous about the story of the Massachusetts lawyer.

Why, sir, if these duties are paid, we have got to pay them, and I would just as soon pay them before the commodity comes here, and without any regard to the commodity, as to pay them now. The truth is—and some time the American people will be made to comprehend it, and when they do the American Legislature will be made to comprehend it—that this method of levying taxes by way of duties is the most cruel and inhuman mode you could contrive, because it is the most expensive mode. Every million of dollars you put into your Treasury by that method takes, not less than a million, but more than a million and a quarter out of the pockets of the people. That will come to be known some time.

The Senator from Vermont yesterday told us that the Government of Great Britain derived a very large revenue from the excise duty on hops. He told it to us so touchingly that it almost made my mouth water to think what a jolly time they were having there in collecting money on hops. Nay, he told it with an air which almost led me to pity our own hop-growers that they could not enjoy the luxury of paying something on their hops. But after all, when we look at it soberly, I think our own hop-growers can get along without that. Recollect, there is not a dollar made in the growth of hops that you do not tax just as heavily as you tax any other dollar of profits made from any other source; there is not a hop used in the manufacture of any article but what you tax just as high as you tax any other manufactured article; and I think the hop-growers will be content with paying taxes in these two methods and will not insist upon a direct tax being levied upon their production. The whole policy of our revenue laws so far is to avoid laying taxes on raw products.

The Senator from Vermont also urged yesterday that he wanted to get rid of this treaty because he did not like the way in which the treaty was made. He tells us he does not like this way of regulating trade or commerce by treaty. He thinks it had better be done by Congress. Very likely the regulation of our own commerce with foreign countries had better be done by our own Legislature rather than the treaty-making power; but it happens that if you want to regulate our trade with foreign countries you are obliged to do it through the treaty-making power, for the authority of your Legislature does not extend so far. Your Legislature can determine what duties they will impose on the importations from foreign countries, but your Legislature cannot prescribe what duties shall be imposed on those articles you export to foreign countries. It was the object of this treaty not merely to regulate the trade of Canada with us, but to regulate our trade with Canada; not merely to fix the rate of duties on our imports, but to fix the rate of duties on our exports. That must be done through the treaty-making power, and cannot be done through the Legislature. It was conceded here, as it has not been conceded elsewhere, that the treaty is constitutional; in other words, that the President and Senate had authority to make it, had authority to regulate trade in this way. If they have the authority to do it, then the only question is whether they did as wisely as the Legislature could.

The Senator from Vermont also told us that it must have been a bad bargain for us, since we opened to Canadian productions a market of thirty million people, and they have opened to us a market of but three million. He insisted that that must be a bad bargain for us; that a market of thirty million must be more valuable than a market of three million. The argument is a plausible one, but an unsound one; for the value of a market does not depend upon the number of purchasers found in it; it depends upon the demands, the needs of the market. Here are thirty million people purchasers of cotton; thirty million are the consumers of cotton; but of what use is it to open that market to Canada, for we have more cotton than we know what to do with, or had when this treaty was formed. The value of the market, as I said before, depends upon its necessities; and whether we shall buy more or sell more to Canada depends not upon the question whether our population is larger than theirs, but whether we have a larger surplus than they. It is, however, unnecessary to argue this matter with the Senator from Vermont or with anybody else. It is put beyond the reach of argument by established facts. The established fact is, that notwithstanding we have thirty million to buy, and they have but three million, yet we sell more to them than they do to us, and have done so since this treaty was made. We sell more to the three million than the three million sell to our thirty million.

Now, sir, I have done what I could to show that every objection taken to the treaty in debate here and elsewhere is unsound, is untenable. I have argued from the official returns that we have showing the state of this trade. The Senator from Vermont said yesterday that the people living where he did, in the State of Vermont, did not need any reference to any tables whatever on this subject; they knew that the treaty was injurious to us; they could see that every day. Well, sir, I never lived in Vermont. I know that Vermont touches the Canadian line at one point about as big as a man's foot, and it is barely possible that because of that contact they may know there how this trade affects the whole country stretching along the whole frontier of Canada. I should not suppose so. I do not believe that if you go out and put your hand on one of the telegraph wires you can tell what is passing over all the telegraph wires in the country; and I do not believe that by placing yourself in contact with the Canada line at one point you can know exactly what the trade is between the two countries throughout the whole extent of their bounds.

I, however, did not assume to know anything from any such quarter. I have given you facts and figures as they are reported to us officially, and I have shown that if it be objected to this treaty that you export more free goods since the treaty was adopted than you did before, that Canada does the same, and that such was the very design of the treaty itself. I have shown you that if it be objected that the balance of trade was in our favor before the treaty was adopted and has been against us since the treaty was adopted, that that is a mistake. The balance of trade has been in our favor ever since the treaty was adopted as it was every year before the treaty was adopted. If it be objected against the treaty that you have exported less of the articles named in it than you have imported, I have admitted that that was very true when the treaty was first adopted, such was the undeniable fact then, but even that evil I have shown you is cured; so that in the last years of the operation of the treaty we have exported more of articles named in it than we imported.

The last evil objected to in the treaty, therefore, has been cured. I have shown you that if the Treasury needs more revenue there are other ways in which it can be supplied without depriving the people of the advantages they derive from this treaty. To cut down their trade is not the way in which to prepare the people to be taxed. It is not a sound argument to adduce here or elsewhere to say that when you have deprived the people of the United States of this trade which now amounts to $40,000,000 annually they will be in a better position to pay your taxes and sustain the public credit.

But the argument so far, if ever so successful, has only shown that the reasons urged against the treaty are untenable. I now beg the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I name three reasons which, in my judgment, forbid the repeal of this treaty.

Sir, what is the reciprocity treaty? It is a compact entered into between this Government and the Government representing Canada and the adjacent British provinces lying on our northern border, by which they agree to exchange certain articles of produce of the respective countries, and to admit into the respective countries those articles without any duty. The articles enumerated included nearly all the kinds of raw material which are produced in the United States and in the British provinces respectively. They are:

"Grain, flour, and breadstuffs of all kinds; animals of all kinds; fresh, smoked, and salted meats; cotton-wool, seeds, and vegetables; undried fruits, dried fruits; fish of all kinds; products of fish and of all other creatures living in the water; poultry, eggs, hides, furs, skins, or tails undressed, stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state; slate; butter, cheese, tallow; lard, horns, manures; ores of metals of all kinds; coal; pitch, tar, turpentine, ashes; timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, sawed, unmanufactured in whole or in part; firewood; plants, shrubs, and trees; pelts, wool; fish oil; rice, broom-corn, and bark; gypsum, ground or unground; hewn or wrought or unwrought burl or grindstones; dyestuffs; flax, hemp, and tow unmanufactured; unmanufactured tobacco; rags."

These articles, which are the produce of the United States, are by the treaty admitted into all these British provinces free of duty, and the like articles, the products of those provinces, are under the treaty admitted into the United States free of duty. Beyond this, and for this, the Canadas agree to pay something like boot as a condition, or as an equivalent for entering into this compact. They give to our commerce the use of the St. Lawrence river, and of the Canadian canals upon the same terms under which the Canadian commerce enjoys that use. They give to us the use of the St. John's river for floating down our lumber cut upon its head waters; and they give us a common fishery throughout all their bays and their coasts.

Now, Mr. President, to say for a moment nothing about the value of this fishery, nothing about the value of the use of the St. John's, nothing about the value of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, what is the compact so far as it relates to the exchange itself? Canada puts herself and her productions named in the treaty upon a par with us. She says, "we are willing to compete with you; you can produce more cheaply than we can, more abundantly than we can; if you can undersell us we are your purchasers; if we can produce more cheaply than you, if we can undersell you you are our purchasers." Believing as fully as I do in the capacity of this country, I should not say it was a very bad bargain of itself; and if we got no boot I think we could afford to abide by that contract. I should think so irrespective of any actual returns showing its operation.

The Senator from Vermont told us yesterday that he thought he knew why the treaty was made. He thought it was made for the purpose of preventing the annexation of those provinces to this country. I cannot say that it was not, but I do not see anything in the treaty which has that tendency, and certainly there is nothing shown of the operations of the treaty which could have that tendency. The Senator says they were uneasy because they had no outlet for their products; that by this treaty an outlet was provided, a market was opened to them, the discontent was all allayed, and Canada has been content with her old allegiance. Well, sir, we have seen by all the figures which have been cited here that there was no market created for them. True, they have sent some certain commodities here, but they have received a larger amount in value from us. In other words, they have purchased from us more than they have sold to us every year since the treaty was enacted. I do not believe, therefore, that that was the purpose for which the treaty was made. I do not undertake, myself, to know why it was made; but I do know what the treaty did, and I will tell you.

Before the treaty, our whole import from all the British provinces was about six millions a year. In 1855, the very first year after the treaty was adopted, we imported from Canada alone in wheat and other varieties of grain and flour, $10,840,204. Four million dollars over what our whole importation had been from all the provinces prior to the adoption of the treaty were imported from Canada alone, in the first year after the adoption of the treaty, in breadstuffs which we ought to have raised ourselves. That is what the treaty did.

Sir, I was born in New England, and I understand those people. I never knew them to be beaten much by any combination of accidents. Whatever happens to them is generally designed by them; and since it happened as the result of this treaty that their manufacturers were enabled to purchase in a new market free of duty, and bring in here $10,000,000 of the agricultural products of this country, I think they designed that very operation of the treaty. It will be remembered that so long as we were importing this large amount of breadstuffs and sending abroad under the treaty but very little, we heard no complaint about the treaty. Nay, sir, it was said by a Representative from Vermont, in discussing this subject the other day, that such of the eastern States as failed to produce their own breadstuffs, or their butcher's meat, or their wool, or their horses, would not be likely to protest against supplies from Canada and the consequent reduction of prices. They did not produce them; there was no complaint heard about the treaty then; and I infer from all this that it was the very object and design of the makers of this treaty to enable the manufacturing districts to purchase their food in the Canadian markets and bring it here without duties.

It will be remembered that in 1854, when this treaty was made, the Northwest, the really agricultural districts of the United States, were a great deal further from the eastern markets than they are now. It was about that time, if I remember right, that the first railroad from the East reached Chicago. Since then we have a large number of railways reaching to Chicago, and reaching far beyond Chicago. Our means of communicating with the eastern markets are much more abundant now than they were then; and our production also is vastly increased. The agriculture of the United States in 1854 was in its cradle, and it is not the fault of this treaty that it was not strangled in its cradle.

The first reason I have to present why this treaty should not be repealed now is, that under it our trade with these provinces has increased from $16,000,000, which was its value in 1852, to over $50,000,000, which was its value in 1862. In 1852 our exports to them were $10,509,016, and our imports $6,110,299. In 1862 our exports to Canada alone were $25,173,151, and our imports from Canada were $15,063,730. Our trade with the provinces was something over $12,000,000, making an aggregate of over $52,000,000, which was the amount of our trade with all the British provinces in 1862.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in his speech yesterday, admits the fact of the immense increase of that trade, but affects to doubt that it is the result of the treaty. He admits that it followed the adoption of the treaty, but does not seem prepared to admit that it was caused or affected by the treaty. I cannot prove that it was. He suggests that it might have been the effect of our increase of population, or that it might have been the effect of our railway system. I respectfully insist that it cannot be the effect of either of those causes. It cannot be the effect of our increase of population, because our population in that time increased only about twenty-five per cent, and our trade increased three hundred per cent. It cannot be the effect of our railway system, because the direction of it is such that it would prevent this trade between the States and the Canadas. Our railways and their railways run from east to west, from western communities to eastern markets; and it is no more their tendency to send trade from one country to the other than it is the tendency of this railway along Pennsylvania avenue to send its cars along the streets at right angles with it. These railways are grooves, so to speak, holding, so far as their influence goes, that trade and commerce right along their lines, and their tendency is to prevent its diverging either from the Canada tracks into our country or from our tracks into theirs.

I think it is very easy, therefore, to see that this vast increase in that trade is not the result of either of the causes suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. That it is the direct and necessary result of the treaty itself, as I said before, I cannot prove. When you take off duties and cheapen importation you always notice that trade does increase; but I cannot prove that it is a consequence of that policy. I have noticed all my life that every time the sun rises clear there is light shining about us; but I do not know how I can prove that the light is the consequence of the sun rising. I would like to have that believed; I always have believed it myself; and I would like the Senator from Massachusetts to admit if he can, through the exercise of faith, if not through the exercise of his reason, that this increase of trade is the direct and necessary result of the treaty itself.

The repeal of the treaty will destroy that trade. It will prevent you from purchasing these $15,000,000 and from selling that $25,000,000. You had some trade, it is true, before your treaty was adopted; but then your duties were lower and their duties were lower than they are now. Your duties have been very much advanced and theirs very much advanced since this treaty was adopted. Strike down the treaty and leave that trade to the mercy of your present rates of duties, and this interchange of commodities must stop altogether. Then you have $25,000,000 of goods for which you have not this market, and they have $15,000,000 of goods which we want and which we cannot have.

That is the first effect of repealing the treaty. That is an effect upon the trade of the country generally. But it will have an effect upon the agricultural interest which I should deprecate as the representative of an agricultural community, and which I think we all ought to deprecate; for, representing what communities you may, there is no one to be found anywhere whose prosperity does not depend primarily upon the prosperity of the agricultural interest. I have already told you, Mr. President, that in the first year after this treaty was made we imported from Canada of breadstuffs alone $10,840,204. In that year we exported but $1,599,040. That was a heavy blow to the agricultural interests of the United States. That was sending abroad for a clean $9,000,000 in value of breadstuffs which we produced and which we ought to have consumed at home. But we have outlived that. In 1863 we imported from the Canadas but $6,117,890 of breadstuffs, while we exported $9,588,390 to the Canadas, and we exported to the other provinces $4,948,871. There were more than $14,000,000 of breadstuffs which in 1863 we exported under the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

VICE ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, the Senate is honored by the presence of one of the most distinguished of our citizens at this moment, to whom every Senator, I presume, desires to pay his respects; I mean Vice Admiral Farragut, the first person holding that high position in the American service. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess of ten minutes in order that the members of the body may have an opportunity of a few minutes' intercourse with that eminent citizen.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and Senators were individually introduced to the gallant sailor and to his chief executive officer, Captain Drayton, who accompanied him, who had been admitted to the privileged seats of the Senate Chamber.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, to explain this great change in our trade with Canada in agricultural products, it may be necessary to refer to the great increase of those products. In 1854, when this treaty was made, the whole shipment of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, and flour from the port of Chicago was a little less than 13,000,000 bushels. In 1864, the shipment from the same port by lake alone was 41,481,625 bushels. To this must be added a large amount which has gone forward from that port by railway, and another large amount which has gone down the Mississippi river to supply our armies. Then it appears that in the time from 1854 to 1864, in those ten years, it is very safe to assume that the shipment of these products from that port and from all western ports have more than quadrupled.

We have seen that the first effect of the treaty was to bring into our markets a large amount of Canadian products. We have seen that the operation of the treaty at length is, arising from our increased production, to send to Canadian markets a large amount of our products. It will be remembered, sir, that I have stated our shipments of these products in a time of war. For the last three years we have been engaged in war, a large amount of our labor has been transferred from the ranks of producers to the ranks of consumers, and yet in 1862 we sent from Chicago over 52,000,000 bushels, in 1863 over 48,000,000, and in 1864 over 41,000,000. For nearly one third of the whole shipment from Chicago in 1864, we found a market for a like amount in Canada in 1863. The repeal of the treaty closes to us that market. I think the representatives of agricultural communities ought to hesitate before they shut up that market. In a few years at most, we hope this war will be ended. Then a million of men will once more return to the work of production who are now consuming. When that shall have happened, we can well estimate the effect it will produce on our production. That it will be immense, we know. We shall want a market then. We shall look for a market then. If this treaty is allowed to stand, we shall have a market for a portion of it. If this treaty is stricken down, that market will be closed. Our agricultural population will want to know then why and by whom this market was closed against them; and I have taken this occasion to be able to say, when that inquiry shall be instituted, that it was not done by me.

I do not say that it is the design of those who insist upon the repeal of this treaty to close that market to our products, but I do say that it was the direct effect of the treaty itself to enable the manufacturing States to buy their breadstuffs in two markets; and I do say that it will be the direct effect of the repeal of the treaty to close one of those markets to our productions and to compel us to sell our surplus to them exclusively and give them a monopoly of the purchase. As was argued in the House of Representatives, bringing in these Canadian products reduced the price. That is true; and shutting up this Canadian market will have the same effect, will still reduce the price. I know it would seem to be the interest of the manufacturing States to purchase their breadstuffs as cheaply as possible; but after all I am not sure that that is their highest interest. I am not sure that it is not for their interest to furnish to the agricultural community a free and a generous market. This is very certain, that all we get for our produce we shall take to their shops. We spend everything we get, and the danger is that we shall spend something that we do not get. That has been a little our habit heretofore; we have made purchases beyond our ability to pay.

I am opposed, therefore, to the repeal of this treaty, because it will have this discouraging effect on the agricultural interests of the country. I am opposed to it for another and a last reason, because it degrades and disgraces the country itself. Yes, sir, I say it degrades and disgraces the country itself. Here is Canada, here are these provinces, your next-door neighbors, comprising about three and a half million people scattered along over that territory, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who have been until within a few years the shopkeepers for the fur-trading interest. They challenge you to free and open competition; you, the American people, thirty million as you were a few years ago, and will be again in a few months, I trust. If your country is as capable as theirs you ought to accept the challenge. I know it is not a free competition of all their industry with yours. Some of your commodities are excluded from their markets, to be sure; some commodities upon which a large amount of industry is employed; but if that be the fault you find with this treaty they invite you to remodel it; they express a willingness to enlarge it. The Canadian minister himself told you two years ago that instead of recommending its repeal he would rather "unite with the Committee on Commerce," representing to the committee of our House of Representatives, "and especially with the chamber of commerce of St. Paul, in seeking to find means for the development of the international treaty, and entering upon the subject with a mutual desire to extend the number of articles for free admission," and he adds:

"The undersigned feels every confidence that much greater scope could be given to the treaty without compromising on the one hand the revenue interests of the United States, or on the other the just claims to an equality in the Canadian market which belongs both of right and duty to Great Britain."

Here is the offer to extend the number of articles embraced in the treaty, to make it more clearly and more unequivocally a reciprocity treaty than it is, and how do you meet that challenge? You are advised to decline it. They challenge you, as I say, to free and open competition, and you are advised to skulk behind the protection of restrictive duties and taxes. Why, sir, without these restrictions production will find its level just as surely as water. If your soil produces the most generously, you will have an excess. If theirs is the most capable, they will have an excess. If theirs is the most capable, you will be their purchasers; if yours is the most capable, they will be your purchasers. I believe in the capabilities of our own soil, and of our own country, and of our own industry. I am willing to put it in competition with Canadian soil and Canadian industry at any time. If they have got the best country, and can develop it, it is just as free to me as to them, and I want to go there. At present I do not believe it. At present I do not like to see this challenge declined. I think it becomes us to meet it, to accept it, to engage in it. I believe that our honor demands it, and I think I know that our interests demand it.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I do not propose to argue the question which is before the Senate; that has been done largely and exhaustively; but I find myself in a predicament where I shall act, so to speak, under some restraint. This question in my State is not an open question. It is, so far as the people of Maine are concerned, res adjudicata. This treaty has been adjudged for many years to have been utterly against the interests of my State, with one or two exceptions; and I think that this judgment of my State has become so general in most of the States, particularly of New England, that I doubt much whether it is an open question anywhere in that region of the country. This conclusion does not depend, as has been suggested, upon a caprice or a whim or a passion or any sudden impulse; it is the result of experience and judgment. It is the experience of the people of my State that the whole course of dealing between the Canadas and the United States under this treaty has been unfavorable to the general interests of the people of New England, and I think I may say of the people of the States generally.

Therefore, sir, I should approach a question of this kind with very great deference under any circumstances; but I am happy to say that my own judgment runs in harmony with what I understand to be the general judgment of the people of my State, and the people of the several States. I believe, sir, that in the main it will be found, whatever may be said in favor of the treaty, that the principle on which it was started, that of reciprocity, has been sacrificed and does not hold good to-day; and for this reason alone, if there were no other, it is proper to give this notice.

Then there is a very significant fact which has been stated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Finance, [Mr. SHERMAN.] It seems by our peculiar circumstances to have been rendered absolutely necessary by the emergency of public affairs to lay an internal revenue, and this treaty interferes with that and this renders its termination almost absolutely necessary. This is an additional reason to my mind why the notice should be given.

Some objections to this course have been urged, one very plausible, and I need not say very plausibly urged, by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE,] that the general scope and tendency of this treaty was favorable to the development of liberal ideas between that country and ours, and that we ought to cherish good neighborhood, and that we ought to cherish those enlarged principles which encourage commerce, trade, good neighborhood, and friendship. I agree to all that, but do we propose anything to the contrary by our action here?

It is said that this resolution is started upon a sudden impulse, and that it will be taken to be inimical and unfriendly to the provinces. By no means, sir. Allow me to remind Senators that the treaty itself provides for precisely what we propose. The treaty-making power when it entered upon this compact understood that in the practical operation of this treaty, very likely during the ten years upon which we were to enter, experience would show the necessity of revision; and therefore it provided for giving this notice, and the very fact that it provided for it shows that the parties having a wise forecast saw that, as this was but an experiment, and with the information they had they could only make an approximate regulation for the future, it would be well to provide, and they did provide, that if at any time during those ten years either party found that its practical operation was injurious, it should be the right, and will any Senator say it would not clearly be the duty, of such party to give the notice to that end? Not in a spirit of hostility, not in a spirit of passion, but upon the general judgment that the treaty has ceased to be reciprocal. That is the point. Upon the general ascertainment of the fact that the treaty has ceased to be reciprocal, then comes the right, and, as I submit, the duty of the Government of the United States to give the notice, not as my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] supposes, for the total abrogation of amicable relations between Great Britain and this country, not in a spirit of hostility, but in a spirit of liberality, in a spirit of amity and friendship, to the end that we may have a better understanding, and to the end that this great treaty may fulfill its destiny by being put in harmony by suitable provisions with its grand object, that of reciprocity.

Without undertaking to elaborate the matter or to argue it, I content myself with a simple statement of the attitude in which I find myself on the general judgment of my own State, and the general facts which I think in this country have become historical in regard to this question. There are, however, one or two points, to which perhaps I may be allowed to advert, as they are peculiar to the interests of my own State, and as they were adverted to by the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. The first of these is the fishing interest. It is very true that on that question I feel very deep solicitude; I am very tender of that whole interest, and I would be very slow to take any measure here or elsewhere which would detrimentally affect that interest. I am very free to confess that, to some extent, this treaty is favorable to the fishing interests which are somewhat peculiar to New England. It is favorable to them to this extent, that it did provide a larger field for the operations of our fishermen. The controverted matter as to where our fishermen had a right to cast their nets, where the point within three leagues of the shore began, and where it ended, was settled by this treaty, and our fishermen, gained some additional advantages, I believe by way of curing their fish in some of the ports and on some of the shores and coasts of the provinces. But as an offset to all that, we allowed to come in free of duty all the fish caught by British subjects; so that when the balance is struck, my information and belief is that the benefits which American fishermen are supposed to have derived from this treaty are very small and partial, and I entirely concur with the view expressed by my colleague the other day, that so far as the fishing interests are concerned they will not be greatly prejudiced by an absolute rescission of this treaty. But I will not argue the question of giving the notice on that ground. I go upon the assumption that if this treaty be what its friends claim for it in its general features, it will in the end, this notice having first been given, be subjected to revision, and having these defects cured, the treaty will be left to us.

There is another point in which my State is beneficially affected by this treaty, by the reciprocal relations which are supposed to have been established between the two countries, and that is in regard to the transportation over the Atlantic and St. Lawrence and Great Western railway. I can see in a certain contingency, if this treaty shall be disrupted, finally and absolutely, and no other take its place, that possibly that interest which is peculiar to a section of my State might suffer detriment; but I do not anticipate any such thing. I anticipate a revision, and even if there should not be a revision I think I can see a compensation, because this great Canadian railway rests upon the Atlantic at Portland, one of its termini, and the other reaches into the West; and therefore it will always be a necessity, I submit, of this railway to give all the facilities for the transportation of the products of the West which may be demanded by the interests of the East. Hence, with a due regard to these particular interests of my State, which I think are favored by this treaty, looking to the general character of the treaty and its general operation upon my own State and the rest of the New England States, and upon all the States that are intimately connected with it, I am very clear in my judgment that the notice ought to be given, and that the best interests of the country require that the treaty should be revised.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I do not wish to make any extended remarks upon this subject, nor should I have opened my lips upon it, perhaps, but for an allusion that has been made in the course of the debate to the board of trade in my city, Detroit. That board of trade does not represent the State of Michigan, or the interests of the State of Michigan. The gentlemen composing it are engaged mostly in the forwarding and commission business and the receipt of produce. It is undoubtedly for the interest of many of those gentlemen to continue this intercourse with Canada, and the reception of Canadian produce, but, sir, the people of the State of Michigan have no such interest. The people of Michigan are engaged in agriculture, in mining, in lumbering, and in fishing; and every one of these interests is directly injured by the continuance of this treaty. The citizens of Michigan are largely taxed for the support of this Government; taxed directly and indirectly; taxed upon their income, and upon their products, and upon their consumption; taxed in every way; while the inhabitants of Canada raise precisely the same articles, are engaged in the same business, and send their products here to compete with ours, without contributing one dollar to the support of this Government. In my humble judgment the honorable and distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] was right when he said that the object, end, and aim of this treaty in its inception and adoption was to give the people of Canada the full benefit of the American market without taxation, in order to prevent them from carrying out the scheme which was then almost generally advocated in Canada, of annexation to the United States. From the date of the adoption of the treaty until to-day that feeling, that desire for annexation and incorporation with the United States has grown "small by degrees and beautifully less," until it has become extinct; and the great mass of the people of Canada are to-day in sympathy with the rebellion against this Government.

If, instead of a treaty of reciprocity, this treaty had been called a treaty to encourage emigration from the United States into Canada; a treaty to encourage production in Canada instead of in the United States, it would have been more justly named. As was remarked by the Senator from Vermont, we have been prevented from levying a revenue tax on the lumber interest, which is an enormous interest in this country, on account of the treaty. I have no doubt that to-day we should be in the receipt of at least $5,000,000 annual revenue from a tax on the lumber interest, which can as well afford to pay it as any other business, and we could impose the tax but for the treaty. Canadian lumber, as is well known, comes in direct competition with the productions of our own mills, from one end of our border to the other, and more particularly is it injurious in its effect on the State of Michigan, which is perhaps more largely engaged in the lumber interest than any other State in the Union.

The figures which some Senators have presented to us from the Canadian tables in regard to reciprocity are false and fallacious in point of fact. Canada really receives very few of the products of our soil. It is true they pass through Canada; there are lines of propellers established between Chicago and the Canadian ports; but we merely use the Canadian railroads as a means of transportation. If the treaty be abrogated, I do not believe it will affect that competition, for these products can just as well be sent through Canada under seal or under bond as to be as at present shipped directly to Canada.

There is another assumption that in case of the abrogation of the treaty the Canadians will put a prohibitory rate of tolls on their lines of transportation. Far from it, for those railroads are today supported by the traffic of the United States, by passengers and by freight from the United States and to the United States. As I said before, the figures of the exports of produce to Canada are fallacious. They merely represent our products exported to Canada and transported through Canada and landed at Portland in Maine, and at other points which are the termini of the through railroads. They do not affect our market in the slightest degree.

As was well said by the Senator from Vermont, this treaty opened the markets of thirty-two million people to every product of Canada, and in exchange there is comparatively nothing that we have to export which Canada takes free. Our manufactures are taxed on entering their ports, as are all other manufactures. We receive their corn, their wheat, their wool, their lumber, their minerals, almost every product, free of duty, and they require none of these articles from us in return. They receive some few of our manufactures and tax them as they see fit.

I have not prepared a speech on this subject, but living upon the frontier and having had business connections and relations with Canada for the last thirty years, the whole matter is familiar to me. My recollection is, that when the reciprocity treaty, falsely so called, was adopted, Canada had a uniform tariff of twelve per cent. on our manufactures and on the manufactures of Great Britain. That tariff has gone on increasing and increasing until, as I am informed, the duties levied on many of our most important exports to Canada are now doubled and trebled in amount. I have not the figures before me, but I have seen a statement within a few days that the amount of our imports from Canada subject to duty is very small, only three per cent. of the whole amount of our imports, while our exports to Canada are some forty-seven per cent.

I was in hopes that this resolution would have passed without a dissenting voice. I am surprised that any Senator from an agricultural or a lumber-producing State should stand up here and advocate the continuance of the treaty. It is in direct hostility to the interests of every constituent that I have in the State of Michigan, except the few men in the Board of Trade in the city of Detroit, who are engaged in receiving and forwarding Canadian produce; and I believe that the constituents of the Senator from Wisconsin are more injuriously affected by the continuance of this treaty than by almost any other commercial arrangement existing in the United States to-day. The constituents of that Senator are taxed, and largely taxed, upon everything that they consume; and yet every product of theirs, of the plow, of the anvil, of the mill, and of the mine, is brought in direct competition with untaxed products of Canada of the same description. We receive the whole excess of Canadian agricultural products in competition with our own, and in return what do we give them? The Senator says they receive the same articles. It is true they receive them for transportation, but for no other purpose. His figures will not stand the test. If he will look at the exports from Chicago, one third of which he says goes to Canada, he will find that not one tenth of that one third stops in Canada longer than is necessary to transport it to Portland, or to Niagara Falls, or to Buffalo.

As I said before, I was in hopes that there would not be a dissenting voice, but that this resolution would pass unanimously. As was said by the honorable Senator from Ohio, a very large amount of tobacco is exported to Canada in the leaf, there manufactured, and smuggled across the lines. A much larger amount of corn is exported from Illinois to Canada, there manufactured into whisky, and then smuggled across, defrauding our revenue in that respect.

I have in my possession a large number of figures and a large mass of material on this subject. I have given a great deal of attention to the treaty from the time of its first adoption. I was opposed to it when it was adopted. I have been opposed to it ever since. I have thought it worked injuriously from that hour to this. I think so now; and I hope that at the very first hour when we can by the terms of the treaty give notice to Great Britain of its abrogation that notice will be given.

Mr. FOOT. Mr. President, I do not rise with any purpose of protracting this debate, or of engaging in the discussion of the question before us at any length, but simply to venture a general remark or two on the subject. In fact, I had not supposed that the proposition now before the Senate would be at all likely to elicit any considerable degree of discussion. I could see no occasion for protracted debate upon a question on which we seemed to be pretty nearly all agreed; and I could see no occasion for long debate upon a proposition in respect to the policy or expediency of which it can hardly be said that there is a divided opinion either in Congress or in the country; certainly there is not among the people for whom I am authorized here to speak.

I believe it to be very generally conceded that while this reciprocity treaty, so denominated, has proved highly beneficial to the interests of the people of the British provinces, and has contributed very largely to their interest and prosperity, it has at the same time proved injurious and prejudicial to the interest and prosperity of the people of the American States. The very title of the treaty itself is a misnomer. There is nothing reciprocal about it; there is nothing reciprocal in its operation; it produces no reciprocity of benefits between the two Governments. It is beneficial to one only of the contracting parties and injurious to the other. Such are the practical results of its operation. This, at all events, is the prevailing if not quite the unanimous opinion of the American people, who now after an experience of its effects for ten years demand as with one voice the abrogation of a contract which they regard as partial, unjust, inequitable, and one-sided, as soon as it can be done through the forms prescribed in the treaty itself.

This demand, Mr. President, is made not in any spirit of resentment or retaliation toward the people of Canada on account of any imputed injury or wrong they have done us. It is not demanded because we regard it as beneficial to the people of Canada, but because we regard it as prejudicial to our own people in the States.

I take leave here to make another general remark or statement in this connection. When this treaty was before this body for consideration, now nearly eleven years ago—and there are but three or four of us here now who were here at that time—I voted against its ratification. I feel myself entirely at liberty to say this much in reference to my own action upon this measure, after this lapse of time, without incurring the imputation of transcending any rule of parliamentary decorum or propriety, or of violating any injunction of secrecy upon our proceedings in executive session. I voted against the ratification of this treaty more than ten years ago. I have seen no occasion to change the opinion I then entertained of the character of the treaty, the partial, inequitable, one-sided character of the treaty in its operation. The results of its practical operation, therefore, have not disappointed my expectations; and in voting now, as I shall vote, for the proposition to give the requisite notice for its termination, I vote in accordance with the opinion I have always entertained of its character, as well as in obedience to the clear popular sentiment of the country unmistakably expressed, and in obedience to what I regard as the manifest interest of our own people. If, however, at any time hereafter when peace shall have been restored to our country, as all the signs of the time, I am happy to believe, indicate that it soon will be, another treaty of trade and commerce between these parties, the British provinces and the American States, shall be negotiated; a treaty which shall be really reciprocal in its character and operation between the parties; a treaty which shall be just and equitable to both contracting parties, I doubt not it will receive the favorable consideration of this body, provided the political relations between the two countries at the time shall be of a satisfactory nature, as I doubt not and trust they will be.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, gentlemen on this floor who advocate the abrogation of this treaty are not unmindful of the effect of calling by bad names a thing that we desire to kill and put out of the way, and the reverse, of applying good names to what we want to favor. I remember that in 1844 and 1845, when we proposed to steal a large province from Mexico, the friends of the measure called it "the reannexation of Texas;" all the speeches that were made to encourage that measure called it simply a proposition to reannex Texas. Well, sir, it was reannexed, and we are reaping to-day a little of the fruits of the policy of that reannexation. I remember, too, in 1846 there was a modification of the tariff law. Some gentlemen who were prominent in position then, and ambitious for the future, mounted that hobby, and they denominated the tariff which they wanted to repeal "the black tariff," and the Halls of Congress resounded with denunciations of "the black tariff." It had its effect; "the black tariff" went down because the blacks were not popular at that time. [Laughter.] Those who applied the appellation to it knew the fact very well, and "the black tariff" died of this color-phobia. [Laughter.]

Then my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. Wilson] reminds me—and I was coming to that—that a new party arose in this country who knew not the Joseph of American slavery. They called themselves the Republican party, but this word "black" had been so successfully used in killing the tariff of 1846 that it was thought its vitality had not quite gone, and its opponents put it on the Republican party and called it "the Black Republican party." The Republican party outlived that; it did not prove so fatal to them as it did to the tariff. They survived.

Now, sir, here is this reciprocity treaty; and when I express the opinion which I do in regard to it, it gives me pain to think that I am obliged to differ so widely from gentlemen whom I respect so highly. What are the disastrous effects that have resulted from this treaty? If you ask anybody he will have to tell you very much what the South Carolina man said about the tariff: "You cannot put your hand on anything particular, but it is the general result of the whole system, lowering the price of everything that we have to sell and raising that of everything we have to buy." It is styled "the so-called reciprocity treaty." I do not know that any alias has been applied to it; but gentlemen will not permit it to be called "the reciprocity treaty," but speak of it as "the so-called reciprocity treaty."

I know very well, or at least I am convinced in my own mind, and that is just as well as if I knew it, [laughter], that while it is impossible to apply the rules of political economists about the balance of trade to the commerce of a country, because there will always be very great exceptions, yet I think that the writers on political economy everywhere agree in this general proposition, though there may be, and undoubtedly are, exceptions, that a commerce where the exports slightly exceed the imports in the whole as a general fact is profitable to that country which has the excess of exports. Now, applying that general rule, I ask the attention of the Senate to a remark made in a report of the Secretary of the Treasury in a note of the operations of this treaty, which it seems to me is the best argument that can be made for it. I read from a note to the 29th page of a document entitled "Statistics of the Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the United States," &c., communicated by the Secretary of the Treasury March 12, 1863, and just printed:

"The reciprocity treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded 5th of June, 1854, went into operation in the trade with Canada, October 18, 1854; with New Brunswick, November 11, 1854; with Prince Edward's Island, November 17, 1854; with Newfoundland, November 14, 1855; and with regard to fish from all the provinces, on the 11th of September, 1854.

"The aggregate exports (inclusive of specie and foreign merchandise) to Canada and the other British North American possessions for the three years 1852-53-54, amounting to $48,216,518, exceeding the aggregate imports 113.4 per cent. The aggregate exports of the five years from the 30th of June, 1854, (which period covered the first four and a half years of the operation of the reciprocity treaty,) amounted to $132,893,752, exceeding the imports of the same period 41.3 per cent. The aggregate imports of the two years, 1860 and 1861, immediately preceding the rebellion, amounted to $48,914,314, exceeding the exports 3.2 per cent. In the year 1863, the first full fiscal year of the rebellion, the exports, amounting to $21,079,115, exceeding the imports 9.2 per cent.; and in the year ending June 30, 1863, the exports ($31,381,030) exceeded the imports 36.2 per cent.

"In the trade with the British North American possessions other than Canada, in the year 1851, the exports amounted to $40,085,783, the imports to $1,736,651. This commerce had gradually grown to double these amounts in 1860; the exports and imports holding about the same ratio, say the former about double the value of the latter. In the year 1863 the exports were $10,998,505, the imports $5,307,424. The Canada trade of 1851 amounted to $12,885,611, of which the exports were 61.5 per cent. In 1860 the total trade was $32,940,787, of which the exports were 43 per cent.; in 1863 the total trade rose to $39,096,365, of which the exports were 52 per cent. In 1855, the year of the greatest trade with Canada previous to 1863, the total was $38,371,438, of which the exports were 54 per cent."

Showing that the trade between this country and Canada, taking the general facts, comes up to the rule laid down by all politico-economical writers for a prosperous commerce of a country. It has been increasing, and the exports slightly exceed the imports. That is the state of the trade. I do not deny that you may point out here and there a fact or an article which goes to raise a different impression; but I believe upon the whole it is beneficial to the country, and to the whole country, because it is creating a market for our productions.

I appreciate entirely the convictions of the Senators from Vermont. I have no doubt that in the opinions which they have expressed they represent the convictions of their constituents; but I do not think that charity, not to say candor, compels one to assent to the proposition that although these views are honestly entertained they are either wise or judicious, because they, like all other men, may be mistaken. The Senator from Michigan says that the board of trade of Detroit do not understand their interests—

Mr. CHANDLER. Do not represent the State of Michigan.

Mr. HALE. It is true that the board of trade is not entitled to be heard on this floor as the representatives of the State of Michigan; but I take it that in all that relates to the interests of trade in the great city of Detroit, much the largest city in the State of Michigan, and the city that has had among all its other honors not only that of sending two Senators to this Chamber, but of being the residence of the Democratic candidate for the Presidency for some time [laughter]—that Board of Trade understand the interests of commerce in their locality. The board of trade of Detroit, as I understand, are explicit in the expression of their opinion in favor of the treaty, and they represent the aggregated opinion of the commercial men of Detroit, saving and excepting always the honorable Senator from Michigan; and since he has withdrawn from the active pursuits of commercial life and given his attention so exclusively to the great interests of the nation and of the world and of mankind in general and the conduct of the war in particular, [laughter], it would not be surprising if he, being so engrossed in these late pursuits, should have lost a little of that keen acumen which used to make him so successful a merchant; and it would not be strange if, while he has gone into these more enlarged spheres of action, some younger men, attending to smaller things, have come forward and are quite as competent to speak of the commercial interests of the State of Michigan as the honorable Senator at this time is, although he might have been more so some time since.

But the honorable Senator is mistaken in some of the facts which he has undertaken to give to the Senate. I know he entertains the opinions which he has expressed, because he has stated the same thing to me in private conversation. He has an idea that the legislation of Canada in relation to the tariff imposed upon our articles of export to that country has been to increase the duties since the treaty was formed. The Senator was not in when I made the few remarks which I did in my poor way yesterday; he did not listen to the figures which I read from the Secretary of the Treasury, wherein it is shown conclusively that the Canadian tariff upon the imported duty-paying articles has not varied three per cent. from 1850 to the present time, and that at this time, the difference is only about one half of one per cent., the average in 1850 having been 18.43 per cent., and being now nineteen per cent.; and instead of there being a tariff of forty-seven per cent., it never was up as high as twenty-two per cent.—not half what the honorable Senator thinks it has been. These are figures, not furnished by Canada, but by our own Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does not that average include the free list?

Mr. HALE. No, this is the average of the duty-paying articles. If the Senator will inform himself on the subject, and not trust to information from such second-hand sources as he has, but will go back to the fountain, he will find that he is mistaken and that I am correct.

Sir, Great Britain and these colonies are ready to receive us in the spirit of reciprocity, and they tell us that if this treaty is not reciprocal, they want to make it so, they want to enlarge it.

Mr. COLLAMER. They say they want to enlarge it rather than to have it ended. If it is ended we can then make a good one, if we make any.

Mr. HALE. Now I would ask the honorable Senator from Vermont, and no man has more respect for his judgment than I have, does he think that if it is desired by this country ever to have a reciprocity treaty with these provinces, the way to do it is in this manner, to abrogate and destroy the existing treaty?

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman hear my answer now?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLAMER. I observe that it is proposed by the chamber of commerce of Milwaukee, and, I believe, of Detroit, and the honorable Senator from New Hampshire seems to have the same view, to continue this treaty until it can be modified, with a view to making modifications and making it better. It does not seem to me that that is the part of wisdom. I may be obtuse also; but I think that when they have a treaty altogether beneficial to them, and we want to make another, if you please, more beneficial to ourselves, the way to get it is not to keep in force that which is beneficial to them. What inducement have they to make any other treaty while you are willing to let this stand? The proposition is to make a better treaty, and to make it out of the old one, and to let the old one stand as good when it is not good. It really reminds me of the Irish grand jury who decided that there was not a sufficient jail in their county, and that there should be a new one, and that it should be built out of the materials of the old jail, and that the old jail should be kept good for prisoners until the new one was finished. [Laughter.] That is just the proposition, to make a new treaty beneficial to us, to make it out of the old one, and, to keep the old one good (which is not good now) until a new one can be made. I cannot see the wisdom of that course of proceedings.

Mr. HALE. I am obliged to the honorable Senator, because he has not only answered the question, but told a good story, and in answering the inquiry he has done what a great many ingenious advocates and learned lawyers frequently do, and that is, beg the whole question to begin with. He has assumed that this treaty is favorable entirely to one side and unfavorable to the other.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman is mistaken. I understood him to say yesterday that he agreed that the treaty ought to be mended. Then it is not good; but now he says it ought to be kept until it is mended. My idea is that it ought to be ended because it is not good.

Mr. HALE. The Senator entirely misunderstood me if he understood me to say any such thing. I do not believe that it wants mending. I do not know but that it does; but because a thing wants mending, it does not follow as a natural consequence that the whole thing is bad, for I have seen the honorable Senator from Vermont introduce bills into the Senate again and again, and absolutely consent to amendments to his own bills. Why does he amend his bill? Why does he not kill the whole thing at once if it is bad? That is his argument. It is not a fair argument. The fact is that I said this treaty might want amendment; but even if I were to go so far as to say that I conceded that, it would be far from justifying the comment made upon that position by the honorable Senator from Vermont. But, sir, I say that in the answer which he gives to the question I put, he assumes the thing in controversy. I believe that this treaty has been wise and salutary, and highly beneficial to this country. I believe that under its beneficent operation a commercial intercourse from one million to forty millions has grown up, and that the conditions which the writers on political economy give to a prosperous commerce apply to our trade with Canada under this treaty, namely, that the exports slightly exceed the imports, and they are constantly increasing.

Mr. President, we may just as well take notice of things as they exist as to undertake to act on a state of things that we hope may exist. There is great excitement and there is ill-blood between this country and Canada and the provinces to-day. I do not say a thing here of which any gentleman is ignorant. We all know it. I say nothing about the origin or foundation of that feeling. I believe that on our part it is well founded, that we have cause of complaint against them; but I believe, and I think I have reason to know, that the Canadian government at this time are making strenuous, great, energetic, and unprecedented efforts to maintain good the national faith, preserve neutrality, and restore friendly feeling and keep up kindly relations between the two countries, and I believe that if we owe anything to the interests of humanity, anything to the interests of Christianity, which should govern the intercourse of nations, it is incumbent on us as a part of wisdom as well as duty that we strengthen the hands of our friends in that country, that we do nothing by which we shall lessen the influence which they have over the ignorant and the base and the wicked. But, sir, you repeal this treaty, declare that it is abrogated at once, and what do you do? You put an argument into the mouths of evil-disposed men in Canada, of those who are trying to stir up and excite bad feelings between the two countries; you give to them a blow with which they will strike down the influence of our friends who are doing what they can to put their government and country right. I think that such a blow at this time will have immense effect, and effect for evil and evil only.

If it is determined that this treaty is to be abrogated, I would prefer to postpone the matter until the next session of Congress. The notice will be in abundant season then. If you postpone it until the next session of Congress, the treaty will be abrogated then just as soon as if you pass the resolution now. While this state of things exists, why do you make haste to show to the people of Canada that you grab greedily at this opportunity of striking this blow at them? If your purposes are what they should be, and what I do not doubt they are, purposes that consist with the good of the nation and the best interests of the country, why not postpone the measure for twelve months? You can then do everything that you can do now. But if you strike this treaty out of existence to-day, I greatly doubt whether you will ever see another treaty or anything like it with the Canadian provinces.

What is going on there now? Efforts are being made, and I believe it is generally considered that they will be successfully made, to consolidate the four eastern provinces with Canada, and possibly all the other possessions in British North America into one federal government, and when that is done they will be a power upon this continent. In the State of Maine at the present moment, there are great efforts being made to connect the United States (and I think the aid of this General Government has been invoked in behalf of the measure) by means of a railroad with Halifax, in Nova Scotia. It is looked upon as a great national work, commending itself, I think, to the judgment of the Senators from the State of Maine, and everybody who wishes well to her interests. Last summer I had the honor of making an excursion down the coast of Maine, with a committee of the two Houses of Congress, and we had gentlemen from the State of Maine not connected with the congressional committee on board, and they entertained us constantly with maps and documents and references relative to this great international work to unite the provinces with the States by this internal railroad.

Abrogate this treaty to-day, and you just as effectually kill that railroad as would be done if an earthquake was to sink the interval between the two countries; the railroad dies, and it dies by our own hands.

Besides, sir, what else are they doing? There are great, gigantic efforts being made in the provinces to unite the commercial cities of the coast, Halifax, New Brunswick, and St. John, by an internal railroad outside of the United States, with the great national trunk railroad running from Quebec and Montreal to the West. By abrogating this treaty at this time, you destroy the road in which we have an interest, you destroy the hopes of this international communication, and you give an impetus, and a great impetus, to the other road which will exclude us entirely from its benefits.

Mr. President, there are a great many reasons why if this resolution should be passed it should not be passed now. There can be nothing gained by passing it at this session over next session, except the manifestation of what the Canadians will regard as a hostile feeling. There can be nothing else. There can be no good resulting from it. I will make one more effort, a slight one, perhaps it will be futile, for I see that the feeling of this body is all one way, and I regret it because I think it is wrong; I think the impulse is wrong; I think it comes from wrong motives that subtly, and I do not know how, have crept into the minds of Senators. I am disposed to ask, if the Senate will excuse me for a Latin quotation, Tantum animis caelestibus ira?

It astonishes me, sir. The motion I now make—and it is the last effort I shall make beside such an effort as is made by the magic influence of a vote—is that this joint resolution be committed to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHANDLER. I always listen with great pleasure to the very distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. I receive lectures from him always with pleasure, and particularly upon financial and commercial affairs. His long study of commercial relations and financial facts and the business interests not only of this nation but of the nations of the earth, have entitled him to deliver lectures, and I listen to them, as I said, with great pleasure, and I trust with great profit. I have been specially, particularly interested in this morning's lecture. There has been a clearness in his presentation of commercial facts and of business figures that is rarely witnessed upon this floor, and I thank the Senator from the bottom of my heart not only for having lectured me personally, but for having enlightened the Senate upon subjects upon which they have been presumed to be perhaps somewhat unenlightened, to wit, our foreign relations. I thought the Senator from Massachusetts made a very clear and lucid and full exposition of those relations; but I had not listened to the Senator from New Hampshire when I came to that conclusion.

The Senator from New Hampshire says that the board of trade of the city of Detroit, being at present engaged in business, being at present observant of the commercial relations, are better prepared to decide what are the interests of the State of Michigan than is the Senator from Michigan. That may all be so. I stated what I believed to be true, that the individuals of the board of trade were like all other individuals, they understand their own individual interests and they are working for those interests, and those interests are to continue the receipt of Canadian produce without regard to the effect that receipt may have upon the producing interests of the State of Michigan. I believe that to be the case now, and I not only believe, but I know, that they do not represent the interests of the whole State of Michigan, nor of any considerable portion of it; they simply represent their own.

One thing more with regard to the duties upon our exports to Canada. The Senator says the duties have not been raised one and a half per cent. I did not state that they had been. His statement refers to the duties on all our exports which are imported into Canada. I said that the duties on certain of our exports had been raised. I do not say that the duties on all our exports had been raised, but on those things which we manufacture and in which his own constituents are the most directly interested. I say they have not only raised those duties largely but they have more than doubled, and in many instances they have more than trebled them. The very moment Canada proposes a reciprocity treaty which is in fact a reciprocity treaty I shall be ready to meet her half way and make such a treaty; but this is no reciprocity treaty at all. This is a treaty by which we receive all the productions of Canada free, and by which she receives from us nothing that we manufacture or can export to her. Let her take our manufactures, in which the Senator's constituents are directly interested, upon the same basis as we receive her agricultural products, and I shall be ready to meet her half way, and even more than half way. Although the State which I have the honor to represent is not directly interested in those manufactures, she has the same interest in the general prosperity of the manufacturing States as the people of those States themselves. If the proposed British American confederation should be formed, I do not apprehend any combination against the United States. It is not for the interest of Canada to form a combination against the trade of the United States. I believe they will then see where their true interests lie, and will be ready, after having tried the abrogation of this reciprocity treaty, after a year or two, or perhaps before the final abrogation of the treaty, to make a real reciprocity treaty; and then I shall be ready to meet them half way in accepting it. I hope this matter will not be referred to the Committee on Finance, but that the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts will be adopted at once.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope this resolution will not be referred. It has been very fully discussed in the Senate, and I have no doubt Senators are now prepared to vote. For myself I shall vote for this resolution to give notice to Great Britain that the treaty will terminate a year from the 16th of March next. It is not a present abrogation of the treaty, as I understand it; it is a notice which is necessary to be given before the treaty can be abrogated, and the treaty itself requires that notice (which must be at least one year from the time when it can take effect) not to be given until ten years after the treaty went into operation. The ten years do not expire, as I understand, until the 16th of March next, and after that it requires a year's notice.

I shall vote for it in no spirit of hostility against the people of Canada or the government of Canada, or the people of Great Britain or the Government of Great Britain, but simply because I believe that our new revenue system, which has been forced upon us by the necessities of our position growing out of this war, absolutely demands that this treaty should be abrogated, or that it should be reformed in some measure, or our revenue is destroyed along the northern frontier to a very great extent; and because I believe that the treaty itself is not reciprocal; that the advantage is very much in favor of Canada and against the United States; and for the third reason that I do not believe it possible for us to make a new treaty unless we give the notice, for Great Britain is now perfectly satisfied with the treaty as it exists, and will not give the notice to terminate it, nor will they be open to negotiate a new treaty until they see that we have resolved to terminate it. When they see that we have resolved to terminate it, they will be open to negotiation, and perhaps by that negotiation we may not only cover this whole question of trade with Canada, but before the year expires we may cover all the pending questions between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. FARWELL. I trust that the resolution will not be recommended, but that a vote will be taken upon it at once, and I only rise to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that the feeling which has arisen between this country and the provinces has nothing to do with my vote on this question. The people of the State of Maine have been opposed to this treaty from its inception, and are opposed to it now. They have passed resolutions of their Legislature in opposition to it, and there has been no complaint of the people in any section of that State against those resolutions passed by the Legislature.

I have looked over the list of articles made free by this treaty. I have not examined the tables;

I think almost anything can be proved by tables of figures; but knowing something of the trade, of the industries of that country, I believe the only articles made free by this treaty which the British provinces as a whole do not have a surplus of, and which we have any to send abroad or ever had, are comprised in cotton, pitch, tar, turpentine, rice, and unmanufactured tobacco. All these articles, except the unmanufactured tobacco, are free the world over. They are articles the world wants. They are articles Canada would take from us free, reciprocity treaty or no reciprocity treaty. Upon the other hand, if you look over the long list you will find it is the very articles upon which the industries of Canada are concentrated, agricultural products, the products of her vast forests, grindstones, burr-stones, gypsum, coal, that are admitted here free of duty. It seems to me to be a treaty made expressly and for no other purpose than to promote the industries of Canada to the injury of the industries of the United States, and it is impossible for me to conceive how any treaty could be made, even if it was made for that express purpose, that should be more effectual in its operation upon the industries of the two countries.

Mr. CONNESS. As I intend to vote to give this notice and for the resolution, I will say a few words, and a few words only, rather in explanation of my vote.

It is true, Mr. President, that I am here representing in part a people not very directly interested in this treaty in regard to which we are about to act; but I feel, nevertheless, the general interest that is felt by the people whom I in part represent here in the public weal, in the prosperity of the industries of the entire country which becomes me, and becomes them, and therefore I desire to make some explanation in regard to my vote.

This treaty is called a reciprocity treaty. Now, sir, I think that that is really a misnomer. How you can make a treaty reciprocal between two countries lying contiguous to each other which have the same products, the same class of industries, I cannot exactly see. Subject the arrangement of that reciprocity to a treaty, or the mode furnished by a treaty, and you have simply an arrangement in which each party endeavors to cheat the other in making the agreement to be arrived at. That was the case here. It is very generally concluded and conceded that we have been cheated in this arrangement. I can see very well how reciprocity treaties might be made between countries having different climates, different productions; countries that produced very different articles, which articles were necessary to the consumption of the people of those different countries. I can see how they might be admitted by each other free of duty with advantage to each other, but that does not apply here at all.

Again, it is conceded and generally believed, as I think, that we have been worsted in this commercial arrangement; and since we cannot correct it in any other way than by giving the notice proposed, which reopens the question, resubmits it to arbitration and arrangement, if we are to have arbitration and arrangement, I am in favor of that process and of giving the notice. How shall we correct any of the disadvantages to us of this arrangement, unless we give the notice and reopen the question?

But, says the Senator from New Hampshire, take care; do not do that now; the public feeling is excited in the Canadas and in our own country and in Great Britain in reference to our national affairs and our international relations, and our friends in the Canadas and in Great Britain will be injured and reduced in their influence upon our national questions if we do this act, which will be interpreted by our enemies there as an act of aggression toward those countries and peoples. Mr. President, in my opinion the very contrary of that will be the result. It is not denied by the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Wisconsin, who have spoken elaborately on this question, that the treaty is of advantage to the Canadian people. That is not denied. It is claimed that it is a treaty of reciprocal advantages; therefore the Canadas are benefited.

Now then, sir, suppose that it shall be taken as an interpretation of this act of ours in Great Britain and the Canadas that we are offended at their conduct toward us; against what party in the Canadas and in Great Britain have we taken the offense? Is it against the enlightened and liberal friends that we have there, whom we appreciate, and who have accepted and performed the rule of justice toward us? Certainly not. If we feel offense at any party in the provinces and in Great Britain, it is against the governing power, it is against the power that has done acts of injustice against us; and if we take this action by way of vindicating ourselves, shall it not rather be held by our friends there that the abrogation of this treaty, and thus the deprivation of the advantages that it confers upon the Canadian people and these provinces, is the result of the injustice of the governing party in Great Britain toward us? And will not our friends in Great Britain and the Canadas be able to say, "This would not have been done in all human probability but for your overt acts of injustice toward the American people, who, in a spirit of enlightened liberality, agreed to let our products into the market of their great country while there was confessedly no reciprocity in the arrangement?" It appears to me that the advantage and the argument are all in the hands of our friends in Great Britain and the Canadas, and not in the hands of our enemies, sir.

But, sir, no man professes that we are governed by vengeance in this matter. It is a duty we owe to the industries of our country to give notice for the abrogation of this treaty, that we may enter, if it is to be rearranged, upon the question of rearrangement, and that the next arrangement may be more favorable or just to American interests than the one now in existence.

Mr. President, permit me to say here that I am no great advocate, and I doubt whether I ever can be, of the system of determining and fixing the industrial policies of the country by means of treaties. I mean taking out of the hands of the legislative and executive authorities of the country the means of establishing policies by arranging them in the form of treaties to last for ten years or through all time, no matter how prejudicial these treaties may be to us. I prefer rather that the countries of the earth, and we also, shall retain within themselves the power to fix their own policies so that they may adjust them from time to time upon the basis of the needs and necessities of their own people; for, sir, I do not believe that the millennial season has yet come upon the earth; I believe every nation pursues that which it thinks is its own best policy. Witness the policy of Great Britain upon the Pacific coast. While we are treated to this so-called reciprocity policy on the Atlantic coast by Great Britain and her colonies, we see a free port established by Great Britain at Victoria, on the Pacific, directly under our nose at San Francisco, where the industries of all nations abroad may send their products free of duty, and keep them there and make an English market to which consumers on the entire Pacific ocean, north and south, may come and buy and supply themselves. She proposes to make Victoria to the consumers on the Pacific what London is to the world now, by means of its capital, by means of its preëminence, and its long-continued preëminence, namely, a world's market, where every man on the earth who desires to buy anything, no matter what, may go to buy with a certainty of finding it there. So they are undertaking now to establish by means of another policy, that of a free port on the Pacific, an English market, a market to which the buyers may go and find what they want for consumption. England in this pursues what is her own best policy. Let us in regard to our interests pursue what is our own best policy.

I did not intend, Mr. President, to continue this discussion. I do not believe that what I have to say is necessary to change a vote, or that it could change a vote; I believe that the feeling here is pretty general on one side of the question; but I felt that in explanation of my vote I might submit these views in regard to the question, and particularly have I been incited to do it by reason of the claim set up that if we give this notice it is to be used as an argument against us in a national point of view in Great Britain. I think it will have the contrary effect, that our duty to ourselves demands that we shall give the notice, and that its effect can be nothing else than beneficial to us abroad.

Mr. WILSON. When this treaty was negotiated, it was believed to be for the general interests of the country, and in Massachusetts it was especially believed to be for our fishing, manufacturing, commercial, and railroad interests. I have ever been in favor of the treaty, and up to this time could never have been induced to vote against it. I am not clear now that it is not for the interests of the State I in part represent to let it stand. I am inclined to think that it is for our interest that the treaty should stand as it now does. For the interests of the whole country, I am of the opinion that it ought to be modified or perhaps abrogated.

On a question of so much importance as this, after listening to this debate, I do not like to vote against gentlemen who have studied the question so carefully; and I do not desire to give a vote here that may be supposed to be against the general interests of the country, and especially against the interest of my own immediate locality. There is with us, there ever has been, a very strong feeling in favor of the treaty. That opinion is now undergoing a change, I think, in view of its workings during the last three or four years. I know it to be the wish of some persons who have studied this subject and who have taken a great deal of interest in it, that we should propose to modify the treaty instead of abrogating it. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] thinks that to be a very poor mode of reaching the result we desire. Well, sir, suppose that instead of modifying it, when we give this notice we also propose the appointment of a commission to negotiate a new treaty upon a fair basis; would not that look friendly, would it not look as though we had acted for our own interest, and at the same time believed that a good treaty would be for the interest of both countries? Believing that, I have prepared an amendment in the form of a second section to this resolution, which I propose to offer whenever it shall be in order. I know that those who have the care of this measure and who have advocated it, have suggested that we need make no such proposition; that such a proposition would probably come from England; but at the same time, having always been a friend to the treaty, having made up my mind under the debate now pending to vote for its abrogation, I desire to offer an amendment proposing the appointment of commissioners to meet commissioners appointed by England to negotiate a treaty upon a proper basis. I feel, constrained, in view of the opinions I have always entertained on the subject and the vote I am about to give, to move that amendment, which I now do. It is to add to the resolution the following provision:

And whereas it is desirable that friendly relations should continue between the United States and the British provinces in North America, and that commercial intercourse should be hereafter carried on between them based upon true principles of reciprocity: Therefore,

Be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint three commissioners to confer with persons duly authorized by Great Britain to negotiate a new treaty which shall be reciprocally beneficial and satisfactory to both countries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) An amendment to the joint resolution is not in order at the present time, the joint resolution having gone to its third reading, and the question now being on the motion to commit.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose it would be in order to reconsider the vote ordering the resolution to a third reading, so as to allow an amendment to be received.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to reconsider will be in order after the motion to refer has been put.

Mr. COWAN. I rise to say but a single word. I am in favor of the proposition before the Senate; and I am in favor of it for this single reason, that I have discovered that by this treaty we have been deprived of our power of taxation over the products of our own country for revenue purposes, and I have therefore come to the conclusion that I would advocate its abrogation. That is all I have to say on the subject at this time.

Mr. RIDDLE. I desire to say but a word in relation to this question, as I voted in the other House against a proposition to abrogate this treaty and am now about to change that vote. Before casting my vote, I will say that I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire to commit this resolution to the Finance Committee, believing that the wisdom of that committee, in conjunction with the Secretary of State, may lead to a modification of the treaty which may be acceptable to both countries, may satisfy the Government of Great Britain, and be profitable to the United States. In case, however, that motion shall fail, and the proposition which has recently been made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] shall come before the Senate, I shall vote for it; and in the event of the failure of both, I shall have to record myself on the main question against my first vote in the other House and for giving the notice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not rise to discuss this question, but only to say that I think there is more of statesmanship in the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] than in any proposition I have heard connected with this subject. Our relations with Canada and the British provinces are very intimate and very important to both countries, and I am not prepared to say that we ought to have no special treaty arrangements regulating the trade between the two countries. I think we ought to have such relations. If the treaty which now exists regulating that trade is not such as it ought to be, certainly there is wisdom enough in the two Governments to so adjust it as that it will be just and fair to both parties. If this measure be referred to a committee, that committee may bring before this body some such proposition as is made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

I do not think, even if there were some objections to this treaty, if in its operation it were not altogether just to this country, that this is the proper time to abrogate it. There has been a good deal of folly as well as wisdom in newspaper and public assemblies' givings-out touching the relations between this Government and that of Great Britain. We are very jealous of every act on the part of Great Britain, and recently there has been much excitement touching transactions on the border. If just now we abrogate a very important treaty, the understanding cannot be very favorable to our interests. Certainly no Senator now desires any embarrassments between this Government and Great Britain. I have heard of men who are very valiant who say that we can fight the whole world, defy Great Britain, defy France; but suppose we can, is it wisdom to do it? I do not suppose that any action we may take on this question will bring about trouble, but it does not increase the securities of peace; that is certain. No Senator claims that. It opens questions up again which for the time being were settled. There are no commercial troubles that can come up between us and Canada while this treaty remains. I am not in favor of its abrogation just now, whether I may be in the end or not.

There is another feature about this treaty that I like. It provides to a very considerable extent for free trade between us and a neighboring province. I like that. I believe that the civilization of the world will come up to that standard which will secure free trade the world over. Let trade regulate itself, let each nation support its own revenue from its own people. I believe we shall some time come to that standard. The fact that Canada is a province lying just alongside our territory, is a reason why I like free trade between that province and our own country. The fact that this treaty secures free trade is a circumstance in favor of it in my judgment. I do not intend to discuss it. I shall vote for the reference. I shall be very glad to see that reference made, hoping that something will be done such as is suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, this debate has taken a very wide range, it seems to me. This proposition commends itself to me enough to influence my vote in its favor. I have been astonished at the course of remarks here. Senators have argued that this proposition would lead to difficulty with England, to bad feeling between us and that country. Why, sir, we have a clear right by the terms of the treaty to terminate the treaty by giving the notice, and why and how either the people of Canada or Great Britain should regard our giving the notice as an act of hostility to them I do not understand. It would be merely doing on our part what they agreed we had the right to do. I do not think it will lead to any such consequences as are apprehended by Senators. I cannot see how it can so result, inasmuch as we have a clear right by the terms of the treaty to terminate it by giving the notice. I suppose all we can say in reference to the matter is that formerly in entering into this treaty we made a bad bargain, and now we wish to get rid of it.

If the times now were such as they were when the treaty was negotiated, I should not regard it of very much importance either one way or the other. I apprehend that the great difficulty that has arisen in this case has arisen in consequence of our recent laws for raising internal revenue, and that is all there is in the whole case, I think. If there is anything beyond that I have not been able to perceive it. If things were now as they were when the treaty was made, I do not believe that I should vote to give the notice; but a change of circumstances has made it necessary, in my opinion, to terminate the treaty, and hence I am for giving the notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the passage of the joint resolution. Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILSON. Is this vote on the reference of the resolution or on its passage?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the passage.

Mr. WILSON. I understood it was on the reference; I had intended to move an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call will proceed.

The Secretary concluded calling the roll; and the result was—yeas 33, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkey, and Wilson—33.

NAYS.—Messrs. Buckley, Dixon, Hale, Hendricks, Hicks, Howe, Ramsey, and Van Winkle—8.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Carlile, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Saulsbury, Wilkinson, and Wright—8.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Its title was amended to read, A joint resolution providing for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854, between the United States and Great Britain.

EXPEDITION AGAINST WILMINGTON.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be directed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition against Wilmington, North Carolina, and to report the facts to the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 595) to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831.

MASSACRE OF CHEYENNE INDIANS.

Mr. HARLAN. The Committee on Indian Affairs have directed me to report a joint resolution, and to ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) in relation to the massacre of the Cheyenne Indians, was read the first time and ordered to a second reading. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to cause the suspension of all pay and allowances to each of the members of the third Colorado regiment, officers, privates, and employes, and all others engaged in the recent attack made on the Cheyenne Indians in their village near Fort Lyon, in the Territory of Colorado, under the command of Colonel Chevington, until the conduct of the colonel and the regiment, and all others engaged in that attack, shall receive the approval of the Secretary of War; and he is to cause all ponies, blankets, money, jewels, furs, and other property captured from the Indians, to be seized and held for the use of the United States, or for restitution to the Indians, if it shall hereafter appear that the attack was unjustifiable.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to the resolution being considered now.

Mr. WILSON. Let it be printed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to its being printed, but I should like a report from the committee about it. It is certainly taking pretty harsh measures to stop the pay of soldiers for doing what their officers ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution cannot be considered, objection being made. It will be printed as a matter of course, being reported from a committee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 12, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ELIOT. I desire to give notice that at the proper time I propose to offer an amendment to House bill No. 602, reported from the committee on the rebellious States. I ask leave to submit the same at this time, and that it be printed.

The reading of the amendment being called for, it was read at length. It proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert a section providing that no State engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States shall be allowed to resume its political relations with the Government of the United States until by the action of the loyal citizens within the limits of the same a State constitution shall be ordained and established, republican in form, forever prohibiting involuntary servitude within the State, and guarantying to all persons freedom and equality of rights before the law.

Section two provides that the State of Louisiana shall be permitted to renew its political relations with the Government of the United States under the constitution adopted by the convention assembled at New Orleans on the 6th of April, 1864.

No objection being made, the amendment was ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced a bill to fix the time for the election of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, which was read a first and second time; referred to the Committee of Elections, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN ANDREW RUSSELL.

Mr. HOLMAN asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files certain papers in the case of Captain Andrew Russell, an officer in the revolutionary war.

TREASURER'S OFFICE, BOSTON.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. HOOPER. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURNE] allow me to introduce a bill?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. What is the character of the bill?

Mr. HOOPER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to provide for the appointment of clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer of the United States, at Boston, Massachusetts, and to fix their salaries.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I insist upon my call for the regular order of business.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of the business in which the House was engaged at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] has the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask the indulgence of the House for a short time while I state as clearly as I can the reasons which will compel me to cast the vote I shall give upon this proposition. No question has produced more interest or caused more feeling in the country, save probably the war, than the question now under consideration. It is one that affects not merely a single section but the whole country. It is one which demands of each Representative upon this floor, not only serious consideration, but that deliberation which should characterize every one of us from every part of the United States.

It may be considered by some that the position I shall take to-day, coming from the region of country I do, having been educated and associated with the class of men I have, is a strange one. Yet, nevertheless, I feel it a duty that I owe to myself; I feel it a duty I owe to those around me; I feel it a duty I owe to my whole country, that I should lay aside all personal considerations, all past reminiscences, all personal interests, and devote myself alone to my country, and to my whole country. Nothing has surprised me more than the declarations of some gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, enunciating in bold and unmistakable language doctrines which, if adopted by the people of the United States and carried out, must inevitably result in the ruin of the Government; doctrines which had their origin more than a quarter of a century ago in the heated brains of southern fire-eaters, and which have brought us to our present deplorable and miserable condition.

While I admit, sir, the just rights of each individual State; while I would accord to each State in this Union all the rights to which it is entitled, and would maintain them to the utmost; while I would adhere to the letter and spirit of the Constitution in respect to all the rights guaranteed to each State, I conceive that there is nothing so obnoxious, so abominable, so ruinous to a republican form of government as that doctrine of ultra State rights which has been asserted recently upon the floor of Congress. It subverts all the principles of this Government; it is in conflict with the true principles of republicanism, and it brings us into a position into which we would not be brought otherwise—perfect desolation and ruin.

I admit, sir, upon the part of a people the inalienable right of revolution; but I deny the position assumed yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] that the right of revolution belongs to a people under all circumstances and at all times. In all well-regulated Governments, in all Governments that have had the true foundation, a constitutional basis which is recognized as valid, the right of revolution upon the part of the people does not exist except when that Government has become oppressive and despotic upon a portion of its people. The doctrine enunciated yesterday fell not more harshly upon the ears of the members of this House, nor more harshly upon the people of the nation, than that doctrine enunciated a long time ago by the great secessionist and State-rights man of South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun; a doctrine which has been obnoxious to the people of the country since it originated in the brain, not of a patriot or good man, but of one who, though a great man, sought the interest and aggrandizement of a State more than that of the country for which his fathers had suffered and bled and died; a doctrine which has produced rebellion, revolution, and war; a doctrine which has clad the great Government of the United States in the habiliments of mourning, and brought weeping around every hearthstone in the land. Yet with all the facts before us, in the light of truths which should make the heart of every man bleed to-day, men are bold and audacious enough to rise upon this floor and go a step beyond the odious position taken by other men in times gone by. And more than that, it is astounding that men upon that side of the House, who have been born and educated in opposition to Democracy, who have made it the object of their life-long antagonism, who have denounced it as detrimental to the best interests of the country, should now become the champions of State rights and advocate the principles maintained by the modern Democratic party.

Sir, the doctrine enunciated by a great statesman in 1832, that this is a Government of the people, is true to-day. This Congress emanated from the people; the Constitution emanated from the people; the States emanated from the people; and the people, not of Ohio, not of North Carolina, not of Kentucky, not of any other individual State, but the people of the whole country, have a right to control it as their best judgment may dictate; and when the people of this country see proper to alter or amend their fundamental law, whatever that amendment may be, if it is in harmony with that instrument itself and in accordance with the feelings and best interests of the people, he who dares proclaim the sentiment that it is not only the right but the sacred duty of a single individual State of this country to resist such an amendment when adopted, announces himself as a revolutionist now and forever, and deserves the execration of men who favor law and order in the land. When this Government was formed, it was formed not by the individual independent sovereignties; it was formed by a united people who had assembled in their representative capacity for the purpose of making a stronger and more perfect Union; and they declared that that instrument which was to be the fundamental law of the Government might be amended in the way their interests might dictate.

I do not, however, intend to debate the constitutional question; but I intend to lay down the proposition that it is the duty of the American Congress, under the present circumstances, to submit this amendment to the people, and that it is the duty of the people to adopt it; because, in my judgment, it was this isolated subject of slavery that produced the revolution or the rebellion; and only by getting rid of this subject can we give permanent peace and tranquillity to the land. While I have had all the prejudices concerning that institution that any man could have, while I have had all the education that was necessary to make me believe in that institution, and while, as an abstract proposition, I cannot now altogether deny the principles in which I was educated, yet when I view the present condition of the country, involved in rebellion and war, desolation and bloodshed throughout two thirds of the country, I lay aside those prejudices; I lay aside personal interest; I lay aside considerations of State locality; I rise higher than mere State interests, mere personal prejudice; I look to the whole country, and the greatest good of the greatest number of the people.

So far as my own State is concerned, and so far as the people of that State are concerned, allow me to say here, sir, that while that property in 1860 was valued at $107,000,000, it was confined to only one eighth of the population of that State. It has been reduced below $50,000,000 by the war, and yet there are only one in eight of the population of my State who are interested in the institution of slavery. And two thirds of that portion who are interested in the institution of slavery are of the meanest, the most designing, the most secessionist and rebels. I am not here to legislate for their benefit, for their comfort, for their reward, but I am here to legislate for their punishment, for their destruction, and for the salvation of the loyal people of my State. If I do that which takes from them not only their slaves but everything else they may possess to save the Union people of my State and give them the protection they are entitled to, then I have accomplished my duty as the Representative of the loyal people, and as a loyal citizen of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what may have prompted the feelings of my colleague from the Ashland district, [Mr. CLAY], in the charge he made the other day, that the whole of this legislation seemed to be directed by twenty-odd States against one loyal State—Kentucky. I do not know what feelings may have been in his bosom which induced him to throw such a shaft at the great loyalty of the northern people. He must have forgotten 1861, 1862, and 1863, and especially 1861. He must have forgotten that when we were in full possession of our property in slaves, when we were in full possession of our homes, when we were surrounded by our families, when we were surrounded by everything agreeable, and when we were a happy and prosperous people, it was not the North, it was not the vandalism of the North, it was not the propagandism of the North, it was not the abolitionism of the North, but it was the damnable secessionists of the South, it was the men who have his sympathy to-day, which threatened him and me, and tried by force to compel those he and I represented into the coalition to dissolve the Union. When we were in that straitened condition, when thus surrounded, where did our help come from? Where did our assistance come from? And who called for it? Did we not ask Illinois and Indiana and Ohio and New York, and all of the northern States to come to our help? Like patriots and men, forgetting local prejudices that had withheld them from action before, they marched in hundreds and thousands into our State, and across it to our southern boundary, and there stood as a mighty bulwark and saved us, not only our real estate, but our property in slaves. With the marching of two hundred thousand soldiers there has never been a loss of fifty negroes till 1864, under the enrollment laws of Congress.

Sir, I remember well when not only myself but every man on the other side of the House from the State of Kentucky who had been recognized as a Union man was a refugee from his home, a refugee because of that party which to-day is fighting for the institution of slavery, looking to its establishment, not only in the States where it was before, but in the States of the Southwest, and in the whole western country, pushing it even into the New England States. I know that they dared not stay at their homes. They dared not continue at their firesides. Yet they, by their action, by their votes, and their speeches, are giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the men whom they here denounce as thieves and robbers and plunderers. I cannot do it; I will not do it; for I well remember when this war began the sentiment was enunciated all over the country that partisan politics should be forgotten. Democracy was laid aside; Whiggery was laid aside; Know-Nothingism was laid aside; and we came together as one man, and Kentucky's patriotic sons stood by Massachusetts's abolition sons to battle for one object—the restoration of the Union. I intend to stand there to-day. I intend to maintain that position by word, by vote, and by action; and my people, the loyal people of Kentucky, I believe a majority of the people of Kentucky, will favor the adoption of this amendment.

Now, sir, Kentucky has never been an ultra State-rights party. It has never adhered to the Calhoun doctrine. It has repudiated the doctrine enunciated by Vallandigham. It has denounced the doctrine of Seymour of New York. It has denounced the doctrine of Seymour of Connecticut. It has always been opposed to these ultra doctrines. In the last election it did not indorse the doctrine preached to-day by the men on the other side of the House. It did not vote condemnation, in my judgment, of the action of the present Administration.

Now, sir, no man on the other side of this House from the Commonwealth of Kentucky that I have known or heard denies the right and power of the Government to make an enlistment of all classes of men for the Army. None of them have denied that such right exists under the Constitution. They have voted against it here because such a course, as they say, was not politic; and because it was "robbing" people of their property. But let me ask if every man from the North and the non-slaveholder of Kentucky has not been "robbed" of that which is nearer and dearer to him than the slaves are to any man who lives in Kentucky. Kentucky is a loyal State, and being such they should manifest their loyalty by giving whatever the Government demands, and he who would repudiate the Government and impede its progress, and assist the rebels because of the enlistment of negroes, is not a loyal man, and does not represent the loyal people of Kentucky.

Again, I believe there is not a man in all the South who, if the question were brought home to him directly, and he were to speak the honest sentiments of his heart without prejudice and without the surroundings which exist, would not acknowledge abstractly that the institution of slavery was an evil and a wrong. I have never yet conversed with a man in Kentucky or the South who has not acknowledged that the country and the State would be better off had it not been for slavery. Now, then, while I would have taken no action upon this subject before the rebellion, and would have left it to the people of the States to dispose of the institution as they thought proper, retaining or abolishing it; now that these men have plunged the country into a war for the support and maintenance of slavery, and Kentucky has refused to go into that rebellion and abide by the decision of those who have broken the Constitution, trampled the laws under their feet, and violated every pledge they made to the people, I believe it is time, under the power of the Government, and by the expressed will of the people, to give the strongest evidence of their patriotism and philanthropy by cutting up that institution root and branch, and as soon as possible. That would work a hardship upon some, I know, but in a struggle like this some are bound to suffer more than others, and to lose their property and their slaves. But because these things occur must we stop our efforts for the benefit of the Government, the maintenance of the laws, the establishment of peace, and the destruction of the rebellion? No, sir; I tell you that is not the spirit and the feeling of the people upon our side, while it may be the purpose upon the other side to rally around a party which is not in fact opposed to the abolition of slavery, but who intend to use this question as a pretext to defeat the real ends of the Government.

The South is itself for the abolition of slavery. The Governments of England and France would not under any circumstances recognize the independence of the South unless it is accompanied by the condition of the abolition of slavery, and the South would abolish it to-day if those Governments would acknowledge their independence. If the South would come forward and make that proposition in order that they might have their independence acknowledged, what effect would it have upon those foreign nations and upon the Government of the United States? We have been fighting for the freedom of all men and for the defense of a free and republican form of government. We have spent millions and millions of dollars and lost hundreds and thousands of lives for that purpose. We have said to the Old World that we are fighting for the maintenance of a free Government. We are fighting not only to restore the Union, but for the abolition of the institution of slavery forever. We intend to establish the great truth that man cannot hold property in man.

Now as long as we maintain that position, and by our legislation show to the old country that we intend to carry out that purpose, England and France will stand back, be quiet, and allow us to work out our own salvation. But suppose this Congress, by failing to pass this resolution, shall show that the millions of the people of the loyal North are afraid to act because of the single State of Kentucky, or because of the interest which a few men may have in the institution of slavery in the South, and the South comes forward and offers, as a condition of the acknowledgment of their independence, to abolish slavery. England and France will upon the application of the South admit the independence of the South in order that slavery may be abolished. But if this Congress comes up to this question as it should by passing this resolution submitting the question to the people, and the people adopt it, Europe will see at once that the Government intends in good faith to carry out the proclamation of the President declaring that these negroes shall be forever free, and that this shall be a republican form of government.

Now, sir, we do not claim in Kentucky that the salvation of this country or this Union depends upon the continuance of slavery. Nor has any Union man in the South claimed, as an essential element of the restoration of this Union, that slavery should be sustained. The State of Kentucky for a long time said, give us a Government with or without slavery, but now the time has come when the people should have it without slavery. And no vote of mine, no action of mine shall ever, under any circumstances, look toward anything else than the utter, absolute, unconditional abolition of slavery in the United States.

Sir, men talk about revolution and about the right of individual States to oppose the general laws of this nation. That individual opposition to national laws has brought us to our present position, and I say to gentlemen upon the other side of the House that if this amendment becomes the law of the Government of the United States the people of this country will maintain it. There are loyal men enough in the country to maintain the Government. There are loyal men enough in this country to put down the rebellion. There are loyal men enough in the country to bring back these seceded States into the Union, and establish over them law and order as they once had it. There are loyal men enough in this country to put down all insurrection and rebellion in the North; and gentlemen had better be careful how they speak and how they instigate insurrection and rebellion in the North. Men may court foreign intervention as much as they please, and ask France and England to interfere; they may point to the intervention in Mexico by Napoleon; but in my judgment, it is the conviction of my heart, there are men enough in the United States of America, not only to whip the rebels, but to whip all the insurrectionists North, and to defeat every European Power that may attempt to interfere between us and our republican institutions. We were born of a power greater than man. Our liberties, our Union, our greatness, and our glory emanated from and have been conducted by the Ruler of nations as well as the Ruler of men. We have progressed wonderfully, rapidly, beyond the expectations of all men and of all nations. We have been able to throw into the field not only a million men, but two million men, and in every town, in every city, in every county, as you walk the streets and highways, nobody is missed, scarcely any one is found from home. Let the tocsin of war but sound to-day; let it be known that England has recognized the independence of the southern confederacy, and that France co-operates with her, and a million men will spring to arms in the United States, and say, "Come on, England and France, and damned be he who first cries Hold, enough!" [Applause in the gallery.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have never had since this rebellion began the slightest fear that it would not be put down. We never knew but one country. Slavery in the South has kept us back. Slavery in Kentucky has kept us back. Ohio, a younger State, admitted into the Union long after we were, has outstripped us vastly; her railroads running in every direction; her manufactures springing up in every neighborhood; her turnpikes in every community; her towns and cities dotting the land all over. And so with every State North. How is it with Kentucky? With a richer soil than almost any of them; with a finer climate than almost any State in the Union; with more resources than any State in the Union; more coal, iron, copper, lead, salt, and timber than any other State in the Union; her coal and minerals remain bedded in her mountains; her timber stands on her hills and valleys; her plains uncultivated; no manufactures; no steam is heard or seen in any portion of her country; the hum of wheels is nowhere heard, but her people move along at a slow pace because alone of the institution of slavery. The time has come, and I thank God for it, when we will wipe that institution out, and Kentucky will stand among the proudest of the States of the Union.

Mr. Speaker, in the adoption of this amendment we do not throw upon the Government and upon the community a people, as has been represented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] powerless, illiterate, inhuman, and unkind in their disposition. They are a good people; they are an affectionate people; they are an industrious people when properly treated. But there is one idea in this whole system which has kept back the people of the whole South, and that is that one man, and one man alone, has held a whole country, almost—three, four, and five thousand acres of land—and worked it for his individual benefit with five hundred men; whereas if those five hundred men were free there would be five hundred tenements on the same property, and prosperity and advancement would be in proportion to the interest felt and realized in the community. All the northern or free States fully exemplify this truth. The States of the North have outstripped us in States South in manufactures, in machinery, in inventions, in schools, churches, and all that tends to make a nation great and good and powerful. Her people to-day are well fed, well clad, and prosperous; her churches attended, her schools filled, and all happy and progressive; while the South, filled with slaves, is naked, starved, and begging intervention on the grounds of humanity and benevolence. Sir, it is slavery, slavery, which keeps the South down, unprosperous, and undeveloped.

It has often been argued that white laborers cannot make cotton in the South; that the negro alone can make it; that God intended the negro for a condition of slavery, and fitted the South with a peculiar soil and a peculiar climate adapted to the negro laborer. Sir, it is not true. The most productive lands throughout the South are lands cultivated by white men in farms of fifty, forty, or thirty acres. The negro makes cotton, to be sure, but he wastes it. The white man makes it on small plantations, but in proportion to the land worked he produces a great deal more cotton than the negro does. It is said that the white man cannot live there. How does the millionaire who owns five thousand acres of land and five hundred negroes live there? How do his children and his friends live there? How do the eight million white people in the South live there? And how is it that the men of the South are such strong, stalwart, brave men as they have proved themselves to be since this war began? Sir, it is idle nonsense. Wherever in this broad country of ours there is land to be cultivated, there the white man can live, there the white man should live, and there the white man will live hereafter. I know that it is pleasant for a man to have a negro to work for him, to have a negro catch his horse and black his boots for him. No one enjoyed that more than I. But I have come to the realization of the great truth laid down in the good book, that by the sweat of man's brow shall he eat bread, and I have come to the conclusion that it is the best way for a man to fatten. I have increased, since the war began, in flesh and in wisdom.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that many on the other side will die hard; that when they yield it will be with bitterness in their hearts. But they must yield, and that very soon. My colleague from the Ashland district [Mr. CLAY] said the other day that the negro property in the State of Kentucky was worth $150,000,000 before the war began; and the tenor of his speech was that the anti-slavery action of the Government was directed against the interests of Kentucky. That State has only some twenty-five or twenty-six thousand negroes in the Army; my colleague has but fifteen or twenty. And what is the object of the opposition to this bill? It is to tie down the Commonwealth of Kentucky to the institution of slavery, with the hope that the young negroes may be more valuable after a while than the old ones were when the war began. The whole contest in the State of Kentucky to-day is over negroes. And if every negro were taken from the Commonwealth of Kentucky there would not be in thirty days a man in that State to raise his voice against the Government.

Now, why do I approve of this amendment of the Constitution? Why do I advocate it? Why do I make these declarations? It is because I want peace in the State of Kentucky; because I want the people of that State united; because I want the people of the country united. I know that the war began on the subject of slavery. The speeches in Congress indicated that. Mr. Davis himself declared it. The southern confederacy has so acted, and has so conducted all its correspondence and all its warfare, as to convince the world that the perpetuation of slavery was its leading object. The enlistment of negroes in the rebel armies has been opposed on the ground that the confederacy seceded from the United States in order to maintain the institution of slavery. If that were, and is to-day, the prime moving cause of the rebellion, I ask, in the name of common sense why, if you love your country, if you think that a white man is as good as a negro, is entitled to as many privileges as a negro, and if you think that this should be a Government, not of black men but of white men, you will not abolish slavery? Give the negroes their freedom and let them go where they please.

It is a question in Kentucky what shall be done with the negroes after they are made free. I know not what others may think of it, but my idea is, from the present condition of our military affairs, from the present status of things, that the rebellion is almost over; that there will be but few other hard battles fought, and that peace will soon be reestablished. When it is, then, with one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand negro soldiers we can march down by the southern coast into Mexico and say to Napoleon, "Leave this territory!" We will drive out the French and give that country to the cause of freedom and greatness, which will be forever an ally to this Republic, and its warm and unflinching friend. We can do it and we will do it. And Napoleon had better look well to his interests in Mexico, and Maximilian had better beware of the fate that awaits him.

You have heard the hue and cry of the fanatical pro-slavery men in the country, that these abolitionists in Congress, these northern men, these suddenly converted men from the South, who have come out in favor of the abolition of slavery, are in favor of miscegenation, amalgamation, association, and all that kind of thing. Now, sir, if I believed that there was in this country a man with so little sense as to believe that he would become the equal of the negro, notwithstanding the laws of this country, notwithstanding the protection he can obtain from Congress, then I would be willing to vote for a resolution to give him two medals, one to be worn before and the other behind, with the inscription upon them, "I am afraid of the negro, and here is my sign, stuck out prominently, that I am not to be considered the equal of the negro."

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there never was a sounder or a more philosophical truth communicated by any man than that of the President of the United States, when he wrote to Colonel Hodges, of Frankfort, Kentucky, that "if slavery is not wrong, nothing is wrong." Whatever may have been my opinion four years ago, I am not, so far as that opinion is concerned, to be questioned for the opinion that I entertain now. You may, if you please, look at our country in 1860—a magnificent and a beautiful country; one of happiness and of plenty; one where the people mingled and commingled together as people of one nation, with a common purpose and a common end.

But there was one principle in this Government which had more to do with the destruction of slavery than all things else put together. The Constitution declares that every citizen of the United States shall have equal privileges in every other State. That principle was denied to the whole North by the South unless the man adhered to the sentiments of the South. The very fact that slavery could not be discussed in the South killed it. The very fact that men from the North could not go to the South and speak their real sentiments induced the people of the North to become bitter toward the institution. Now, when this revolution shall have been closed, when this rebellion shall have been put down, my judgment is that that principle of the Constitution will not become fully established until the man from Massachusetts can speak out his true opinions in the State of South Carolina, and the man of Mississippi shall be heard without interruption in Pennsylvania. That is a glorious principle to fight for; and if we can accomplish it, with a united country, with a united people, with a people of one common purpose, we can all say that the war has not been in vain; that we have suffered much, that we have expended much, yet the great principle of the freedom of man has been accomplished by the war.

If slavery is not wrong, then what is wrong? It prevented a man from speaking his sentiments in the South. Go ask the South why they seceded, and the answer will be, to establish slavery. Go travel over this vast country and witness the thousands and thousands of new-made graves, and ask what caused them, and the answer will be, slavery. Go ask the tax-payer of this country why he is to-day called upon to pay such heavy taxes to support the armies of the Government and to conduct this great war against the rebellion, and the answer comes back to us from every one, slavery is the cause. Why are we wrangling in Congress to-day upon this subject, if slavery is not wrong? Why does the conscientiousness of every man in this country accept as the truth that slavery is wrong?

If it is right, if it is apostolic, if it is according to Scripture and of divine origin, then why are not men convinced of the truth of that? We all know that slavery will resist the Government, will fight against the Government, until it is destroyed and abolished from the whole extent of our country. And the man who now stands up for this obnoxious, and abominable, and nefarious doctrine of State rights is not the Union man that was found in 1860, or even the Union man found so far back as 1831 and 1832. Sir, I would give all the States their full rights. I would give each State and each individual all the rights that can be demanded from the Constitution, and I am thankful to believe that the principle which will be promoted and established by the prosecution of this war will be that this is to be one country, and one Government, for one people; a Government over all the States, free and independent States, but each State owing allegiance to the Government of the United States.

My opinion is that whenever a State undertakes to rebel, and to violate a single law of the United States, it is the duty of the Government of the United States to coerce that State, and force her to obedience, even at the point of the bayonet. That was the doctrine which was preached when our Constitution was formed. In the letter which was addressed, by the members of the Convention that framed that Constitution, to the people of the United States, asking them to adopt that Constitution, the very idea of consolidation was recommended as an argument in its favor, in order that we might have a strong and powerful Government. What is that recommendation?

"In all our deliberations on this subject we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety; perhaps our national existence. This important consideration seriously and amply impressed on our minds led each State in the Convention to be less rigid on points of inferior magnitude than might have been otherwise expected."

Now, sir, there was the doctrine of consolidation, preached by the fathers of the Government, by the framers of the Constitution. Those men believed that the power existed in the Government to execute all the laws enacted by the Government, and that when the Government was formed the States gave up everything connected with sovereignty; there was nothing of it left in a single State. Therefore the idea that a feeble, insignificant State has the right to oppose a Federal law, a law of the nation, is obnoxious and abominable, leads to war and destruction and anarchy. It is a doctrine under which we cannot maintain the Government.

Mr. COX obtained the floor.

Mr. L. MYERS. I hope that, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] will be allowed to proceed.

A MEMBER. For how long?

Mr. L. MYERS. For fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH. I regard the present condition of our country in a different light from many men who have spoken in this House. I believe that the union of the States is an inevitable result of the war. I believe that just so certainly as these States were united under the original compact between our fathers, just so certainly will they, by the blood which is now being spilt, be brought back to a stronger union, a more surely perpetual union, and a more glorious union than it was before. I believe that all the wrangling, all the disaffection, all the discord which has existed heretofore, making the North a section and the South a section, inducing war, civil war, bloody war, will be done away with forever. We are just beginning to realize and develop the resources of this country; we are just beginning to exhibit the richness of our soil; we are just beginning to show the rapidity with which our commerce is to be extended, and our population increased; for nothing is more remarkable than that, in the midst of this great and terrible conflict, when every man is expected to go in and assist in the war, our statistics show that the emigration from Europe is as great as at any preceding time. The whole world is looking upon the action of the United States to-day. England, France, Russia, and other nations have at one move emancipated all the slaves in their respective dominions. Kentucky and the other States of this Union in which slavery is maintained will, ere long, by a similar grand act, decree emancipation, so that there will be no slavery within the borders of our country. Then shall we be a great people, a proud people, a prosperous people. Then shall we go on and develop the resources of the country, and show ourselves a nation such as no people upon the face of the earth have ever seen before. Sir, this will be a country of civilization, a country of education, a country of religion, a country of refinement, a country of great men and great women, a country which will command the respect and admiration of the whole civilized world.

Gentlemen upon the other side say that we had better beware how we act; that we had better not be revolutionary ourselves; that it is impossible to produce harmoniousness between the North and the South. I tell gentlemen who thus speak that they know nothing of the South. They have been educated and trained alone in the North. They know nothing of the genius of the people of the South. Though those people have been deluded and led astray, and thus induced to enter into this great conflict, yet, when they shall have been once well chastised, when they shall have been brought back to the strict obedience to the law, they will be as acquiescent as any people upon the face of the earth. It is their character; it is their disposition. Men who would favor the separation of the Government, men who act to-day under the idea that the South is to be independent, might as well abandon that opinion, and promptly give their adhesion to the Government in all its actions for putting down the rebellion. Just so certainly as we sit here to-day, shall we ere many years have every State in this Union represented upon this floor as a free State, and as a part of this great Confederation. Louisiana and Arkansas stand knocking to-day; Tennessee will be here shortly. Other States are coming on. Georgia has manifested a disposition to loyalty that no one expected before. General Sherman marched through that State and occupied Savannah.

You may say that these defeats of the rebels, the occupation of all these places by our forces, mean nothing. Does the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] who spoke yesterday of our victories, mean to say that they accomplish nothing toward the restoration of the Union? That southern soil will never be given up, the country around Richmond will never be given up by our gallant soldiers. If it should be the disposition of any of the departments of the Government to yield that soil, they must first go and consult the soldiery who have marched over that land and made it sacred by every step they have made toward the subjugation of the South. Go and ask the army of the Potomac if they will yield the sacred battle-fields on which they have fought. Ask them whether they will retire and leave that Virginia soil to be a part and parcel of the southern confederacy, and each man who wears the uniform of the nation will point to a new-made grave and say, "Here lies my comrade; this land is made sacred by his blood and his bones; and it never shall be surrendered to traitors." Go to the soldiers of the army of the Cumberland, who were with General Sherman in his glorious march to Atlanta, passing through a country every foot of which was contested for one hundred and fifty miles, and ask those soldiers whether they will retire and yield that territory to the southern confederacy. No, sir; the proud soldiers of the West, the brave soldiers of the North, all the gallant soldiers of the Union will point to the last resting-places of their comrades and say, "This land has been made sacred by these noble deaths; it is ours; we will keep and maintain it, and here with God's help we will defend it or lie cold and helpless corpses."

We will never yield up this country. It is ours. We intend to keep it. We intend to fight for it; and if every man of our present armies is killed, if they are vanquished and driven back, we have a million men more behind who will rise up, take their place, and march down far South even to utter annihilation. We do not intend to give it up. We intend to bring it back. We intend to make it one people, one nation, under one Constitution, with one purpose, one common end, the glory of the nation, the glory of our people, the civilization of the land, the education and Christianizing of mankind. Then we shall have but one aim; all men shall be free; there shall be union, and there shall be no divisions and dissensions in the length and breadth of the whole land.

Sir, it should be the highest incentive to every American that we shall not act alone for to-day. Instead of being controlled by self-interest, instead of looking to the luxuries surrounding us, we ought to look forward to the myriads who are to come after us. He, indeed, would be a selfish man who would look alone to himself and for himself. We should follow the great and glorious example of our forefathers. They looked not alone to the present. They looked not to the morrow. No, sir, they cast their eyes far into the future, and they saw hundreds and millions of people occupying the country for which they fought. Therefore they were stimulated to make more sacrifices, to lose more lives, and spend more money in order to make them a free and independent nation. Shall we not lay aside these momentary feelings? Shall we not forget momentary luxuries? Shall we not look forward one hundred and fifty years and see millions of freemen, men who know no masters, and one free country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific under one Constitution, with the one motto of Union and liberty forever?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, when we left these Halls last year there was a prospect that the administration of the Government would have been changed by the election. The political conventions of the two parties met. The party of the Administration made this amendment of the Constitution a part of their creed. They went before the people claiming the power to abolish slavery by constitutional amendment. Nowhere did the opposite party take ground against the power; every where they took ground against its exercise. The convention which met at Chicago adopted their creed. It called for a cessation of hostilities, with but one view, a national convention, in order to reestablish union. Not giving up the principles laid down in the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798 and 1799, when moved by my colleague [Mr. LONG] in the convention, which, rightly considered, constituted a main foundation of its political creed, it laid them on the table on my own motion, as abstractions unsuited to the demands of the agonized country. Regarding peace as the great practical need of the hour, the convention waived all other questions to reach that. How? By the Constitution, in its fifth article, which provides that a national convention shall be called for proposing amendments to the Constitution. This proposition of the convention was at once our weakness and our strength: our weakness when misunderstood by the people, our strength when rightly interpreted. My colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] accepted that platform. In casting my vote for him, I knew that he indorsed it. He indorses it yet. If he had been elected to that office, which he would have graced so well, we might to-day have been appealing to Legislatures, North and South, and not in vain to two thirds of them, to call the convention at the will of the people. The North would have yielded and the South would not have held back. That my colleague and myself well know. In that august assembly the distinguished men from both sections would have been present. What would have been the scope of their action? What the subject of their debates? Need I ask? It would have been the settlement of all grievances, North and South; questions of debt, doubtless; questions of guarantee to State and municipal rights, doubtless; but beyond doubt, this vexata questio of slavery, this terribilis causa belli, and the agitations and legislation growing therefrom.

Mr. Speaker, I read this morning, with what truth I know not, that a commissioner is now in Richmond with the confidence and assent of the Administration, meeting, perhaps, a commissioner on the part of the confederate authorities; and the rumor is that they have agreed to call a national convention. [Sensation.] I know not whether there is anything in it. My friend from New York who sits behind me [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] says that there is not, and he is presumed to know more on that subject than I do. [Laughter.]

If, in the providence of God, such a convention were called or were now in session, and this question came up in a full representation of all the States, who would think of disputing its power to modify, change, alter, and abolish, either at once or gradually, by constitutional amendment, the institution of slavery? Not a man. While, therefore, in a state of war, and with nearly half the States in default and absent, I may deny the wisdom of acting either by the one mode or the other, pointed out for the amendment of the Constitution in this particular—I will not deny a power so essential to peace, safety, and sovereignty. No ingenious refinement or dazzling eloquence shall lead me to deny a power which may yet prove our salvation, when wisely used. Who upon this side asks me to shut the door in the face of such a saving power? Let him remember that while the power may now threaten to destroy, the power to save is forever bound up with it. The power that can create, the same can destroy. Under the ribs of death at the last moment this power may be invoked to create the heart and soul of union, and that, too, by the array of States in their sovereign capacity, as modified by their granted powers.

Do you tell me that such sovereignty can only guaranty, but cannot destroy property, either in man or beast, in land or house? If a convention of States can take jurisdiction to protect property they can to destroy. It is admitted that the States individually can do this. If by the Constitution they as States, all consenting to it, have provided a mode of doing it, what matters it whether it is done by them in their individual capacity or in their conventional capacity? Whenever two thirds agree to propose amendments and three fourths shall ratify, either by convention or Legislature, the proposition is "a part of this Constitution." It is the States that do this in the first instance, all according in making the amending clause; again by their convention in proposing; and again by ratifying. Therefore I join my colleague in singing hosanna to that principle of our government just denounced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] as so nefarious—the sovereignty of the States. I see here not one monster iron crown, like that of Lombardy, compelling, as from an omnipotent scepter, the subject States, but each of the States making for themselves a fundamental law or organic compact.

Even by this amendatory clause they pluck from their "round of sovereignty" each a crown jewel to form and decorate the Federal diadem. Each of the States, sovereign in their reserved spheres, drop their scepters before the Federal emblem, in all cases where, as in amendments, the Constitution is declared the "supreme law of the land."

Tell me not that this power is dangerous when left unlimited in the Federal head. All power is dangerous. It tends to abuse. This is no argument against its existence, only against its exercise. My colleague [Mr. C. A. WHITE] holds that the States can make him—now a free white man—a slave by local law. Is there a more dangerous power when exercised? It is worse than the power to create or destroy property. But he admits the power if its place of lodgment is only local. If, then, the States can do this by local law, can they not do it in any other way they choose? They can by the same power make him again a freeman. Nay, more; there may be possibly a greater guarantee in an enlightened land against his being made a slave by the votes of the States, all convoked in the mode prescribed by the Constitution, than in the separate action of the States unassisted in their organic work by the prudence of their brother States.

My colleague [Mr. C. A. WHITE] says the States are unlimited and absolute in their sovereignty, and therefore the Federal Government is not sovereign. I ask him to beware where this doctrine leads. But may not the States in their unlimited and sovereign convention, deriving their powers from the original consent of all, give up portions of their sovereignty, modify it, as Mr. Calhoun holds, by the amendatory clause? May they not thus speak the most potential voice of the people of the States in all affairs? It is the people of all the States who consent to amending the Constitution, and by a mode which allows two thirds of both Houses to propose the amendment, which is to be sent to the Legislatures for the ratification of three fourths. First and last and all the time, the States are the constituents of the Federal Government, and as such, and by their State action, they can create and they destroy. I am of the State-rights school so far as this question is concerned, and of the strictest sect.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the language of James Madison in the Federalist:

"That useful alterations will be suggested by experience, could not be but foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the Convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable, and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the General and the State governments to originate the amendment of errors as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other."

Again, sir, Hamilton says:

"For my own part, I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments which may, upon mature consideration, be thought useful, will be applicable to the organization of the Government, not to the mass of its powers; and on this account alone I think there is no weight in the observation just stated."

Mr. COX. The only comment I make upon the quotations of the gentleman from New York is this: Madison in the Convention opposed and voted against the proposition of Roger Sherman to except all internal police of the States from the amendments of the Constitution. The quotation is in harmony with his vote. For he only holds, as Judge Story holds, that the mode of amendment sufficiently guards the Constitution against mutability; and that the "amendment of errors" cannot be made without the concurrence of Federal and State governments, in Congress and in State Legislatures. He did not expect that fundamental changes would be made—only "alterations;" but he does not deny that there is any limit to the power. This is no authority against the power, but an argument for it. Mr. Madison holds to the power because he believes it cannot be abused, owing to the restraints placed by the Convention upon its exercise. Further, I know, from having read the private correspondence of Mr. Madison, published in this city by Mr. McGuire for private distribution, that he always held to the idea that the only mode by which a dissolution of the Union or a secession of the States could ever be legally accomplished was by this organic and all-powerful clause of amendment. He laid it down so broadly that it would even cover the remark I made the other day, considered so extravagant, that we might by the fiat of the States even build a monarchy upon the ruins of republicanism.

As to the quotation from Mr. Hamilton, I do not see its application. I am not prepared, without reading it carefully, to make a fitting comment. It strikes me that it does not limit the power of amendment. It is rather the expression of a strong conviction that all amendments will be and ought to be applied to "the organization of the Government, not to the mass of its powers," and that none others would be useful. I quite agree with the opinion. Now, with all respect, I appeal to my friend from New York, who belongs to the strict State-rights school of politics, and even stands so perpendicularly that many people believe that he leans backward, to consider the view of Mr. Calhoun upon this subject. I am sorry my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING], who has the volume, has not brought it here this morning. The quotation will be found in his sixth volume, page 36. In 1828 the South Carolina Legislature asked the opinion of Mr. Calhoun upon this and kindred subjects. In that declaration of political power, drawn up for his State, he teaches that the people of that State by adopting the Federal Constitution had modified its original right of sovereignty, and that by its consent in becoming a member of the Union, that power had been placed in the hands of three fourths of the States, in whom, he said, the highest power known to the Constitution exists. I do not give the quotation with that length and that emphasis which belong to it, but I will insert it in my remarks for the edification of my friend, who is a most earnest disciple of John C. Calhoun:

"In order to have a full and clear conception of our institutions it will be proper to remark that there is, in our system, a striking contrast between government and sovereignty. The separate governments of the several States are vested in their legislative, executive, and judicial departments, while the sovereignty resides in the people of the several States who created it; but by an express provision of the Constitution it may be amended or changed by three fourths of the States, and thus each State, by assenting to the Constitution with this provision, has modified its original right as a sovereign, of making its individual consent necessary to any change in its political condition; and by becoming a member of this Union has placed this important power in the hands of three fourths of the States, in whom the highest power known to the Constitution resides."

This extract is only strengthened by the context. I call on my friends of the State-rights school not to outdo their master, but if they would save the most valuable and most abused principle of our Government, not to strain its intent, and thus destroy it altogether.

I am sustained in my view, by the history of the Convention which framed the Constitution. Was this question considered by the Convention? It was. In Elliot's Debates, volume five, page 357, it appears that General Pinckney "reminded the Convention that if the committee should fail to insert some security to the southern States against an emancipation of slaves and taxes on imports he should be bound by his duty to his State to vote against their report." Again, when the report was made, this clause of amendment came in on the 15th of September. It was discussed by Sherman, Morris, Gerry, Mason, and Madison. Mr. Sherman did not like the mode proposed, for fear it would, by three fourths of the States, do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether, or depriving them of their equality. Colonel Mason thought it dangerous and exceptionable. Mr. Madison defended the present clause. Mr. Sherman moved to annex to the end of the article a further proviso, "that no State shall, without its consent, be affected in its internal police, or deprived of its internal police, or deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." Mr. Madison opposed it. It was lost—three to eight. Then Mr. Sherman moved to strike out the fifth article altogether. That too failed. The article was then further amended by the existing clause, that "no State shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate." (Elliot, volume 5, page 352.) Thus it passed.

The argument from contemporary history is therefore conclusive. The intention of the creator is the best criterion as to the character of the creature. Here we have it, not only implied by the absence of an exception, but by the positive disallowance of it by the Convention. That intention was to limit the amending clause only in two particulars. This one before the House is neither of the two.

My opinion on this matter of construction is drawn from unexceptionable teaching; not alone from Judge Story; not alone from Calhoun. No man can teach me a different lesson until I forget the history of the Constitution. The platform of my party, and the philosophy of its founders, teach me the same thing. In the language of that platform of many years, adopted last at Cincinnati and Baltimore, I "maintain before the world this great moral element in a form of government, springing from and upheld by the popular will, which seeks not to palsy the will of the constituent;" and that is, that the Federal Government is one of limited power, derived solely from the Constitution and the grants of power made therein; that its powers ought to be strictly construed; and if upon such construction found therein, to be strictly pursued, with all the vigor of their constitutional sanctions.

Finding this clause of amendment in the Constitution, with no doubt upon its features, I must bow to its supremacy. Even though I may regard it as clear and unquestionable, and admit the power in its fullest expression, I may yet claim that its exercise is dangerous and inexpedient. If it were a doubtful power I would not think of exercising it, but since it is clearly granted I shall consult my own judgment upon the merits of the proposed amendment.

If then it be an exercise of an admitted power, why not confine the discussion to proving the unwisdom of its exercise? For two reasons:

I. I believe that the argument from lack of power to amend is weaker than the argument against its expediency. It is a settled rule of logic that a fallacy, used in a good cause, gives your opponent the advantage of apparent success in the conclusion of the argument. I do not propose to give this advantage to the advocates of this measure. Believing that the power exists, I am bound to follow the example of my colleague [Mr. PENNINGTON] and place my vote upon the reasons which weigh most in my judgment.

I find that the learned commentator, Judge Story, regards this power of amendment as both useful and important. His reasons are radical. He says, page 678:

"It is obvious that no human Government can ever be perfect; and that it is impossible to foresee or guard against all the exigencies which may, in different ages, require different adaptations and modifications of powers to suit the various necessities of the people. A Government forever changing and changeable, is indeed in a state bordering upon anarchy and confusion. A Government which, in its own organization, provides no means of change, but assumes to be fixed and unalterable, must after a while become wholly unsuited to the circumstances of the nation; and it will either degenerate into a despotism, or by the pressure of its inequalities bring on a revolution. It is wise, therefore, in every Government, and especially in a republic, to provide means for altering and improving the fabric of Government as time and experience or the new phases of human affairs may render proper, in order to promote the happiness and safety of the people. The great principle to be sought is to make the changes practicable, but not too easy; to secure due deliberation and caution; and to follow experience rather than to open a way for experiments suggested by mere speculation or theory."

Upon this philosophy he considers this power of amendment; finds in its mode of exercise sufficient checks against its abuse; but even if abused he finds that it is better as a measure of safety than if the powers were limited. In his judgment there are no limitations upon its exercise except those specified; and the claim to abolish the internal policy of a State is not an exception.

These reasons for the clause of amendment are the reasons why the power is so extensive. The mode of amendment was thought to be so guarded as to prevent any unrepudiated or monarchical amendments which would substantially change the genius and scope of the Federal system of delegated powers. It is, nevertheless, unlimited, except in the two particulars specified.

This power of unlimited amendment is an element of democracy. It has been the characteristic of our democratic institutions that our ancestry, however prudent and wise, did not tie the hands of the children nor shackle their liberties by laws so irrevocable that no mode of change was allowed. In our State constitutions this power of amendment has been and is being exercised almost every decade. Why? On the principle of Jeremy Bentham, (Benthamiana, page 220,) that at each point of time the sovereign for the time possesses such means as the nature of the case affords for making himself acquainted with the exigencies of his own time. With reference to the future he has no such means. He thus argues against the transfer of the Government from those who possess the best means to those who possess the least means of information. Shall the past century rule the present? No, not unless they are better informed or feel more interest in the future generation than in their own. Why should we of the nineteenth century tie up the hands of the twentieth? Why should the dead forever rule the living? Is a tyranny inexorable because it is established in the past? Is a law immutable because made by the fathers? If the law be despotic who then shall reverse it? From these general principles he deduces the reason why I choose to argue this amendment rather upon its unwisdom than upon the lack of power to make it. "It is only," he says, "when the law is mischievous that an argument of this stamp will be employed to support it. Suppose a law a good one it will be supported, not by absurdity and deception, but from its own excellency. A declaration that this or that law is immutable, so far from being a proper argument to enforce its permanency, is rather a presumption that such a law has some mischievous tendency."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if our polity, which leaves all domestic questions to the State, be wise, as I think it is—eminently wise—not because it was made in 1787, but because it is suited to 1865, and our condition now as well as then, why weaken the argument for its continuance by discussing its irrevocable nature? Why not build its defense on its intrinsic excellency? Why not then from this fortification thunder your rifled artillery? Why, if it be so wise, exhaust your fulminations in trying to prove that we have no power to change it in the mode prescribed?

It is in the light of these democratic truths that I read the fifth article of the Constitution. I construct my argument upon the perennial beauty, exquisite symmetry, and enduring perfection of that system which reserves to the local communities their local interests, the very genius of all permanency, the very element which secures us against that homogeneity so dreaded by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] the happy accord of diverse interests, E pluribus unum, many as the waves in variety but one as the sea in unity, stars upon one constellated ensign, each differing in glory, but upon the field of blue all emblematic of the harmony of the Federal system springing out of the "brotherly dissimilitudes" of the mingled States! It is upon this foundation that I would seek, by reason and not by authority, to erect the argument for its preservation against radical change.

Does it follow, as my friend from Iowa suggested, that I weaken my argument against the amendment because I argue its demerits while acknowledging the power to amend? I may object to an alteration in my house, especially if it disturbs the foundation and general plan; but must I change it fundamentally because I am the proprietor and have the power? If it be true that a denial of the power is apt to be regarded as an apology for a mischief, do I not strengthen the argument by discussing the mischief? The mischief to be apprehended in this instance is not the abolition of slavery. It is the abolition by this amendment of our peculiar form and structure of Government. The argument which I desired to hear and meet should be directed to this point. Who cares, sir, whether slavery die or live, when the question is, "Shall the form and substance of our Government perish?" Show me that the Government will perish or be imperiled if this amendment is not carried, and I will vote it though all the devils in the South and North should confront me with their wrath! Show me that by voting against it I facilitate the reestablishment of the Government in all its integrity, and my vote shall be against it.

Mr. KASSON. I rise in order to ask the gentlemen if at this point, as well as anywhere in his argument, he will permit me to call his attention to a suggestion he made before, and which seems to have been touched upon by his last point more clearly than elsewhere; and that is the charge that the tendency of this amendment is the destruction of the form and substance of our Government. The form of government we all understand; and even he will not contend that this amendment changes the form.

Touching its change of substance, I presume he alludes to the charge he made the other day of its effect being a centralization of power. Am I right?

Then I wish to ask him upon this point—that we may not be misled by a misapplication of terms—to explain what he means by such centralization. I will say what I understand by it. When I read, the other day, an extract from a letter of the original Convention which formed the Constitution, and unanimously adopted by them, this phrase occurred in it, "Consolidation of the Union," as the great object of the framers of that system of government. Objection was taken to it by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] but I take it in its length and breadth; and I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the distinction between "consolidation" of the Union and the "centralization" of the Government. Centralization means when you take the power from the State and give it to the United States. But when you take it both from the States and from the United States there is not a particle of centralization of power. That is what this amendment does.

Mr. COX. Before I get through I will meet the statement of the gentleman. I believe this amendment, if carried out, will have a tendency toward consolidating power in the Federal head. Whatever it may be termed, I am opposed to compounding powers in the Federal Government. Whether the powers of the Federal Government be united in one department, or consolidated in the Union, I would decentralize such powers, take them from the Federal center, and distribute them among the States and the people. If you consolidate or centralize powers here, you endanger by the excess of power the substance and form itself of our Government. The form will soon change to conform to the substance. But I will make that clear as I progress.

II. Another reason for discussing the question of power is, that it is the most valuable gift from the States to the Federal Government, if it be not an express reservation of power in the States. Perhaps, as both Federal and State Governments take part in the amendment of the Constitution, the power to amend is both a reserved and a delegated power. Whatever it is, it is so valuable that I cannot surrender it. Not now. If ever peace comes, it will be through its exercise, upon this very question of slavery. I regard that Government with a constitution which has not the liberty of amendment as lacking the means of its own conservation. Such an amendment is a safety-valve, or governor, upon the engine of State. A State without it is in perpetual danger of violent revolution. Such an amendment is a peaceful, legal, and salutary revolution. It is the beauty of our system of written constitutions that, like machines, with a principle of compensation belonging to them, any irregularity may be corrected without breaking the machine or impairing the movement. Such powers of change save the State from such terrible red-handed revolution as that now upon us. Rufus Choate once described, as if he foresaw it, the present revolution "as a great sea lifting itself, with darkened sky, and not very imitable thunder; a tempest which overturns and successfully resists the existing public authority, arrests the exercise of supreme power, introduces by force, or by resort to a primary right of nature, a new, paramount authority into the rule of the State." Had this bloodless and legal revolution by amendment of our Constitution been wisely exercised upon this very subject of slavery, as Crittenden, Douglas, ay, even Toombs and Davis, insisted in 1860, we would not be fulfilling so sadly the magnificent picture which Choate painted of tempestuous and fratricidal strife!

Sir, when the statesmen of 1860 sought to exercise this power upon this subject of slavery, I gave my voice and vote for it. I know nothing now, but the fear of being misjudged by partial friends about me, that should deter me from again asserting the power which, with my colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON,] I then assumed. He bravely resists the popular current to defy its exercise now, I humbly do the same. But this I will not do, discard my own words and throw aside a once cherished principle of government because its present exercise may be an outrage upon the sense and patriotism of the country.

When I first came to this Congress with my colleague we came under the odium of "pro-slavery;" we came defending the position of Douglas, that Congress had no right to interfere with slavery, under the Constitution, in States and Territories. We claimed non-intervention as both wise and constitutional. Again and again, when anti-slavery and pro-slavery zealots demanded congressional action, we said, "No, no; there is no power under the Constitution to abolish it or protect it. It is local, not Federal; State, not national. If you would touch it, either to extend or limit, abrogate or institute it, first change the Constitution." Again, when discussing questions connected with the power of a State over the subject of black immigration, I have denied all power to Congress, to the President, to the Army, to interfere with this subject, because it was not so written in the Constitution. I said, "Amend that instrument first if you would thus break down the incontestable rights of the State under the Constitution in such matters." Denying ever the propriety of its exercise, I have never heard the power denied. Am I to ignore the power because foolish fanatics may rule in its exercise? Mr. Buchanan, in his message of December 4, 1860, proposed to save us from war by slavery amendments, which he called peaceful and constitutional remedies. Who objected to the exercise of such remedies for want of power? No one except gentlemen opposite, who declared it to be monstrous and illegal, against the laws of God and man, fundamental and irreversible.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a single question at this point. He refers to the message of President Buchanan. I desire to ask him whether the recommendation of Mr. Buchanan did not apply to the question of slavery in the Territories, and not at all to the question of slavery in the States?

Mr. COX. The recommendation of Mr. Buchanan, which I hold in my hand, applies to both. But even if it is only applied to slavery in the Territories, the question of slavery was the subject-matter of the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. If I recollect aright, at the time, the question of the disturbance of slavery in the States was not agitated at all. It was denied by the Republican party that they intended in any way whatever ever to interfere with the question of slavery in the States; and it was only the question of slavery in the Territories and beyond the limits of the States which was agitated in Congress at that time. It is since the inauguration of this Administration that the question of the abolition of slavery within the States has grown up in the country.

Mr. COX. That will do for the gentleman; because I have the recommendation of Mr. Buchanan upon that subject here. It is more authentic than even his good memory. It is as follows:

"An express recognition of the rights of property in slaves in the States where it now exists or may hereafter exist."

As my valued friend will perceive, this was not a question of the abolishment of slavery. It was, however, a question which touched, through a constitutional amendment, the institution of slavery in the States. The gentleman says the recommendation was confined to slavery in the Territories, and did not reach that in the States. He will perceive his mistake. I am not anxious to raise a discussion with my friends upon this side of the Chamber, but I am entitled to be consistent with the record I have made for eight years here. I have always claimed the right to pass upon the slavery question by an amendment in pursuance of the fifth article of the Constitution. I have sought only to make its exercise judicious.

The abolitionists only declared in 1860 against "any express recognition of the right of property in man in the States where it now exists or may hereafter exist." Then the abolitionist made the argument of my colleagues, [Messrs. ASHLEY and PENDLETON,] They denied the power. It was and is so easy to argue against the power to do a thing which we do not like.

When Mr. Buchanan, referring to the amendment clause, proposed to extend its operation to protect this right in the Territories until admitted as States, and a like recognition of the right of the master to his escaped slave, who objected? Who? Not my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] and myself. For though we might have agreed with the decision of the Supreme Court in Dred Scott's case, we desired such principles established in the fundamental law. Why? Because it was recommended, to use the language of that day, "as an explanatory amendment which would forever terminate the existing dissensions and restore peace and harmony among the States." Those who desired not to terminate our troubles, or to keep peace and avert war, denied the power to enslave or to recognize slavery. This side of the House labored, O how nobly, but how vainly, to have the compromises of that dark hour written with a pencil of light on the organic law, by the unimpeached power of amendment, that North and South might dwell in accord forever.

Again, on the 28th of February, 1861, in the hope of allaying the fears of northern men, a joint resolution was passed with my colleague's [Mr. PENDLETON's] sanction and vote—yeas 133 to 65 nays—providing for an amendment in the mode prescribed by the present joint resolution, as follows:

"ART. 12. No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which shall authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State."

This was voted for by South and North—Douglas, Crittenden, Pugh, Bocoock, and Hunter. What did it mean? I do not ask what was its intention as a remedial measure; as a bill to quiet title; as a peace measure. It did two things: first, it assumed to speak by amendment on a domestic question; secondly, in the very substance and body of it, it recognized, without dissent from a single voice, the power to amend by abolishing slavery in States, and it sought to checkmate that power by adding it to the exceptions of the fifth article. It was as if it said, "Congress, by the mode prescribed, may propose amendments which shall be valid as a part of this Constitution, provided no amendment shall be made as to the abolition of and interference with slavery." Truly my colleague was right in requiring, as a peace measure, such an expression as an exception to the general power of amendment. He knew the old maxim of construction, "the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another." As the Constitution had excluded two subjects from amendment, and had failed to exclude the abolition of slavery as sacredly unamendable, it follows that the power to abolish was given in the general grant. But the argument drawn from my colleague's former vote or opinion is not conclusive, except upon him, and only upon him upon the frailties of all arguments, that, once in favor of a thing, he should always be in favor of it. I shall be the last to press the ad hominem upon him.

I need not recall to the House the propositions of Mr. Crittenden or their tenor. In the preamble their object is stated. They were intended to allay "dissensions concerning the rights and security of the rights of the slaveholding States." They proposed to do this by constitutional provisions. Above the latitude of 36° 30' slavery was prohibited; south it was recognized and protected. They denied to Congress the right to abolish in the District and in the States where the United States had jurisdiction. They proposed to protect members of Congress and other Federal officers in bringing their slaves here, to protect the inter-State slave trade, and to pay for fugitive slaves in certain cases. As if this were not enough to show the power over this subject by amendment, and because these statesmen of 1860 knew the power existed to abolish slavery in the States, they provided:

"No future amendment of the Constitution shall affect the five preceding articles; nor the third paragraph of the second section of the first article of the Constitution; nor the third paragraph of the second section of the fourth article of said Constitution; and no amendment shall be made to the Constitution which shall authorize or give to Congress any power to abolish or interfere with slavery in any of the States by whose laws it is, or may be, allowed or permitted."

Thus they strove to make the lines of slavery irrevocable by amendment; to forever preserve the three-fifths representation of slaves and the provision for the return of fugitive slaves. Who questioned the power then? Not my colleague. Not a man on this side in Congress then or now. Oh! it was then to be used for a patriotic purpose; for salvation, and not for destruction. But is it less a power? Am I to give up the sweet shine of the sun because it may breed malaria? Am I to surrender the benignant element of fire because it may consume as well as comfort? Am I to be driven by the accidents of war or the vicissitudes of time to change my opinion of the Constitution and its powers? Abusus non tollit usum. I will cling to the power, and make my argument, when I choose to make it, against its abuse.

Again, the peace convention sent its proposition to Congress, inhibiting any amendment of the Constitution on most of the subjects connected with slavery above recited. They were offered in the House on the 1st of March, 1861. I remember well that I was detained from the House by illness. I was not here to vote for them with my colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON,] but his name is enough. I find it there, asserting these powers under the amendment clause—which he now denies—while you, Mr. Speaker, together with my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY,] along with the secessionists, treated them as unworthy of your sanction. Why? Because you were not actuated by the genuine patriotism of my colleague before me, whose love of the whole country led him to defy the taunts of secessionists and the jeers of abolitionists, and to march boldly up to the exercise of the power now asserted by my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] in one case and denied by my other colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] in the other.

Gentlemen have heard of the committee of thirteen. It consisted of men of every shade of political opinion: Messrs. Powell, Seward, Collamer, Bigler, Hunter, Toombs, Davis, Rice, Crittenden, Douglas, Wade, Doolittle, and Grimes. They agreed upon no plan. But many plans were proposed, and all under the amendment clause. Do gentlemen tell me that these propositions were unconstitutional? Were they usurpations of power never conceded? Strange that Mr. Hunter, the biographer of Calhoun, and Mr. Davis, his follower and disciple, did not discover it! Strange that Mr. Hunter should have proposed that Congress should pass no law in relation to slavery, except by the consent of a majority of the Senators and Representatives of the slaveholding and non-slaveholding States, thus yielding the power, with qualifications! Can this be yielded and yet the power over slavery in the States be above all amendment? Or must my colleague take refuge, as he did, in a higher law? Strange that Douglas should have proposed to punish conspiracies against slaveholders and their property!

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 16.

Strange that Davis should have proposed, by amendment of the Constitution, to recognize slavery as property in transit or sojourn!

But why weary the House with these recitals. They prove this, that the strictest sect of southern statesmen acknowledged the power by amendment over this subject and sought to exercise it, and sought further by amendment to prevent its exercise when it might impair or destroy their institution! Is my colleague a better State-rights man than Jefferson Davis? Or, to drop to the other extreme, does he, nunc pro tunc, join my other colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY,] who then denied and yet denies the power by amendment to establish slavery as unrepugnant? It was with some amusement that I listened to my two colleagues [Messrs. PENDLETON and ASHLEY] yesterday. How adroitly the Democratic member thought to catch the Republican! How he pled him to admit the power to establish slavery! How shrewdly my colleague over there evaded! On the other hand, members on the other side sought to entangle my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] with some of his former votes! How both shirked the issues presented in their former positions! while the humble member who now addresses you, sir, sat complacently consistent amid the melodramatic performance, ready to admit the power of amendment unlimited to change the fundamental law, under the guards and modes prescribed, even to the establishment of slavery or a monarchy—of entire freedom or entire democracy. Both of my friends deny this as extreme and heterodox; the one because he would have nothing but limited republicanism as the form of our Government. That is my Democratic colleague who is so republican. The other because he would have nothing but sweeping democracy as the basis of our Constitution. That is my Republican colleague who is so democratic. The wishes of each color their present arguments as to the power. When slavery is to be guaranteed, my colleague from Cincinnati believes with me in the power to amend, and my colleague from Toledo denies it. When it is to be abolished my colleague from Toledo believes with me in the power to amend, and the other denies it. Both deny the power when slavery is to be affected, and both admit it when slavery is to be affected. I have them both on either side and each on both sides and both with me. I accept the power in either case as they claim it, but go beyond them both; for I stand on a principle. They are enamored of the power only when one case is absent. Like the fond lover of two maidens, they love the one "when the other dear charmer's away." [Laughter.] Yet they are unfaithful to both because they are so attached to either—unfaithful because they are not upon the principle. I can extend to them, (as a member from New York used to say here in olden times,) from the serene Olympian heights of my cerulean consistency, the eternal principle of republicanism and democracy which will reconcile them both to duty and the Constitution. [Laughter.]

Both my colleagues hold that to concede the power and exercise it in certain cases is to subvert the Constitution. If slavery is to be protected, the member from Toledo believes the Government destroyed. His only appeal is to the sword of revolution. Never would he consent that the power to amend should include the power to establish slavery in Ohio; never. He would sound the tocsin of inevitable resistance. If slavery is to be abolished by the same power, the other member blows the trumpet and beats the drum to revolutionary defiance. Both march to the same discordant music, when if they would take Calhoun, Story, or their own practice and principles, only changing the time of their application, they would find in the granted power to amend, an unlimited authority as to the matter and only limited as to the mode. I follow no such counsels. "You can change, but cannot subvert, by amendment," says my friend before me. Ah! pray who is to judge of what is subversion and what is change? If I leave the question to my colleagues, one will regard the guarantee and the other the abolition of slavery as subversion and not merely change. My colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] derives, unconsciously, his language from the South Carolina declaration of independence of December 24, 1860. It says:

"Observing the forms of the Constitution, a sectional party has found within that article, establishing the executive department, the means of subverting the Constitution itself."

Again:

"The sectional combination for the subversion of the Constitution has been aided by the elevation of the blacks."

The other member [Mr. ASHLEY] regards the denial by South Carolina of President Lincoln as the legal President as the very essence of subversion, and the denial of franchise to the blacks as subversive of republicanism. He therefore strikes out the word white in his reconstruction bills. Where gentlemen so eminent disagree as to what is subversion and what is change or amendment, where is the tribunal to decide? I answer, in Congress by two thirds of both Houses and in the States by three fourths of the Legislatures, and in the intelligent sovereignty of the people of each State who have, in limine, consented to this mode of amendment.

Believing in the power of amendment, I am willing to judge of the wisdom of the propositions before I vote to submit them. This discretion is a part of the discretion of the Congress. It is one of the checks which the minority have against the passion and malice of the majority. Nay, more, the checks against the exercise of this power unwisely are threefold: first, two thirds of both Houses must agree to propose amendments; or second, two thirds of the Legislatures must propose a convention; and third, after all that, the Legislatures or conventions of three fourths of the States must ratify. Judge Story elaborates this argument, and makes it unanswerable as against the dangerous abuse of the power.

Thus restricted the power of amendment is unlimited. No danger of monarchy; no danger of the King of Dahomey, which startled gentlemen when I used his majesty to illustrate my extreme position; no danger of striking down the republican form of government without a contest in which the States, three out of four, are to be consulted for ratification, and two out of three members of both Houses of Congress shall inaugurate the measure. Am I answered that it is undemocratic to allow this power? I answer, it is only undemocratic to disallow it. All the States concede it, and the State-rights man is content. All the people in the several States pass upon it, and the Democrat is content. Democracy places its trust in the intelligence of the people and the sovereignty of the States; and thus trusting, even in the valley of the shadow of national humiliation it fears no evil.

While, then, I concede the power, do I fear that the amendment may pass and become a law in spite of all the guards thrown around it? I do not fear any open march toward monarchy or despotism. I fear in time of war and the passionate strife it begets that this amendment may radically change the Government; that it may by force, fraud, by indirection, and by an unfair count of States, be made to change our polity. Because such amendments, interfering in home affairs by the Federal power, tend toward consolidation, I am against them. My colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] himself will admit that an amendment may be made even to the very system of government, legitimate in its operation, which may do this. You can amend the Constitution as to the distribution of its powers so as to place the judiciary and the legislature in the hands of the Executive. Thus you compound power. When these departments are made one—whether that one be legislative, executive, or judicial—as they may be by amendment, it is Jefferson's definition of tyranny. Who will doubt the power of amendment to do this? And yet who so base as to propose it here, or, if proposed, to ratify it? It is by these delusive moral radical reforms, reaching into home affairs by the Federal power, that I fear most the destruction of our Government. Hence I am jealous of the exercise of the power to amend, and especially in this instance. But if the people of the States even choose to abuse their power to amend and destroy their Government; who can say them nay? If they are foolish enough to call in a king, or connect religion with State, or declare polygamy the corner-stone of public liberty, who shall deny them, provided they follow the mode they themselves have ordained to make the organic law?

A gentleman [Mr. KASSON] thought I conceded away the argument against this amendment when I admitted the power. He argued that, the power admitted, there was nothing left but to send it to the States. If the power exists, am I not, as one of the two thirds of Congress, to consider the wisdom of its submission? Thus only I comply with the Constitution. Why require Congress to pass on it if I am to yield my judgment in proposing, to the judgment of the ratifying power? Do we come here to play the puppet? I will pursue strictly the power given, and if I think best let the elector in the State or the member of the Legislature judge. Congress chooses; we are sent here for that purpose by the people; and they would account us faithless not to judge of the proposition in the first instance before we sent it to the State for approval.

When efforts were being made in the winter of 1861 to avert secession and war, I had a definite idea of the inexpediency of abolishing slavery in the States. So had the Republican members. The whole House, on the 11th of February, 1861, on the motion of Mr. SHERMAN, "resolved that neither the Congress of the United States nor the people or governments of the non-slaveholding States have the constitutional right to legislate upon or interfere with slavery in any of the slaveholding States." This was a reaffirmation of the Republican platform of 1860. All agreed that it would be wise to let it alone as the Constitution gave no right over it. But the power to amend the Constitution was not questioned then. The graceless inexpediency and suicidal unwisdom of congressional action only was affirmed by the resolution. The unconstitutionality of such action was declared. Upon that we upon this side have stood in denying all power over the subject by emancipation and confiscation, either by the military or civil power, by the executive or the legislative. We trace to the breach of this resolution, reaffirmed in the Crittenden resolve in July, 1861, the prolongation of the war by the division of the North and the union of the South. The amendment now proposed is the culmination of this suicidal policy. If the steps to it are unsound what can be said of the consummation?

While, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I have differed with great diffidence from my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] as to the power of amendment, and have pursued thus far a different path from his, I shall reach the same end; or rather, my humble way leads into the high way in which we shall travel together on the inexpediency and anarchical character of this amendment. I join with him, natives as we are both of the free State of Ohio, in repelling with honest scorn the imputation that because we disfavor this amendment we favor slavery or rebellion. We are not unused to such irrelevant and contemptible insinuations. Together, in 1856, we came to these Halls. We are all that is left of the Democratic members of the Thirty-Fifth Congress.

Mr. PENDLETON. And we are not left.

Mr. COX. True; like stormy petrels, tossing upon the angry waves of sectional agitation, we are at last overwhelmed in the flood of fanaticism. We are the last roses of the Democratic summer. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Speaker, although we may not be upon the same branch, we are still together upon the same rose tree. [Laughter.] It would illly become us, in the close of our career here, to differ upon anything except upon the most vital urgency. In one thing we have never differed, and do not now; we have neither discussed slavery nor encouraged rebellion. Certainly we have never favored slavery or its agitation.

Speaking for myself, slavery is to me the most repugnant of all human institutions. No man alive should hold me in slavery; and if it is my business no man, with my consent, shall hold another. Thus I voted in 1851, in Ohio, with my party, which made the new constitution of my own State. I have never defended slavery; nor has my party. Members have defended it, as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD;] others have attacked it, as the other member [Mr. ODELL] on my left; but neither of these have conformed to Democratic practice and precedent. When I say this I but speak the tenets of the Democracy assembled in convention for the States and for the Union.

Is it answered that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BROOKS] has this session defended the institution? That gentleman did not pretend to speak for the Democratic party. Indeed he does not profess to speak for it, but rather as an old-line Whig, having now his views independent of all machines of party. The last session he held that slavery was dead. Gentlemen should not object to his eulogizing the deceased, but by so doing he does not intend, nor does he if he intends, commit any Democrat to his moral convictions.

What I desire is, not that gentlemen should debate the question of slavery or anti-slavery, but of the power we have over it, and of the propriety of its exercise either now or at any time.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] asks, "Do you gentlemen from the free North intend to battle for slavery after the South is ready to abandon it?" We answer, "Principiis obsta." Mr. Davis and his coadjutors may do as they please; we do not battle for slavery nor against it. We cling to the system of our Government "as the bond of unity in the past, as the only bond of union in the future, the only land lifted above the waters on which the ark of Union can be moored. From that ark alone will go out the dove blessed of the Spirit, which shall return, bringing in its mouth the olive-branch of peace." Not for Jefferson Davis; not for Virginia; but for our own States, our own Government, do we stand on the principle of self-government over State affairs, and against the use of the power of amendment to change that principle. My doctrine is better stated than I can state it, in the speech of Judge Thomas, of Massachusetts, from which I quote, when he says:

"Whoever else may falter, I must stand by the Constitution. I am not wise enough to build a better. I am not rash enough to experiment on a nation's life. There is to me no hope of our country but in this system of many States and one nation, working in their respective spheres, as if the divine hand had molded them and set them in motion. To this system the integrity of the States is as essential as that of the central power. Their life is one life. A consolidated Government for this vast country would be essentially a despotic Government, democratic in name, but kept buoyant by corruption and efficient by the sword. Desiring the extinction of slavery with my whole mind and heart, I watch the working of events with devout gratitude and patience. By no rash act of ours, much less any radical change in the Constitution, shall we hasten the desired result. If in the pursuit of objects, however humane; if beguiled by the flatteries of hope or of shallow self-conceit; if impelled by our hatred of treason and desire of vengeance or retribution; if seduced by the insidious wiles of foreign influence; we yield to such change, we shall destroy the best hope of freeman and slave and the best hope of humanity this side the grave."

The Federal system, unamended, embraces three classes of functions: first, those concerning the relations of the United States to foreign nations; second, those concerning the relations between the States and their citizens respectively; and third, certain powers which, though belonging to the same departments of Government, to be useful and effective must be general and uniform in their operation throughout the country. In none of these functions do we find this power over domestic slavery. The effort is now to make its abolition a function of the national Government. If you begin upon this domain where is the limit to the exercise of this plenary amendatory power in domestic affairs? Should we amend the Constitution so as to change the relation of parent and child, guardian and ward, husband and wife, the laws of inheritance, the laws of legitimacy? Because we have the power must we seize it? Where will it end, when once begun? Is it, then, a question of slavery, or is it a question of home freedom in home affairs; a State question in State affairs; a police question, concerning municipal and not Federal institutions? If we may change the relation of the blacks to the whites in one respect, may we not in another? May we not change the Constitution to give them suffrage in States in spite of all State laws to the contrary? Must we not amend the Constitution to allow the importation of freed blacks into States like Illinois and Indiana? Must we not declare all State laws based on their political inequality with the white races null and void? If you begin with this amendment, what laws are to be passed to carry it out? Do you not break down, by this amendment, the distinction between the spheres of the State and national Governments, which is characteristic of our system, as old as our Union? If so, are we not asked to change the system, rather than to abolish slavery?

Hence, I do not place my suggestions about this measure on any ground of the immutability of the Constitution, or of our peculiar system. I place my vote against it, because the system it would change is a good one, made in wisdom and to be perpetuated for the future happiness of the people. If the system of internal police over State matters is not of value, discard it altogether. Deny to Ohio her right to declare who are born in wedlock, and who may inherit estates; deny to us the right to have our home courts for home justice; centralize all power here, in one head, and make the federation a despotic tyranny, and thus you will have the "gospel of anarchy, the philosophy of dissolution." I may admit the wrong of slavery. It may be heinous in sight of God and man. I may admit the power by amendment to abolish it. I am a radical Democrat and believe in amendments of all organic laws in pursuance of the mode prescribed. I may admit that such an amendment would impair only for a brief time the checks and balances, the very substance and essence of our federative system, and yet I ask you, on the other side, whether, if I believed that this amendment would place an impediment, insuperable to the restoration of the Union, I ought to vote for it? If I believed that the rebel authorities would not meet us in convention, and would stand out against the Union on their independence, I might consider anew what I ought to do. I have no authentic information in that regard. So long as there is a faint hope of a returning Union I will not place obstacles in the path. I will rather illuminate, cheer, and clear the pathway to the old homestead. If I believed, Mr. Speaker, that peace could be restored with the Union by the abolition of slavery, I would vote for it. All I do and all I forbear to do is to save our imperiled Government, and restore our priceless Union. Show me that that will be the result, and I will vote for your amendment. But, as it stands to-day, I believe that this amendment is an obstacle to the rehabilitation of the States. So believing, I cannot give my vote for it, nor would any honest patriot ask me to give a vote for a measure which I believe would bring about an eternal separation of the States of the Union.

But if it is determined in the South, as it seems to be, that rather than fail in independence, slavery shall go, I for one, as a Democrat, shall be ready to reconsider my resolution. The party to which I belong loves the Union as dearly as the South loves slavery. If they can let slavery go for independence, the Democracy can for the sake of the Union. If the South refuses to meet us in convention and abide by its arbitrament, then there is no hope for slavery. If the South obtain independence it will be by freedom to the slaves and their enrollment as soldiers. If they do not obtain their independence, between the collisions of the belligerents the institution will be gone, and then it matters little what becomes of this amendment, so far as its own peculiar subject is concerned. So far as the Union slaveholding States are concerned, they are rendering this amendment useless. Missouri yesterday almost unanimously voted to abolish slavery. Maryland has already done it, whether by force or freedom it is not now my purpose to inquire. Kentucky will be enforced to do the same. What remains? Little Delaware. She had in 1860 eighteen hundred slaves, and the enlisting agents have mostly sold them out to this humanitarian Government for soldiers, costing $150 apiece in Delaware, and selling for $1,000 in New York! Surely Delaware will soon be free!

It may, with some propriety, be urged that slavery is already dead. It has the seeds of speedy dissolution. The blows of war are breaking down its panting, exhausted body.

If, then, as it is said by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] slavery is dead, what is the object of this amendment? That distinguished gentleman told us the other day that, like Pharaoh and his hosts, the South had rushed with slavery into the Red sea of war, and that slavery was destroyed. Well, if that be the case, if slavery is dead, where is the necessity for invoking this extraordinary power of amendment? My friend from New York [Mr. ODELL] who also spoke so well in defense of his views, said that although it was dead he wished to give it a constitutional burial. I am not much of a biblical scholar, but I believe that we have no authentic record of the fact that after Pharaoh and his hosts were destroyed in the Red sea the children of Israel, after their destruction, met together upon its shores, in grand convocation and, after listening to Aaron and the other orators, passed resolutions somewhat like this amendment, to wit:

Resolved, That neither Pharaoh nor his hosts, except as a punishment for crime whereof they shall have been duly convicted, shall hereafter exist within the jurisdiction of the children of Israel. [Laughter.]

What would be thought of the children of Israel for passing such a resolution after the decease of Pharaoh? My friend from New York [Mr. ODELL] belongs to the new and kind dispensation, and would give the deceased slavery a constitutional burial. What would have been thought of the children of Israel, after they had fished out Pharaoh's dead body, if they had proceeded solemnly to give to it a constitutional burial? [Laughter.] Hence this amendment, according to the argument of gentlemen on the other side, amounts to nothing. It is a mere brutum fulmen. It is only the register, in other words, of what the war power with its blows is accomplishing, day by day. If gentlemen opposite really believed that slavery was dead they would not bring in this amendment. They do not believe it. But there are men on that side of the Chamber who will not favor a restoration of the States until this amendment shall have become an organic law. Therefore it is they that pertinaciously press this matter, even while negotiations are going on for the return of the States to a national convention, and for the return of peace and fraternity among the States.

Is it said that this amendment is needed to anticipate the South, and thus secure the smiles of civilized Europe? I trim my votes for no such delusive gales. The Powers of Europe will not be less eager to discover our Republic in the event of abolition by us than now. The philanthropy of Europe is very problematical. Let us take care of ourselves. Let us preserve the form and functions, and thus the strength, of our Government; and the unity of our States will be as hard to break as the ridges of our everlasting mountains!

"Our Union is river, lake, ocean, and sky; Man breaks not the medal when God cuts the die!"

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crimes in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution (S. No. 96) to postpone and prevent the sale, for less than their appraised value, of certain Indian lands in Minnesota.

Also, that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution in relation to the ventilation and improvement of the Halls of Congress; in both of which the Senate asked the concurrence of the House.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY—AGAIN.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I can well understand and fully appreciate the argument which my friend from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] advanced on the floor of this House yesterday, contending that there was no power in Congress to pass this resolution. Had that power existed, in the estimation of my friend, I have no doubt, from what I know of him and from the tenor of his remarks, that he would have given the resolution his hearty support. I am, I confess, somewhat surprised to-day that my other friend from Ohio [Mr. Cox] has taken the opposite ground, and that while he admits that there is the power in Congress to pass this resolution, he denies that it is expedient to do so. I regret to find, sir, that a man who has always lived on northern soil, a man who ought to, and who perhaps does, love the Union, the whole Union, and nothing but the Union, as I do, should be unwilling to have Congress pass a resolution which, if adopted by the requisite majority, would blot out from the face of this Government the only relic of barbarism which impairs its fairness and beauty.

Sir, in discussing the question, I do not deem it becoming or useful to descend to the acrimony of party spirit. The power of Congress to pass this resolution depends upon the construction given to the Constitution itself. The policy of passing the resolution just now, in the present condition of the country, is one as to which gentlemen may entertain differences of opinion. I shall devote myself first, for a few moments, to a discussion of the question of the power of Congress to pass the resolution.

Our Government when first established was an experiment. It was breaking away from established forms and theories, and launching out upon an untried if not an unknown sea, with no chart of the reefs and shoals which might be encountered, and with nothing but the light of reason to mark out its course. It is true that republics (so called) had arisen, grown in resplendent effulgence and power, and gone out in premature decay.

Greece, under a free Government, had shot like a brilliant meteor across the sky, illuminating the whole heavens, astonishing the world with her power and culture, and disappeared. Rome, under a similar system, had been the mistress of the world, and in eloquence, poetry, and all art excited the admiration of the ages, and left only a name in history. It was left for our fathers to determine the question of the power of the people to govern themselves. Driven from the old hearthstone, and believing that there could be a Church without a bishop, and a State without a king, they sought to establish a form of government adapted to their condition and in accordance with their principles. At first they established little democracies governed by the people, and having no power or adhesion independent of the popular will; but as they increased in population and area and independent organisms, it became necessary for the mutual safety to form themselves into some sort of a general Government; and the Articles of Confederation was the result of their deliberations.

At that day nothing so shocked the judgment and sensibilities of our fathers as the centralization of power in Government. They seemed to have deemed that the cause of all their former woes.

In 1778 we find that the thirteen States entered into a league of friendship or federation with each other for their common defense, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other against all force offered to or attacks made upon them or any of them on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretense whatever. In other words, it was a treaty between the thirteen independent and sovereign States for mutual protection.

In order to avail themselves of the benefit of such treaty or league of friendship, it became necessary, for the convenient management of the general interest, that a body should be constituted called a Congress of the United States, wherein each sovereign State should be represented and measures be adopted for mutual benefit and protection. In this Confederation each State retained its freedom, sovereignty, and independence, except so far as powers might be delegated to the United States. In fact the States were sovereign, and might, as many supposed, at any time withdraw from the Confederation and annul the league of friendship or treaty of alliance.

In a short time it became apparent that in the Articles of Confederation there was no thorough bond of union. There was nothing to cement the people and the Government and bind the people to the Government. Hence we find that in 1787 not the States but the people of the United States formed a Constitution, and set forth its purpose as follows:

In the formation of that Constitution two great parties were represented and more or less at issue. One party contended for the sovereignty of the States, independent, except in certain yielded rights, of the General Government. The other that sovereignty must exist in the General Government, that the power of government must rest in the Government itself, but that certain rights and powers might be reserved to the States, to be exercised in accordance with and under the Constitution.

The Constitution as we have it to-day, the charter of our liberties, which I respect as much as my friend from Ohio, and would violate no sooner than he, was after much discussion and many compromises of opinion adopted. But in it, to satisfy all sides, the power of amendment was provided for, and was really limited, so far as its restrictions now go, to one particular, and that was that no State shall be deprived of its senatorial representation equal to any other State, except by its own consent. As I have before intimated, our Government when the Constitution was formed was an experiment. It was foreseen that experience alone could determine whether too great power was vested in the General Government, or too many rights reserved to the States. It was also foreseen that in either event the power would not be yielded with a willing hand. Man loves power, and as Governments are but the aggregation of men, they too love and hold it if possible. Hence two modes whereby Congress might call upon the people to amend the Constitution were devised. In case it should be found by experience that too many powers or dangerous prerogatives were reserved to the States, then Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses should deem it necessary, should propose amendments to the Constitution.

And on the other hand, whenever experience might show that too great or dangerous powers had been granted to the General Government, then, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, Congress should call a convention for proposing amendments. Herein we see the honesty and wisdom of the framers of our Constitution making so judicious and perfect an adjustment that neither the General Government can usurp powers to itself dangerous to the liberties of the people nor the States retain powers to themselves which endanger the safety of the Republic. But, sir, it was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] yesterday that there are certain matters where three fourths of the Legislatures of the several States may amend the Constitution and in others not, and when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. YEAMAN] asked my friend from Ohio to point out the exceptional cases he declined or neglected to answer.

Was it generous in my honorable friend, [Mr. PENDLETON], the exponent and leader of a great party, to preserve such dignified reticence? Could he not have told us, who are earnestly seeking after light upon this subject, wherein the Constitution, (outside of its own exception,) cannot be amended?

Sir, his love of truth, and his sagacity as a lawyer, overcame his zeal, and hence he made no reply. Sir, I admire the gentleman's ability, and commend him for his discretion. Sir, there is but one limit in the instrument, and that is in regard to the senatorial representation, and neither you nor I, in my judgment, can say so far shall this power go, and no farther, unless we pronounce the Constitution itself unconstitutional.

The several States became members of the Union under the Constitution with a full knowledge of its provisions, and it is too late to plead either infancy or imbecility.

But, sir, it is said that by the amendment we are interfering with vested rights; that slaves were obtained under the guarantee of the Constitution; that no amendment can be proposed which changes the status of the slave. I am not going to discuss the question as to the right to hold property in slaves. Under my interpretation of the Constitution negro slavery was protected where it existed by force of law, so long as the States in which it existed and the people thereof rendered fealty and obedience to the Government. If you treat slaves as property, then the condition of protection was the allegiance of the owner. The right of protection and the duty of allegiance are reciprocal. Independent of all Government, a man is entitled to what he possesses until dispossessed by force; and when he connects himself with organized Government he is bound to recognize that Government and live under its laws, in order to entitle himself or his property to its protecting power.

But, sir, it is not necessary to discuss the right of property in man. Coming from the Green Mountain State, where the mountain brooks leap from rock to rock, in the full play of freedom; where the winds of heaven sing the song of freedom among the trees upon her mountain tops, and where a good old judge, fifty years ago, said to a claimant who claimed and presented a bill of sale for a slave, "Show me a bill of sale from God Almighty and your title will be recognized," it is not necessary for me to say that in my judgment there can be no property in man.

But, sir, it is said that slaves are property, and for the sake of the argument I will admit it; and it is further said that property in them being a vested right, cannot be divested, as it would be, by an amendment to the Constitution. Why, sir, all rights reserved to the States are vested rights, all rights possessed by the General Government are vested rights. Suppose the States had reserved to themselves the right to coin money and regulate the value thereof, that would be a vested right; and yet will any gentleman say that if from experience it had been found to operate injuriously to the best interests of the nation, the Constitution could not be so amended as to divest the States of the right to coin money, and place the power in the hands of Congress?

Precisely so with the question of slavery. It was a vexed and troublesome question when the Constitution was formed. It was then considered to be a local question, and that it would melt away before the advance of a Christian civilization, as the dew upon the meadows before the morning sun. But experience has shown otherwise. It grew to become a monster. It cried "Give, give," and never said "Enough." "Room for the leper," was the cry, and the free North stood back and said "Pass on," until from a few thousand it became almost one sixth of the nation.

Is such a reserved right (as shown from experience) consistent with a full, free, and perfect development of a republican form of government? Is there no antagonism between free institutions and the aristocratic and cursed system of slavery?

Now, sir, if the Congress of the United States finds that such antagonism does exist; that slavery strikes a blow at the heart of the national life; that it endangers free institutions and a republican form of government; that it is incompatible with the theory of our Government; that both cannot survive, can it be said that there is no power to propose an amendment to the Constitution which shall remove the danger? Sir, I think not. No gentleman upon the floor of the House has defended the system save one, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD]; and when he said that slavery was the normal and best condition for the negro race, a negro in the gallery exclaimed, "I don't think massa has read his Bible much, or he would not have said that"—a just condemnation of a sentiment which outrages the moral sense of the civilized world. I commend the gentleman to the blessed Book which the poor black man thought he had not read. In it he will find that God made man—not the white man, not the black man, but man in His own image, and breathed into his nostrils His own breath of life. And for his encouragement let me say to him that he will find there promises of infinite mercy, and that by giving even a poor black disciple a cup of water in the name of his divine Master, he shall not lose his reward. Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings cometh wisdom, and I hope the gentleman will not scoff at the lesson taught him by the poor black man.

Sir, it is conceded, I think, that the States wherein slavery exists, having exclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter, can pass an ordinance of emancipation freeing the slaves without remunerating the master. If this is so, then what becomes of the argument as to vested rights in property? The ground upon which a State may thus act is simply this: the existence of slavery and property in slaves is injurious and prejudicial to the safety of the State; hence the State has a right to say to its people, you shall no longer own slaves as property. It is analogous to a case where the State finds within its borders an article of property which is injurious to the public health or public morals. It is clearly the right of the State to declare that such an article shall not be held as property. Now, sir, if States, having the exclusive control, persist in holding property which is in the judgment of Congress ruinous to the nation and will not yield it up, then Congress may through the people, by an amendment to the Constitution, take away these reserved rights, and say such property shall no longer exist as property.

Sir, I was surprised on yesterday at the remark of my learned friend from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] on the other side. If I understood him, in the warmth of his zeal, his energy, and his anxiety in this matter, he said to members upon this side of the House, as a matter either of threat or warning, "Look to it well, you yourselves, gentlemen, that you do not do that which may strike at the bonds of this our great and glorious Union." What did the gentleman mean by a remark of that kind? Does he not know that his great teacher, the father of secession and nullification, himself said that the individuality of South Carolina was merged in the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of this Union? Would he go beyond his great teacher?

And what does the gentleman mean when he says "Fracta in uno fracta in omnibus?" Does he mean that this Government under our Constitution is a compact between the States themselves? Does he not see peculiar significance to that sentence which says, "We the people of the United States," in convention assembled, "do ordain and establish this" the Constitution of our country? Will the gentleman follow out and take the logical consequences of his statement? If so, he will be obliged to concede that any State or the people thereof may by ordinance take themselves out of the Union. I am sure the gentleman does not believe that.

Now, I would devote a few moments to the policy of this measure. Is it policy to pass this resolution at this time? The indications of Providence are that it is. The recent elections indicate what the will of the people is, and that is to do away with this great evil, the most accursed thing that has existed in this Government since the formation of our Constitution; which has been a blot, in our own estimation and in the estimation of the people of the earth, upon our fair escutcheon.

It is said that slavery was not the cause of the war. That it was the immediate cause of the war I am not prepared to say; but it led to a state of things which necessarily, in the order of Providence, must produce a war. The North, stimulated by free labor, had steadily and wonderfully progressed in population, wealth, and power. The little tree which our fathers planted upon Plymouth rock had grown up and spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific, until every man might come and repose beneath its shade. The little brook that came out of the fissures of Plymouth rock had crossed over this continent, until every man could come and drink of waters dedicated to freedom.

Why, sir, the North has progressed with the strides of a giant. Young States have awakened like giants refreshed by new wine; and they had become an influence and a power, physical and moral, that the South could no longer resist. They could not resist the free States because they had no right to say that the majority should not govern. The war has cost us millions and hundreds of millions of money; and now at every New England fireside, at every hearthstone throughout the country, East and West, tears are shed for the dear ones who are lost, and prayers ascend to Almighty God to shield those who are still left to fight the battles of the country. The blood of the nation and the tears of the widow call for the passage of this resolution.

And I tell you, sir, that this rebellion is, by reason of omnipotent power, coming to an end that will be favorable to the cause of liberty here and elsewhere. Have you not read, sir, a recent book written by Victor Hugo, one of the best scholars and most eloquent writers of France? You have doubtless seen in it a description of the battle of Waterloo. What does the author say? Was Waterloo a victory? No. Was it won or lost because of Napoleon, because of Blucher, because of Wellington? No; it was lost because of God. The history of Napoleon was not written in the nineteenth century. The brains of the universe had culminated in the head of one man, and all nature moaned with the plethora. Hence, Waterloo was not a victory won by armies alone; it was a victory by God. So with this rebellion. It is not simply a rebellion; it is not simply a war. It will end in the triumph of the Union; it will end in the honor of the glorious old flag, so that it shall float again over every inch of the soil of the old Union; but not alone because of Lincoln, not because of Farragut, not because of Sherman, not because of Grant, but because of God. Slavery has been tried at the bar of Omnipotence and been found wanting. Its history is not written in the history of the nineteenth century. When we come to the great and final victory, it will not be a victory alone, sir, but it will be a change of front of the universe. Sir, it will open to the oppressed people of Europe renewed hope of freedom for themselves and their children.

The adoption of this amendment will be beneficial to the South. Sir, I know that this war will end; and I entreat gentlemen upon the other side of the House to act with us in putting down, by constitutional means, the cause of this great and direful calamity. The war will end victoriously for us; but I want this resolution to pass, and then, when it does end, the beautiful statue of the goddess of Liberty which now crowns the majestic dome above our heads, may look north and south, east and west, upon a free nation, untarnished by aught inconsistent with freedom—redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the genius of universal emancipation.

Sir, I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of the measure now before the House has been of a very extended and exhaustive character, and the arguments which have been made against it are very numerous and very varied. If I were to attempt to sum them up I should occupy a much longer time than at this stage of the debate I intend to consume. But they may, perhaps, in some general way, be grouped as follows:

There is, in the first place, the argument of the want of constitutional power, which is a proposition of a very important character.

There is then the argument de injuria, made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY]—the argument which bases itself upon the alleged injustice to private rights of the measure now before the House.

There is, in the third place, the argument founded upon the alleged inexpediency of the measure.

There is, in the fourth place, what I might perhaps characterize as the chronological argument—the argument that, although the power is possessed, and although it may not be inexpedient in itself, this is not the proper time for the passage of such an amendment, or the discussion of the question which it involves—an argument which seeks to delay to some indefinite and unappointed time the great issue with which Providence now confronts the country.

There is again, sir, the want-of-brains argument made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY.] The honorable gentleman will of course not understand me as applying those words to the argument which he made, and to which I listened with much pleasure. I mean the argument that the men who made this Constitution were so great that none who came after them are fit to lay hands upon it or to touch it; that no alterations in the circumstances of man, that no revolutions of Government, that no change in human circumstances, can justify the men of the present generation in attempting to improve in any the slightest particular the work of the great statesmen who framed the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. THAYER. Certainly, sir.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman misapprehended me, I think. I remember at the last session of Congress having asserted that I did not believe that we of the present Congress, nor the people of this country at the present time and under the circumstances, were properly competent to take into review the work of the great masters who framed the Constitution. I do not assert that in all time no changes should be made in that instrument.

Mr. THAYER. I do not intend to misrepresent the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MALLORY. I have had no such idea.

Mr. THAYER. The House will recollect the interrogatory which the gentleman propounded to me in his argument at the last session of Congress, in which he asked me whether I felt the conscious power to amend this instrument; whether I thought we were fit to amend it. It is that to which I referred. It is the argument against the ability or the competency of the men of the present generation to add anything to the work of the generation which has passed away. I do not intend to animadvert at length upon that argument. I only advert to it as one of the arguments which have been made.

There is, in the last place, what I may style, without intending any personal disrespect to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who made it, the infernal argument. I suppose that he would call it the ethnological argument, but with the sentiments which I hold, I cannot dignify it with that high-sounding description. I call it the infernal argument. It was the argument which was boldly advanced by that gentleman, and which he attempted to sustain here, that slavery was the best, the natural condition of the black race, the condition to which it was decreed by Heaven, and that, therefore, we should not struggle against the natural and just condition to which Heaven in its wise purposes had consigned them; and the argument by which that gentleman attempted to sustain his position, namely, that the best way to civilize the savage is to enslave him and his children and his children's children to the remotest generation. For that purpose he had read at the Clerk's desk, as the House will remember, a passage from a book of African travel illustrative of the savage character of the African in his wild state.

Sir, I shall not undertake in the brief time in which I intend to occupy the attention of the House to comment upon these various arguments. Time would fail me to do so. I desire to call the attention of the House more particularly to a branch of the first argument to which I have referred in this brief review of the debate on the other side of the House. I desire to say a few words in regard to the argument made yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] concerning the lack of power to pass the resolution which is now before the House. The words of the fifth article of the Constitution on this subject are very express and clear. It confers upon Congress the right to propose amendments to be adopted by the States or the people of the several States. It confers that power in language too plain to be misunderstood. It is a direct grant of power. But the article that contains that grant excepts from that power three particular subjects; and in relation to those subjects it denies the power. The grant of power contains three exceptions: first, no amendment shall be adopted prohibiting the emigration or importation of slaves prior to the year 1808; second, no direct tax shall be laid except in proportion to the enumeration of the census; and third, no State shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. Here, sir, you have the whole article of the Constitution. You have in the first place an explicit grant of power, and you have in the second place the specified subjects which are excepted from that grant of power.

Now, sir, I have no doubt the gentleman from Ohio is a very good lawyer, and is perfectly familiar with the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius. I am sure that no lawyer understands better the operation of that familiar maxim than the gentleman from Ohio. Will the gentleman therefore tell me, with this maxim before his eyes, what the framers of the Constitution meant by putting in it this grant of power, and coupling with it three exceptions from that grant? I ask him if they did not mean by that general grant to give it without limitation except in so far as it is limited by the specified exceptions? Will the gentleman tell me why they enumerated the three subjects which were excepted from the operations of this power? Sir, the position upon the part of those of us who contend for the undoubted existence of the power to adopt this resolution rests upon this immovable base, that the powers which are granted by the Constitution of the United States are plenary, and that they have no limits except in the restrictions which the Constitution itself contains. I deny the premise upon which the whole argument of the gentleman from Ohio is founded, to wit, that the grant of this power of amendment is a limited power. I contend, on the contrary, that it is an unlimited power in common with all other powers which are expressly granted in the Constitution, except in so far as you find a limitation of them in the Constitution itself.

I must therefore be allowed to say that I was somewhat surprised when I heard the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] subscribe in a kind of qualified manner to the position which was assumed by the gentleman from Ohio, when he said that neither did he believe that it was an unlimited power, but that its limitations were found in the preamble of the Constitution. To say that the limitations are found in the preamble is to say, perhaps, that there are no limitations, which would bring the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts to the point I occupy myself; because the preamble is so extensive, it embraces such a great and endless variety of subjects, and is so comprehensive in its scope, that if you construe the Constitution by the preamble you may bring almost anything within the scope of the powers granted.

Mr. DAWES. I would ask the gentleman if the preamble itself was not submitted to the States like all other parts of the Constitution; and if the framers of the Constitution did not also say, in prescribing that three fourths of the States might amend the Constitution, that to them should be addressed the question what would contribute to a more perfect union, what would establish justice, and secure public tranquillity? And therefore, in that way, is not the power perfectly unlimited, the three fourths of the States being the law-makers and the law-expounders? I ask the gentleman if it is not just as competent for that tribunal to alter the preamble as it is to alter any other part of the instrument? And farther, whether it is not competent for that tribunal, there being no appeal from it, to say that anything, save the limitations prescribed by the instrument itself, does or does not contribute to the ends set forth in the preamble, even to the extent of permitting a man of foreign birth to be chosen President of the United States? May not that tribunal of three fourths of the States say that that contributes in their opinion to the very purposes of the preamble; and therefore that the King of Dahomey might be just as eligible after that to the Presidency as any other living man.

Mr. THAYER. I do not think I disagree with the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] The preamble of the Constitution is undoubtedly a part of the Constitution, and it is that part which indicates the general purpose and intention of the framers. What I meant to express by what I said was simply this, that the objects named in the preamble are of such an extensive character that practically it operates as no restriction or limitation upon any power conferred by the Constitution. When, for instance, the preamble says that one of the objects is to promote the general welfare, it must be obvious to all that within the limits of such general language you may bring almost any proposition which will command the general approbation. And you cannot deduce from the preamble any fixed rule for the construction of the Constitution, because men's ideas will differ as to what is meant by these general phrases, and there is hardly anything which may not be brought within their operation.

I may add to what I have said upon that subject, that if anything can be shown clearly not to be within the purview of those general declarations in the preamble, that of course being without the intention of the framers, it would be in contravention of the Constitution.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Possibly I did not make myself fully understood yesterday in reference to the preamble. It is, as it seems to me, a declaration of moral and political truths on which the Constitution is based, rather than a part of the Constitution itself. It does not contain a specification of duties; it does not contain an enumeration of powers; and it is not a declaration of particular rights, either of the General Government, or of States, or of individuals. What I meant to say, if I can make myself understood, was this, that if you proceed, under the Constitution, to amend it, and intend to preserve the form of government which was provided for in the Constitution, you must keep yourselves within the declarations made in the preamble as to the purposes for which the Constitution was formed. As to what measures are within those purposes there must always be a judgment, but I think mankind would agree that if we were to amend the preamble so as to declare that the object of the union was the perpetuation of injustice, we could not say, when we had so amended it, that it was the same form of government which our fathers set up. There is evidently this distinction: an amendment to the Constitution, under the Constitution, by which we perpetuate the same form of government, and the overthrow of the Constitution, which is a revolutionary proceeding, and which unquestionably belongs in some form or other to the people.

I should say, as a matter of opinion, that if a proposition were made to amend the Constitution so as to establish slavery everywhere, that is so manifestly contrary to the principles of justice that if you adopted it it would be an overthrow of this form of government, and you could not appeal morally to the Constitution and say to the one fourth of the States dissenting from that proposition, "You are morally bound by this." You might legally enforce, as a matter of power, the authority of the Government derived from the people of the three fourths of the States over the dissenting one fourth. But when, in the judgment of all mankind, you depart from the objects for which the Constitution was framed you will have set up a new form of government, and you must seek in the people themselves, in their judgment, for the moral basis on which the new form of government is to rest. The moral basis on which this Government rests is set forth in the preamble to the Constitution, and upon that you must rely, according to the judgment of men, for the moral support which any amendment you may make is to receive from the people.

Mr. DAWES. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that my difficulty about my colleague's argument is this, that the very considerations which he has now urged, the framers of the Constitution referred to precisely this same tribunal to which they referred proposed amendments; they refer a proposed amendment to the Constitution to that tribunal, and they refer along with it the question whether it is a departure from the fundamental principles of the Government or not; and from the decision of that tribunal there is no appeal. Going along with that decision there is the right of revolution, which is a right existing in every man's breast; he takes the responsibility of judging for himself whether there is any departure from the original fundamental basis of the Government, and if he succeeds in maintaining his judgment he is free, otherwise he is bound by the obligations of the Constitution. So it seems to me; and, therefore, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has well said, practically my colleague's definition of the limitation which he puts upon the right of amendment comes right round in a circle to this, whether it be a departure or not, which question is referred to the same tribunal which is to pass upon the amendment itself.

It seems to me, therefore, that the Constitution makes a tribunal to which are to be referred all these questions—both the question of the character of the amendment and the question whether it is a departure from the fundamental principles of the Government or not. It is not a case where one tribunal makes the amendment and another tribunal passes upon the obligation of it. The Supreme Court of the United States passes upon the laws we make, and decides whether they are departures from the Constitution or not. This is a case as if the Supreme Court and the Legislature were one and the same body, making a law and expounding it and deciding whether it be a departure from the Constitution or not in one and the same breath. With the exception of the limitations which the framers of the Constitution themselves chose to put upon the acts they have recited, they have erected a tribunal into whose keeping they have put the decision of all questions touching the nature, form, and character of the Government itself, without appeal, leaving to every man and to every body of men the inalienable right of revolution, and leaving to every man the responsibility before God of deciding whether he will exercise it or not, and maintain it if he can.

Mr. THAYER. Mr. Speaker, I can subscribe most heartily to the sentiment which I have listened to from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] The point that I make is that every power granted by the Constitution is complete in itself; may be exerted to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitation except that which is written in the Constitution. Now, sir, that announcement of a principle contains nothing new. That is a principle with which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] cannot possibly be unfamiliar, because it has been for years the doctrine, the solemnly adjudged doctrine, of the highest judicial tribunal of this country in expounding the Constitution. It is the doctrine laid down by Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons and Ogden. It is a doctrine which has never been departed from by that august tribunal from the day on which Marshall and his illustrious associates gave it utterance and authority in the Supreme Court of the United States. If it be said, as was said by the gentleman from Ohio and others, that that embraces an absurdity, that if the power is unlimited, anything, no matter how much opposed to the moral law, no matter how subversive of civil government, may be tolerated under such a construction of the Constitution, I answer, not, sir, in my own language, but in the language of that illustrious judge to whom I have already referred.

"The wisdom and the discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are in this as in many other instances, as that, for example, of declaring war, the sole restraints on which they [the people] have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints on which the people most often rely solely in all representative Governments."

When you ask me, therefore, whether, if the people of the United States were so to amend the Constitution as to enable them to enslave the white freemen of the North, that would be binding, I answer you by asking you what, in your opinion, would be the effect of a law legalizing the crime of murder, whether, in your opinion, you would be bound to obey such a law, whether you would be bound to obey any law that contravenes the moral law established by the Creator? Sir, there is no sound argument to be founded on the putting of such extreme cases. The people of the United States hold their liberties under their own protection and in their own keeping. If the men they send to the halls of legislation abuse the trust reposed in them, if they enact immoral laws, unjust laws, laws that subvert the very foundations of human society, the remedy is with the people. The people would, in that event, clear these Halls of the men who made them, and would send here men who would enact laws in accordance with their welfare, with justice, with morality, and with free and equal government.

Sir, when the gentleman from Ohio puts an extreme case in order to overthrow the settled principles which I have stated, namely, that where ever you find a grant of power in the Constitution that grant is unlimited, except it be limited by the Constitution itself, he relies (he will allow me to say, with the utmost respect for him) on what can be shown to be a very shallow fallacy. In the first place, there is no danger of the Representatives of the people enacting such laws, and in the second place, if they were to enact such laws they would be whipped from these Halls by the people whose liberties and whose rights they had outraged, and the people would send here men who would repeal such laws and punish those who made them.

Well, sir, we have then a new doctrine announced, and that is that when a power is granted and there is no limitation on that power, there is, notwithstanding, a limitation, and that limitation is to depend on the fluctuating opinions of the members of this House. The gentleman says that although there is plainly written in the Constitution the power to propose amendments, and although the authors of the Constitution enumerated three instances which they excepted from the exercise of that power, yet there is something still more excepted which is not embraced within the three items excepted; and he says that it is unconstitutional to propose to amend the Constitution in the present instance, because it would interfere with a domestic institution of the States. What kind of a reason, sir, is that to assign for an attempt to overthrow the deliberately established doctrine of the highest judicial tribunal in this country?

Mr. PRUYN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. THAYER. Certainly.

Mr. PRUYN. I have not had the benefit of hearing all the remarks which the gentleman has made, and I do not understand his ground distinctly. Does the gentleman claim that the right to amend is unlimited?

Mr. THAYER. I claim, sir, that the right is unlimited except in three particulars, which are especially designated in the grant of the power to amend.

Mr. PRUYN. Is there any power to amend so as to establish a monarchy here?

Mr. THAYER. I have spent some time, I fear in vain, in commenting upon the precise objection now made by my friend from New York, [Mr. PRUYN,] which, however, I am very happy to hear him state.

Mr. PRUYN. I beg pardon of the gentleman, I was not present when he replied to that point.

Mr. THAYER. I will answer the gentleman very briefly, as I answered more at length just now. The protection and guard against any undue exercise of this power, as of all powers, is in the power of the people over their Representatives. And that, as was said by Chief Justice Marshall in the opinion to which I have referred, is a sufficient safeguard. Why, sir, we are but the instruments of the people. This House is reconstructed every other year by the votes of the people. And after all, the residue of the power, the great bulk of the power, is with the people, and inasmuch as the people elect their own Representatives, they can always protect themselves against any undue exercise of power by their agents.

But, sir, we are told that this resolution is unconstitutional; although the grant of the power to propose amendments, like the grant of other powers in the Constitution, is general and unlimited except in the particulars to which I have referred, we are told that this is unconstitutional because it interferes with the domestic institutions of the States. Well, sir, suppose it does; do you find in the Constitution any limitation declaring that the American people shall not amend their Constitution when it interferes with the domestic institutions of any portion of the people?

This question has been argued, I will take leave to say, more as if it were a question whether we here in the Halls of Congress should undertake to amend the Constitution, and to change the laws and customs of the people, than if it were a question, which in reality it is, whether we shall simply propose to the people an amendment in pursuance of our constitutional power—propose to whom? propose to the people to alter their Constitution. It is a question whether we shall give to the people an opportunity to pass upon what we consider an advisable amendment of the fundamental law, and to reject or adopt it as they may choose. We do not interfere with the domestic institutions of the States. If the "domestic institution" (to adopt a polite phrase for a great crime) should be interfered with by the adoption of this amendment it will be by the deliberate judgment and verdict of the American people. It will be destroyed, not by Congress, but by the votes of three fourths of the people. Some gentlemen seem to forget that we are acting here as the mere instruments of the people. We are merely setting the machinery in motion which will enable the people to say whether they desire this change. If three fourths of the people do not desire that change you will not have it, and if three fourths of the people do desire it, then I ask why in the name of common sense should any Democrat oppose such a change? If three fourths of the people desire this change in their fundamental law should one fourth be allowed to prevent them from accomplishing their desire?

This is a new and singular phase of Democratic principles. A strange Democracy that, which would build its creed upon such a foundation as this.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] in order to sustain himself in this extraordinary position, argued the constitutional question upon the basis that this Government is a confederation of States. He treated the whole subject as if the question were one in regard to the construction of a compact between States; as if some sovereign State was to be put in the position of losing its rights by being outvoted by other sovereign States. Sir, I am sorry to hear such a doctrine asserted at this time and in this place. That path, sir, let me tell the gentleman, leads into the bloody slough of secession. It is the fruitful parent of all the ills we now endure. It is this heresy, condemned by the greatest men who have lived in the annals of the American people, condemned by the Supreme Court of the United States, condemned again and again by that great sage, the light and glory of our judicial history, John Marshall; it is this doctrine, whose ghost was brought yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio from the bloody battle-fields of our suffering country into this Hall, which has created all the woes and sufferings by which we are now surrounded; the doctrine that the Constitution is not a Constitution for the people, but a league between States. Sir, if that be true, then Jefferson Davis and his fellow-traitors are right and we are wrong. If that be true, then there is not a rebel north of the Gulf of Mexico; because, if the theory of this Government is that which was maintained yesterday by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] namely, that the American Union is but a league between sovereign States, then those sovereignties had a right to depart; we had no right to gainsay their action; and the brave men who have poured out their blood in the sacred cause of American liberty and nationality have wasted it in a cause which, according to the gentleman from Ohio, has no foundation in justice or the Constitution.

Sir, I regret that the gentleman in sustaining his view with regard to the unconstitutionality of the resolution now before the House should have been driven by the stress of his argument to reassert that old, and I had thought fast dying fallacy which has led our great and prosperous and glorious country to its present condition of misery and suffering.

The gentleman made an eloquent profession of his attachment to the State of Ohio, to which I, and I am sure the House listened with attention and with admiration, for it was not only eloquent and beautiful but it was stirring. But, sir, the pleasure with which I listened to the honorable gentleman was alloyed with profound regret that he had not found to mingle with it one word of praise or love for the Union, and that he had not embraced the Union in that eloquent tribute of affection which he paid to the State of Ohio. Sir, I reverence the gentleman's affection and allegiance to his native State; I entertain the highest respect toward him for cherishing those feelings. But, sir, I would have been glad to have seen his great talents directed to maintain not only the glory of his native State, but also the sovereignty and perpetuity and glory of this great brotherhood of States, the glory of this great American nation now receiving its baptism of blood and fire. I should have preferred, sir, in a great crisis like the present, to listen not to such partisan and sectional cries as "Long live Ohio!" or "Long live Massachusetts!" or "Long live Pennsylvania!" but to that nobler, better shout which now bursts like the roar of the ocean from hundreds of thousands of brave men as they hurl themselves upon the common enemy of the American people, "Long live the nation!" "Long live the United States of America—one and inseparable!"

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY. Will the gentleman yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] please inform us when he proposes to bring this matter to a close?

Mr. ASHLEY. I will answer the gentleman to-morrow. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and Mr. ELDRIDGE, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 11.

So the motion was agreed to; and the House (at four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Friday, January 13, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. H. NADAL, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CLARK presented two petitions of citizens of Virginia, praying that they may be taken under the protection and jurisdiction of a territorial government; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented the petition of the Amoskeag Manufacturing Company, praying for compensation for three regimental cook-wagons furnished by order of Major General Frémont, commanding the western department; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the memorial of the newspaper publishers of Indiana, praying for a removal of the duty on foreign paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FOSTER presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors of New London, Connecticut, praying for an increase of salary; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of the officers of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, praying that foreign printing paper may be exempted from duty; that the duties on imported books may be reduced, and that all books and literary property imported expressly for public libraries may be admitted free of duty; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Youngstown, Ohio, praying that the railroad from Youngstown, Ohio, to Sharon, Pennsylvania, may be declared a mail route; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. GRIMES presented a petition of laborers in the Washington navy-yard, praying that inquiry may be made into the conduct of officials in the Washington navy-yard in the employment of persons who are represented as being hostile to the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONNESS presented a memorial of merchants and importers of the city of San Francisco, California, praying for the refunding of duties paid upon goods destroyed by fire while in the hands of original importers in that city during the years 1850 and 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. POWELL presented the memorial of Joseph Wilson, of Kentucky, praying for compensation for horses and mules captured by the rebels in consequence of the Union pickets not permitting him to pass our lines; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLEY. I present the petition of George W. Allen, of Mount Vernon, Illinois, on behalf of certain officers, prisoners captured under Colonel Straight in his celebrated raid through Georgia, setting forth that the petitioner has exhausted every available means for their release with the military authorities. One of these prisoners is now at Columbia, South Carolina, in very poor health, and in extreme want, and another is in Libby prison in solitary confinement, and is one of four who were retained by the rebels as hostages, for whom the petitioner knows not. The last advices from him to one of his fellow-prisoners bears date November 15, 1864, in which he says, "I am doomed to lie and rot in this loathsome, damp cell. The mold has settled all over me, and there is no escape from it. I am not able to carry the ball and chain, or I might get some fresh air." The petitioner therefore prays that some means may be adopted by which these men may be relieved from the slow but certain death that is awaiting them. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of John P. Andrews, of Salem, Massachusetts, in which he sets forth the loss by him of a United States five-twenty bond for $500, and he asks that provision may be made for the reimbursement of the same to him by causing a new certificate to be made out payable to his order. As the question involved in this memorial is already before the Committee on Finance, on some other petitions that have been presented, I ask the reference of this to the same committee.

Mr. GRIMES. Those other petitions have been referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; they were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRIMES. They were reported back by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and on his motion referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I was not aware of it. I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this matter. There was one memorial that I presented from a banking house in New York and Boston relating to the loss of certain certificates, in regard to which they ask not only a remedy in their own case, but legislation of a general character applicable to all such cases in the future. Has anything been done with regard to that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state to the Senator that I reported the memorial referred to the other day adversely. The claim was for interest on bonds. The bonds had been lost in the mail, and after they became due the Secretary of the Treasury required one year to elapse before he would pay the principal and interest of the bonds. At the expiration of the year, the principal and interest were paid; but these parties claimed interest after the bonds matured, during the year the Secretary would not pay them. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that there was no just ground of claim; it was the misfortune of the parties that they lost their bonds. As soon as the proper time elapsed, the time that has been established and deemed proper in the Treasury Department, the bond was paid.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand from the Senator that the committee were of opinion that there was no necessity for further legislation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not on that point. There is probably a necessity for legislation if Congress is willing to pay for legal tenders lost or destroyed. If they are, it will be necessary to pass an act of Congress on the subject. My own judgment is against it. When parties lose their legal tenders, unless they are destroyed and identified by numbers and description so clear that they may be replaced by other notes bearing the same numbers, I think it is the misfortune of the party who loses them, and he cannot call upon Congress to repair that loss; but if Congress should at any time think that the parties are entitled to relief, then there ought to be a general bill passed on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. Then, as I understand the Senator, a petition, such as I have now presented, which concerns an individual case of loss is not proper to the Committee on Finance, but simply for the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN. They have all gone to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; let this petition go to the same committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that Joseph P. Woodbury, of Boston, Massachusetts, have leave to withdraw his memorial and accompanying papers from the files of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. GRIMES. There has been an adverse report; but the memorial is an application to Congress to make an appropriation of money for the purpose of constructing a submarine gun. It is not the case of a claim against the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order will be made, if there be no objection.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of

C. C. Hutchins, Indian agent for the Ottawas, praying indemnity for the loss of a Treasury draft, which was lost in the destruction of the Lawrence Bank, of Lawrence, Kansas, by the rebel Quantrell, on the 21st day of August last, reported adversely thereon, and asked that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 376) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 520) for the relief of Samuel Beaton, master of the schooner George Harris, reported it adversely, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was recommended the bill (H. R. No. 43) for the relief of Milo Suttiff and Levi H. Case, reported it adversely, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Peter Wheeler, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Isaac R. Diller, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 516) for the relief of Francis Munson, reported it adversely, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 389) relating to clerkships in the Post Office Department, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the letter of the Postmaster General accompanying that bill be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

GEORGE MOWREY.

Mr. POMEROY. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 458) for the relief of George Mowrey, have had the same under consideration, and direct me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. As it is a bill involving only the sum of seventy-two dollars, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George Mowrey the sum of $72 12 in full payment for conveying two prisoners from Somerset jail in Pennsylvania to Pittsburgh, in the year 1841, by order of the United States deputy marshal for the western district of Pennsylvania.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EDMUND S. ZEVELY.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Edmund S. Zevely, praying to be relieved from a contract of his with the Post Office Department, have directed me to report a bill for his relief; and as it is a small bill, I desire that it may be put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 395) for the relief of Edmund S. Zevely was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize and empower Edmund S. Zevely to put an end to his contract with the United States entered into with the Postmaster General on the 24th of March, 1853, for furnishing the Post Office Department with box-wood marking and rating stamps, on giving the Postmaster General sixty days' notice in writing.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUOTAS OF THE STATES.

Mr. RIDDLE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration, as I presume there will be no objection to it:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what number of soldiers and sailors the several loyal States (embracing the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, California, Oregon, and Kansas, and the District of Columbia) have furnished the Army and Navy under the proclamation and order of the President for five hundred thousand men, dated July 18, 1864.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to its consideration if it is to be referred to a committee. Does the Senator propose to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. RIDDLE. I am confident that the Committee on Military Affairs is in favor of it, and I will make a statement which I am sure will satisfy the Senator that the resolution should be acted upon now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is to ascertain whether there is any objection to the present consideration of the resolution. The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLE. The information which the resolution is designed to produce is very anxiously looked for by thousands of citizens in all the loyal States, more particularly in those States which border upon the States in rebellion, and which have responded to every draft made upon their people. By the proclamation of the President of the 19th of December last, it appears that but two hundred and forty thousand of the five hundred thousand men called for in July were obtained, leaving a deficiency of two hundred and sixty thousand. In consequence of this a draft of three hundred thousand has been ordered by the President. By the census of 1860 the States mentioned in my resolution, including the District of Columbia, contained in round numbers twenty-three million people. This number is doubtless greater now, but I will assume it to be the same.

The State which I in part represent here had a population of one hundred and twelve thousand two hundred and sixteen. Out of this population Delaware has furnished two thousand four hundred and forty-five men, allowing a small credit under the proclamation of the 18th of July last. If Senators will make the calculation—it is a simple one—they will find that this amounts to a little more than our quota for the five hundred thousand men. And yet the idea has gone abroad that the small States where the drafts are enforced with ease and rapidity must be taxed to fill up the deficiency created by the failure of the draft in the larger States. Justice certainly protests against such a policy, and I think the Senate will gladly afford the opportunity to the Secretary of War to furnish the information. The resolution is offered with the very kindest spirit to that officer, and I believe he will cheerfully respond to it, and with alacrity. I cannot see any earthly objection to the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. In doing so I simply desire to say that I think it is far more appropriate that this subject should be acted upon advisedly than in the hurry of the moment, touching as it does the number and character of our forces in the field, and upon which we may rely for active military operations. I think it is certainly desirable that we should look before we act in this matter. I therefore move its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INDEFINITELY POSTPONED.

Mr. WILSON. There are three or four bills on the table which the Committee on Military Affairs have reported back with a request that the committee be discharged from their further consideration. They are of no importance now, and I wish to get them off the Calendar. I desire therefore to take them up with a view to their indefinite postponement. I will first move to take up Senate bill No. 103.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 103) to define the rank, pay, and emoluments of chaplains in the United States Army and volunteer force, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons residents of certain States into the regiments of other States.

Mr. WILSON. I move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 231) concerning the subsistence and pay of the Army.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who have entered the service prior to May 3, 1861.

Mr. WILSON. That matter has been acted upon in another bill. I therefore move the indefinite postponement of this joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HALE. That bill was postponed on my suggestion until to-day for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. The subject has been referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that committee, on consultation with the Secretary of State, have agreed upon an amendment. The chairman of the committee, I see, is not in his seat; and if some other member of the committee will state what the amendment is, I shall be obliged to him; if not, I think I can state what the amendment is that has been agreed upon.

Mr. SHERMAN. Send up the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I move to add an additional section, that the salary of the consul at Halifax, from and after the 1st of January, 1865, shall be $3,000 per annum, and that an appropriation of $1,500 for supplying the deficiency until the next current year be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. To enable the Senator from New Hampshire to write his amendment, which ought to be written, if he will allow me I will offer an amendment now from the Committee on Finance. It will give him time to prepare his amendment.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer this amendment to come in at the end of the bill:

For expenses of the commission to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and the British possessions bounding on Washington Territory, $13,250.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I propose an amendment on the one hundred and ninth line of the bill, and I send to the Chair a letter from the Secretary of State in relation to it. My amendment is to increase the appropriation "for bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crime" to $20,000. It is now $5,000 in the bill; and my amendment is to strike out "five" and to insert "twenty."

Mr. BROWN. I inquire whether the bill is susceptible of amendment unless on motion from a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is open to any amendment coming within the rules of the Senate, not increasing an appropriation except in pursuance of the report of a committee or the recommendation of the head of a Department. The letter from the Secretary of State will be read.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, January 9, 1865.

SIR: Resolutions to present Cornelius Vanderbilt a gold medal, as introduced by yourself at the last session and passed, failed to make an appropriation for the expense of the medal. The sum of $3,000 will be required for that purpose; will you please cause an amendment to be placed in the proper appropriation bill?

I have also to request that you will cause House bill numbered 598 to be amended in line one hundred and nine by an increase of the appropriation "for bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crime" from $5,000 to $20,000.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WM. H. SEWARD.

HON. E. D. MORGAN.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill already contains the ordinary appropriation of $5,000 for this purpose, and I know no reason why it should be increased. The Secretary of State does not mention a reason. The annual estimates as they came from the Department recommended an appropriation of $5,000; there may be facts which have arisen since; if so I have no objection to the amendment, but it ought to be properly explained.

Mr. MORGAN. The appropriation in relation to the medal to Mr. Vanderbilt was included in the deficiency bill on my motion. This appropriation is asked for by the Secretary of State. I have had no conversation with him on the subject. I only offer the amendment because of the letter which has been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. The estimate submitted by the Secretary of State with the annual estimates, for this purpose, was $5,000. I know not the reason why the increase is recommended. It is not stated in the letter. I have no objection, however, to allowing the amendment to be made. We can correct it hereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I have reduced the amendment I suggested to writing, and as the chairman of the Committee on Commerce is not here, I submit it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of the consul at Halifax, Nova Scotia, from and after the 1st day of January, 1865, shall be $3,000 per annum; and a further sum of $1,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to carry the same into effect.

In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce I will state that this amendment is offered in pursuance of a unanimous recommendation of the committee, and also in pursuance of a recommendation of the Secretary of State.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I am sure my friend from New Hampshire did not mean to misstate when a reference was made to the action of the Committee on Commerce as having been unanimous. It was not entirely so. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this case is not particularly distinguished from a large number of other cases. It is an application for an increase of the salary of a consul, and there are many grounds alleged why this increase of salary should take place; but there have been similar applications before that same committee in a very large number of cases. The same general grounds arising from the increased expenses of living, the cost of keeping up the consulates, and various other circumstances applied to those cases as well as to this; and out of perhaps some fifteen or twenty at the last session of Congress there was selected not more than one or two under very peculiar and extreme circumstances for an increase of the salary of those consuls. I thought then the precedent was rather a bad one under the existing state of things, and I am sure that the Senator from New Hampshire has been himself as vigilant and careful to prevent an increase of salaries everywhere in the public service as any other Senator upon this floor. He has exercised great care, and caution, and prudence, and I commend him for it. If, however, we increase the salary of this consul, why shall we not increase the salary of the consul at Liverpool, where I am induced to believe a much larger burden of duties is imposed upon the consul, and where the expenses of living and maintaining himself respectably abroad as the representative of this Government at that place, an important position, require an increase of the salary to a greater extent than the one now referred to? And if we commence this increase of salary in the one instance, the Senate will, perhaps, in order not to make invidious distinctions, be called upon to increase the salary of public officers in the public service generally.

I have no special or particular objection to the increase of this salary, standing alone by itself, but looking to the extent to which it may be carried and the danger of making an inroad on the system, I at least beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that they may be aware of that which they are now asked to do.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understand that the bill now before the Senate covers all the appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service.

Mr. SHERMAN. All appropriations for consular and diplomatic purposes, not civil and diplomatic.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I accept the correction. We have, I understand, some five ministers to Central America, and we are paying $7,500 a year to each of them. I know of no authority of law for their appointment. The appropriation made in this bill recognizes the existence of those missions as full missions, and the Congress of the United States is called upon to pay some thirty-five or forty thousand dollars a year to support ministers to Governments which, if I recollect aright, Mr. Stephens, in his travels to Central America, says he had great difficulty in finding. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Monday next, that Senators may have an opportunity to inquire into the propriety of the appropriations it contains.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the bill will not be now postponed. It has already been once postponed merely to allow an amendment to be offered increasing the salary of a consul, and I trust no further postponement will take place.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say a single word in regard to the salary of the consul at Halifax. The matter has been referred to the Committee on Commerce; and if they are very decidedly of opinion that the consulate at Halifax is an exceptional case I shall not undertake to set up my views in opposition to their conclusion after examination; but unless facts are stated which convince me that it is an exceptional case demanding an increase, founded upon reasons different from those which apply to ordinary salaries under the Government, I shall not vote for the amendment. The question of increasing the compensation of the officers of the Government is the most difficult and troublesome one we have now at this session of Congress. There is not a department of the Government, and scarcely an officer of the Government, that does not complain, and very properly, of the compensation now allowed by law as not sufficient to sustain himself and his family. But all the reasons for an increase of salary in ordinary cases do not apply to our foreign intercourse; because our consuls and our ministers abroad are paid in gold. They do not feel the effect of the depreciation of paper money, there is therefore no reason for an increase of the salary of the consul at Halifax unless the war has thrown upon him increased responsibilities and increased expenditures. If facts are stated to show that the consul at Halifax ought, for particular reasons, to have his salary increased, I am willing to listen to them and weigh them; but if it is simply an increase without any special reasons, I think we ought to hesitate to begin it. We shall have on every appropriation bill that comes before us an effort made to increase salaries, and before we embark in that undertaking we ought very carefully to examine the ground on which we stand.

I shall, therefore, vote against this amendment unless facts are stated by the Committee on Commerce to the Senate to induce me to believe that this is an exceptional case, and that the war has thrown upon the consul at Halifax peculiar responsibilities and peculiar labors which do not apply to other consuls.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce have resisted all applications for an increase of salary on the part of our consular agents unless where a case was exceptional. In this case I believe the committee were unanimous in the opinion that it was exceptional. The large amount of contraband traffic going on between Halifax and the rebel States has thrown very large responsibilities and duties on the consul there. A large number of refugees from those States are there who require watching. I send to the desk, and ask to have read, a letter from the Secretary of State which explains the matter.

The following letter was read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, January 10, 1865.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 9th instant relative to a resolution which had passed the Senate instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of the United States consul at Halifax, and in reply to your request for any information upon the subject which the Department can furnish, I have to state that the compensation attached to the office is $2,000 per annum, and the consul is not permitted to transact business. The consular fees, which for the fiscal year ending 30th June last amounted to $1,580 36, are, under existing provisions of law, paid into the United States Treasury. A large number of American vessels are constantly arriving in Halifax, and that port is much resorted to by vessels engaged in blockade running and in affording aid and comfort to the insurgent States. Besides the attention which the consul is required to give to the former, his duties have been largely increased by the necessity of constant labor and watchfulness on his part to defeat the nefarious designs of the latter as well as of many persons from those States and their sympathizers who frequent that port. The cost of living in Halifax has within a few years much increased, and I am satisfied that the consul cannot, with rigid economy, live upon his present salary. I do not hesitate, therefore, respectfully to suggest, for the consideration of the committee, the expediency of providing by law for the increase of the consular compensation at Halifax.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. Z. CHANDLER, Chairman of Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

Mr. HALE. I will state very briefly some of the reasons why this amendment should be adopted, though it is impossible for me to state to the Senate everything that produces the conviction upon my mind that this salary should be increased. The business at Halifax, I have no doubt, has increased tenfold from what it was when our present consul went there, by the operation of the war. Halifax is the great depot for the blockade runners; a great many of them were there during the last summer, and I think in no single instance has a blockade runner or any confederate vessel sailed from the port of Halifax that the consul has not availed himself of an opportunity to learn the name of the vessel, her register, where she was built, what she carried, what her cargo was, and all these facts were communicated to the Government here by telegraph, and in pursuance of information thus furnished, I think six out of eleven vessels that left that port have been seized and condemned. The consul has to have his eye constantly all over the city, and to me it was utterly astonishing how he got the information which he was daily communicating to the Government. Besides this, the calls upon him, I should say, on an average while I was there—and I was there over a fortnight—were at least fifteen a day. The salary of the consul is $2,000 a year. Out of that he has to pay for a small house a rent of $250, and he has to pay his own messenger and his own clerk. His office is constantly thronged during the day, and he has to stay there after dark at night to do his writing, which ought to be done by a clerk.

These are some of the facts which convince me that the salary ought to be raised. There are others of a private and personal nature; but the Senate will remember that when I first presented the subject I stated that if I could not convince the Committee on Commerce at once that this ought to be done, I would not urge it any more. The Committee on Commerce are persuaded that it ought to be done; so is the Secretary of State. My friend from New Jersey will pardon me, for I certainly did not mean to misrepresent him when I stated that I believed that the committee were unanimous. It seems that the chairman made the same mistake that I did. The Senator from New Jersey is a very modest man, and he does not always urge his opinions, and he certainly does not with a loud voice. It might have been that he entertained the convictions which he has stated; but he was not so persevering in presenting them as to attract the attention of the chairman. I believe I have been, as that Senator says, rather cautious in the matter of increasing salaries; I have not been one of the friends of the doctrine that it was only necessary to give a man "the pay, rank, and emoluments of a brigadier general" in order to crush the rebellion; I have been of a different opinion; but I believe that this is a case which imperiously demands, where the public honor and necessity demand, the increase which the committee have recommended.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It would appear from the letter of the Secretary of State that there are some reasons given why the salary of this consul should be increased. It may not, perhaps, be amiss for me to say that in a very large number of cases presented to the Committee on Commerce during the last session of Congress the same reasons were assigned in the same form. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that there is one general complaint coming to the Committee on Commerce, and through the channel of the State Department, on account of the smallness of the salaries of these foreign agents, in consequence of which they are not able to live in a way in which they desire to live, and in which, perhaps, we might desire that they should live. I myself have not been able to learn or to distinguish any difference between this case and a large number of cases precisely similarly situated, and some of them I think having rather stronger claims to the consideration of Congress. It was for this reason, and this reason alone, that I wished to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if they mean to do justice, or if they mean to enable our consuls abroad to live in the manner in which they desire to live, they will not simply restrict their action to the consulate at Halifax, but will extend this sympathy, or justice, whichever it may be called, to consulates generally. The chairman of the committee is well aware of the fact that there has been a large number of claims of the same character, and founded upon the same reasons, addressing themselves very strongly to the humanity, at least, of the committee.

I did not make my resistance very strong in the committee, it is true; but my objection was urged; and perhaps my modesty was a little increased by finding that the committee were generally in favor of the proposition under the plausible and pleasant mode of address of the Senator from New Hampshire, and the urgency of his appeal. It would take a pretty bold man indeed to rise up and resist his application before a committee or anywhere else in a matter where his heart seemed to be engaged.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether this consul is paid in gold or in currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. He is paid in gold; all the consuls are paid in gold.

Mr. HARLAN. Then the salary now received would be equivalent to $4,000 if paid on this side of the line. With that view of the case I think I shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. POMEROY. It occurs to me that this is one of a class of cases which are constantly presented to us and are very numerous. I have no doubt that there is a class of men, not only those representing this Government abroad, but officers at home, whose duties have been largely increased in consequence of the war. I know of some officers who had almost nothing to do before the rebellion, and who now have to work day and night. When the war is over, I suppose they will have much less to do, and perhaps almost nothing. I do not see how we can enter upon the business of increasing the salaries of this class unless we increase them all. I am disposed to deal out as even-handed justice as it is possible for us to do, to every employé of the Government. If this consul has more than he can do, there is a way of giving him a clerk temporarily; there might be some appropriation made in that direction which would relieve him; but we ought to bear in mind that these men who are abroad have not upon themselves the responsibilities of this war that men of their ages have who live here. They are not subject to draft; they are not called upon constantly to aid in efforts to promote recruiting, and I believe they are not even taxed on their salaries. I think the income tax does not come out of their salaries. I am not certain of that fact, but such is my opinion. Besides, I do not know of many of them who have resigned. If any Senator knows of many such cases, he is better informed than I am. As their salary is paid in gold, and as they are not taxed upon it, and as they are relieved from the burdens of men who stay in the country, I do not feel called upon to vote any increase of salary to them, as a general rule, or even in this particular case.

Mr. CONNESS. I think that if a majority of this body could possibly be present at the sittings of the Finance Committee they would scarcely be prepared to vote this increase if they could hear and know of the propositions and demands that are there made from great masses of persons employed by the Government in every possible relation for an increase of pay. This proposition would never have come to us undoubtedly but for the incident, the fortunate incident, perhaps, of the recent visit to Halifax of the distinguished Senator who proposes it in this body. It was doubtless a great advantage to the Government that the Senator visited that spot; but it would be a great damage to the Treasury if we had the misfortune, or, I should say, the fortune, of his having visited all the consulates, for I am afraid he would have discovered a great many of them that were serving the country without sufficient compensation. I do not pretend to doubt the Senator's statements in reference to this case; but in making those statements it would be well to remember that the needs and necessities, the labor and surroundings of that particular consulate have simply been brought to his notice by his having made himself acquainted with them. Equal demands, equal necessities, equal or superior amounts of labor would have been discovered to be the part or lot of other consuls at other consulates if they could have been visited in like manner. There is scarcely a doubt about that.

I can hardly think that there is justice to the other agents abroad, and certainly there is no proper fitness to the Treasury at the present time, in passing this measure. The members composing the Finance Committee are at a loss how to reply to the demands that are made for an increase of salary, as I said before, from all quarters; and we can only safely resist the general demand now being made, at a point of time of great enhancement of prices and depreciation of the currency, by refusing all, or nearly all. It is the only way in which the Treasury can be at all maintained at present. We are all hoping for a recession of the present condition of things, and a change—and I think the aspect of the times promises very soon to make this change—which will become a permanent one if made; and it does not seem to me to be wise or proper to increase salaries now, and I hope we shall not enter upon that system of legislation. If it be desirable and necessary that the pay which our consuls and other agents abroad receive shall be reexamined and rearranged, let it be entered upon regularly, and let us ascertain how many consuls there are like the one at Halifax where the labors performed are inadequately paid, and apply the remedy in each case. It may turn out that there are but a dozen of them under the Government; it may turn out that there is but the one at Halifax; but I have doubts about that. I think the needs of that one come to us by the special reason that the Senator has recently visited there. I have not attempted to bring in question any statement he has made in regard to it; I take it he has stated the facts; but they are not facts as pressing as those which come to the knowledge of the Finance Committee at every meeting they hold. I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I certainly hesitate at this time, and in the present condition of the public Treasury, to increase any salary anywhere, and most certainly should I hesitate to enter upon any general system for the increase of salaries in any department of Government; and yet, sir, I am willing to look at individual cases as they may arise. It is in that spirit that I approach the question before the Senate.

I know something of the consular service of the country. I know that we have consuls in some parts of the world that are paid perhaps adequately, certainly as much as they deserve, and so that they are able to live well on their income; but I know also that there are other consuls in other parts of the world that are not paid adequately. I receive letters, I may almost say by every foreign arrival, from persons in the foreign service of the country making such complaints. There is our consul at Bordeaux, a very considerable seaport, where we have a large trade and large interests, and a port also which I may say exercises to a certain extent a political influence. The consul there is underpaid. I think his salary should be advanced. I might give other instances, but I will not. I content myself with saying that I place our consul at Halifax in the same category with our consul at Bordeaux, only perhaps his case is a stronger one even than the one at Bordeaux. I think that the public service requires that our consul at Halifax should be better paid than he is now. We pay our consul at Nassau $4,000 a year to watch blockade runners, to take care of the interests of this Republic dealing with the rebellion. Our consul at Halifax has precisely the same interests to watch, and I think that he is subjected to expenses full as large as those of our consul at Nassau. I shall therefore vote for the proposition of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only reason given for the increase of this salary is that the business of this consulate has increased. That can be said in regard to every officer of the Government, civil and military, with scarcely an exception. The only reason the Senator from Massachusetts gives for the increase of the salary is that the duties of the consul at Halifax are equal to the duties of the consul at Nassau. We yielded to the argument of the Committee on Commerce last year by increasing the compensation of the consul at Nassau; and if we yield to the argument now, without any specific reasons given for it, we cannot resist the argument in the future in other cases. I hope that if we set a bad example last year we shall not renew it now. I am satisfied that this increase, if made, will only lead to additional demands from other consuls, who were quieted by the action of the Senate at the last session, and that it is safer and better for us to leave these consuls to their present salary. I will here say that if the consul at Halifax is dissatisfied with his present compensation, I will agree to find about fifty applicants from my own State who will be very willing to take the office and discharge the duties.

Mr. SUMNER. Would the Senator's candidates discharge the duties?

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe they would.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Ohio thinks we made a mistake last year in increasing the salary of the consul at Nassau. The fact was that that consulate had gone begging for more than two years; we could not get a proper man to take the office, and we were compelled to raise the salary in order to induce a competent man to go there; and it was the opinion of the Committee on Commerce that it was for the interest of the Government to pay whatever amount was necessary to secure the services of a first-class man. It was remarked, I think, by one or two gentlemen on the committee that a first-class man for the place could not be got for less than $10,000, and that if the fact were so it would be for the interest of the Government to pay that salary. The consulate at Halifax is of almost equal importance to the Government. I do not know the gentleman that fills the place. I never heard of him until the Senator from New Hampshire named him to me; but it is my opinion that you cannot keep there a suitable man, a competent man, a proper man to look out for the interests of our Government and our commerce without paying an increase of salary. That is my judgment; I may be mistaken; but it is for the Senate to decide. I think the case at Halifax nearly as strong as that at Nassau. These are the two ports from which nearly all the blockade running is carried on, and at each place the closest watching is required, and we want the greatest ability we can obtain for the consul. I hope the salary recommended by the committee will be allowed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Doolittle, Farwell, Hale, Hicks, Howe, Morgan, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, and Van Winkle—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Teasdale, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, and Wilson—27.

ABSENT.—Messrs. Carlisle, Cowan, Harding, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Wilkinson, and Wright—10.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOOT. I propose an amendment to this bill of rather an unusual character, for it does not propose to increase anybody's salary, but proposes to dispense with one altogether. The amendment I propose is in the eightieth line, to strike out the words "Saint Lambert and Longueuil." These are two small French hamlets on the opposite side of the river from Montreal, and connected with Montreal by the Victoria bridge, and for all practical purposes are part of Montreal. There is no occasion, no necessity, for a consulate at that point; there is no practical convenience to be subserved by it. I move to strike the names of those places out of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill by inserting before "Mexico," in the tenth line, the words "the republic of," so as to read "the republic of Mexico." I move this amendment because as this bill now stands the appropriation is equivocal. The clause where the word "Mexico" occurs is that clause appropriating for the salaries of our various ministers abroad and enumerating the countries to which they are sent. As is well known to every member of the Senate, there are two Governments in Mexico; one of them is recognized by us and we have diplomatic relations with it; I do not know that we have any relations whatever with the other. When we appropriate for the salary of a minister to Mexico, it seems to me we ought to make it certain to which Government he is to go. I do not suppose that any gentleman here intends to recognize the empire of Mexico, as it is called, by making an appropriation to send any diplomatic agent to that empire. We have not recognized it; we have no diplomatic relations with it; and therefore, unless we mean to act blindly, and not to designate precisely what we intend to do, we should say whether we intend this appropriation to go to the payment of a minister to the old republic of Mexico, or whether we intend it to go to support a diplomatic agent or minister to the empire that is pretended to have been established there. I do not exactly know what is the rank of our representative in Mexico, but I think he is called a minister of the second class. I suppose this appropriation is intended for his payment; but the language is equivocal; it does not certainly express what it is intended to be applied to. I think, therefore, it is highly proper that this amendment should be made. We certainly ought to say to which Government in Mexico we mean to send a minister; and I should regret exceedingly if the Senate should conclude now to make an appropriation for a diplomatic agent or minister to the empire of Mexico. I wish to say in the bill "the republic of Mexico," and then we shall know precisely what we are about.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MASSACRE OF CHEYENNE INDIANS.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 93) in relation to the massacre of the Cheyenne Indians was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that the Committee on Indian Affairs have fully examined this case, though I have not heard any report from the committee in regard to it. I have had some letters from people in my own State and some from Colorado relating to it, but I have not heard the other side; and it is always embarrassing to me to be called upon to give a judgment without knowing what one side has to say.

In the next place, I do not like to declare that the private soldiers, who were bound to obey orders, shall be deprived of all pay and emoluments in consideration of having engaged in an attack on Indians that they themselves could not have prevented. I do not know that there is any responsibility upon these privates at all. In fact, although I have heard one side of the case, I do not know enough to bring in a verdict even against Colonel Chivington. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs read us a letter from some Indian agent which, taken by itself and standing alone, would seem to convict him; but I have seen so much since this war began that I am not inclined to make up my judgment on that alone. During this war I have seen men one day condemned and the next day approved. On one occasion we passed a vote of thanks here complimenting some of our officers, and in a little while afterwards I heard of their being in Fort La Fayette. We have been fickle; sometimes we have condemned men without their having had their side presented; and then we have approved and applauded without waiting to hear all the facts. I think this is a hasty and unwise way of doing things. If Colonel Chivington has killed Indians when he ought not to have done so, let the question be investigated by somebody; let somebody bring in a verdict and make a report. But to call upon the Senate to strike him down in this way (for this resolution directed to the Secretary of War is virtually striking him down) seems to me very extraordinary. I believe he has already been arrested; at any rate I have seen a report of that kind in the papers. If the War Department have already arrested him I do not propose, so far as my vote is concerned, to add anything to it by sending them this resolution. I do not know enough about the case to defend him, but I do know enough about it to know that we ought not to strike at him until he has had an opportunity of being heard, or somebody in his defense. The letter from an Indian agent, or from Indian traders out there, I do not think should be conclusive on the subject. The committee may have something which I have not heard of. They may have investigated and heard both sides, but I certainly have not. I cannot vote for this resolution.

Mr. HARLAN. This resolution does not propose a judgment in the case against the colonel who commanded this expedition or any of the members of the expedition. It merely proposes to suspend their pay until the facts can be fully ascertained, and to take possession of the plunder which it is said they have carried off from these Indians. The official report from the agent of this tribe has not been received, and may not be received for months to come, on account of the interruption of communication by hostile Indians between the States and this Territory. The soldiers who were engaged in this enterprise were chiefly, as we were informed, one hundred day men, and were probably—I fear the fact may be authenticated—organized with a distinct understanding that each member of the organization should share in the plunder they might secure from the discomfited; and it is said, and probably with truth, that they returned laden with plunder, each soldier with a pony or two laden with buffalo robes, furs, trinkets, and it is said two or three mules were loaded down with Mexican dollars captured from their victims. This property is in the possession, it is believed, of the members of that regiment, and they will probably be paid off and mustered out of service in a few days; long before the facts in the case can be ascertained officially. If anything is done to rebuke this wrong it must be done at once, and an order must be communicated by telegraph across the plains.

I ought to state, I think, in this connection that the policy of this Government in relation to the Indian tribes for a long period has been that of kindness; we have been appropriating millions of money each year for the purpose of educating and instructing the Indian tribes on our borders and in the plains; but that policy is being reversed without any authority from the Federal Government by the agents of the Government remote, away from the capital; and I believe and think every Senator from a frontier State knows that they have entered upon an entirely different policy. They are now engaged in the extermination of the Indians; and in conversation with these men they say it is the only way to secure permanent peace; they insist that these poor people, whether at war or at peace with the United States, must be destroyed. I have information that leads me to suppose that this is the initiatory step to a general war for this purpose. I have no doubt myself that Colonel Carleton is at this moment organizing an expedition against the Comanche Indians, the larger part of whom have been and now are at peace with the white inhabitants of New Mexico, for the purpose, as far as possible, of exterminating them.

I do not feel disposed to-day to go into an investigation of the outrages that I think have been perpetrated, seemingly by the authority of the Government of the United States, against the tribes on the plains and in the mountains. It does not receive the sanction of the military authorities at the capital. I know that they are as averse to this policy as any member of the Senate can possibly be; but it has been entered upon by the employes of the Government who are far removed from the capital, and unless this policy shall be rebuked in a signal manner from this Government, it will be carried into effect, and we shall have to suffer the disgrace of the extermination of thousands of these comparatively inoffensive and unarmed people.

In this case it is said that most of those who were massacred were women and children; that there were no armed Indians in the village; that the chiefs of the tribe, when they were fired upon, went out and made an effort to deliver themselves and their tribe as prisoners of war, and that the parties who thus went out were shot down in cold blood, and then the massacre became general, and that the massacre extended perhaps to every woman and nearly all the small children belonging to the tribe.

This joint resolution, if it should pass, will merely suspend judgment in the case, and render it impossible for these parties to profit by the robbery, if it shall prove to have been unprovoked, until an investigation can be had.

Mr. POMEROY. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Iowa what was the evidence before the committee? What investigation was entered into? Upon what testimony did the committee act?

Mr. HARLAN. The evidence is not official. There was a letter before the committee from the agent of this tribe, who says that he is preparing a full report. He pronounces it an unprovoked massacre, and he is preparing a full official report, which will be here soon if it has not been intercepted on its way here. There are letters here also from one of the judges of the Territory corroborating the facts; there are letters from private gentlemen to members of the committee, all corroborating the same general facts, implying that the massacre was unprovoked, premeditated, and cold-blooded; that it was probably perpetrated for plunder.

Mr. NESMITH. I am sure there is not a member of this body who would justify an unprovoked attack on women and children, whether Indians or whites; but I do not know that there is any reliable information either before this body or before the Committee on Indian Affairs that any such outrage has occurred in Colorado. If there is any such information it has not been brought to my observation.

It seems to me that this is rather a hasty and unprecedented manner of disposing of a question of this kind. There may have been outrages committed there, and doubtless there have been on both sides, or what would be considered outrages in a civilized community; but in the consideration of a question like this, you must take cognizance of the circumstances which exist there. You must remember that the people of Colorado have been engaged in a war of extermination not provoked by themselves but brought on by the Indians. It seems to me that before action like that now proposed under these circumstances is taken in a case of such importance as this, and the pay and allowances of men are suspended, there should be some official investigation.

If upon investigation the fault is found to rest with the officers or the men, and they are culpable, I shall have nothing to say against their punishment, but I am opposed to punishing men in advance of investigation, (men who are serving for the poor pittance of thirteen or fourteen dollars a month,) by stopping their pay and stopping their subsistence, depriving them of the pay upon which their families at home, their wives and their children, are depending for support, while they are defending their homes against the ruthless barbarity of the savages. I say it is improper to take hasty action on the subject, and to punish the men in this way when there could have been no responsibility on them. They were simply obeying the orders of their officers. If the orders of the officers were illegal, or wrong, or improper to be executed, you cannot fasten the responsibility upon the private soldier. You must hold the officers responsible; and the fact that they will be mustered out of service in a short time will in no wise relieve them of the responsibility which they owe to the law for an outrage such as the Senator from Iowa says has been committed in the Territory of Colorado.

Sir, there is a great deal of misguided sympathy for the Indians. It is a fruitful theme, and individuals all over the country are continually elaborating it. They are talking constantly about the wrongs which the aboriginal race has suffered at the hands of the white man. I admit that there have been wrongs on both sides. We have deprived them of their country; we have occupied it; and circumstances have necessarily driven us to war with them. If I could appeal to Senators here who represent the older States, and who bring upon this floor some of the feelings to which I have just alluded, I would recall to their minds the hostilities between the Indians and the early settlers of the country in their own States, and they would perhaps entertain a very different opinion. This complaint of killing the women and children of the Indians is as old as the settlement of our country, and has been reiterated year after year when we have had an Indian difficulty. It commenced with old Miles Standish in his forays against the Pequods, and it has been perpetuated to the present time. He was charged with not particularly discriminating in favor of women and children when he attacked and burnt the Indian villages, and wiped out the tribes which infested that portion of the country. Sir, go back and read the history of New England; read the terrible scenes that were perpetrated upon our soil; where the Indian women and children were slaughtered, where the brains were knocked from the babe at the mother's breast, and the father was scalped in the presence of the rest of the family.

I have had some experience with Indians; more than half of my life has been spent in direct contact with them. I have seen none of that noble, generous, and lofty character which is described by Mr. Cooper and other utopian writers on the subject. I have found them a degraded, thieving, murdering, plundering race. That is their instinct; and when they slaughter our people, when they murder them, when they rob them, they but carry out what is the instinct of their nature. The people of Colorado have been engaged in a war of this character. These volunteers are men who have been raised for the protection of their own homes; many of them have looked on the smoldering ruins of their houses, and the mutilated forms of their own wives and children lying around them; and it is not probable that under such circumstances men are very easily restrained from retaliation. Retaliation is the natural feeling of every man who witnesses calamities of that kind heaped upon his own head. During my own experience I have often witnessed such cases; and while I believe my nature is as mild as that of ordinary men, I have often thought it would be well if the whole race could be exterminated. I do not say that our Government would be justified or warranted in pursuing a course of that kind, which would be entirely inhuman; but I say there is nothing more natural to a frontiersman than to adopt such a view.

Sir, you cannot civilize the Indian. Your humanitarian objects do not reach him. I have tried myself to translate Christ's sermon on the mount to the Indians, and I have never succeeded in converting them to the excellent theories which were set forth in that very wonderful production; but I have succeeded sometimes in civilizing them with powder and ball, and that is the only remedy. It is the remedy that was adopted by the Puritans in New England, and it has been carried wherever our emigrants have traveled from the shores of Massachusetts bay to the coast of the Pacific, and to the Gulf, and to the Northwest, so far as our intercourse has extended among them.

My own State has not been the least among the sufferers from these terrible outrages. In 1840 a very excellent, pious, and worthy gentleman by the name of Whitman took his family across the Rocky mountains almost alone, and established himself in the Walla-Walla valley, about two thousand miles from the white settlements on this side, and the nearest settlements on the other side were in China and Japan, so that he was perfectly isolated from civilization. His object was to do something to elevate the Indian character. He established farms, he instituted a school, he and his wife both taught school. He gave the Indians every education in his power; he preached to them; he undertook to disseminate among them the principles and plan of salvation. He was a man actuated by the most noble and generous impulses. If God ever made a good man, I think he was one. That man remained there until the emigration commenced passing through the country. The first emigrants went there in 1842. In the winter of 1847 fifteen or twenty families of emigrants were delayed, obstructed by the snows in the mountains, and it became necessary that they should winter at Whitman's settlement, five hundred miles from the Pacific ocean. They did winter there. That year the measles broke out among the Indians. Dr. Whitman and his family were assiduous in their attentions; did everything they could to relieve them; but the Indians, to whom they had done no wrong, to whom the emigrants had done no wrong—there had never been a drop of blood shed in the valley up to that time—held a council among themselves and determined to exterminate this party, Dr. Whitman and his wife, their benefactors, and the innocent women and children who were detained there by the inclemency of the weather. One morning they came to his house in a body, and one of them pretending to be ill asked him for some medicine. While the doctor, in the exercise of the generous humanity that always animated him, was dealing out to the Indian his medicine, another approached him from behind and crushed his skull with a tomahawk. Then a general attack took place. Mrs. Whitman was shot two or three times; the women and children were murdered indiscriminately. Mrs. Whitman begged for her life, appealed to those Indians who were members of her own church, of the church that had been organized among them, and endeavored in every way to induce them to save her life after she was shot; but they were relentless, they killed every man, they killed many of the women and children, and some they kept and took into a captivity worse than death.

Sir, this is but a solitary instance within the boundaries of my own State. In 1855 the southern Indians broke out and desolated an entire district of country; they murdered men, women, and children indiscriminately, and the condition of those whom they took captive was worse than that of those whom they had murdered. I will not attempt to recount upon this floor the savage deeds of barbarity which have been perpetrated by this race within my own State. I might refer to two massacres on Boisa river of peaceable emigrants, when the poor, helpless women, attempting, almost naked, to escape, were overtaken, and the most horrible outrages perpetrated, which if I were to enumerate them here would drive every lady from these galleries. They were outrages that are not fit to be mentioned or referred to anywhere.

Under these circumstances, can you blame people who have suffered such wrongs and outrages for some feeling of retaliation? Read the history of the Oatman family. When they were crossing the plains the father and mother were murdered, and two of the children, little girls, being captured, were dragged on foot through weary miles of desert, and reduced to the most abject slavery. One of them died as the direct consequence of the severe labors imposed on her by her ruthless captors, and the other only survived to suffer worse outrages than her sister who died. I pity the man who reads that account and does not shed a tear.

This dodge of "friendly" Indians is an old one; it is one with which I am familiar. I never knew an Indian yet who when he was conquered, or was brought within the power of the white man, did not become a "friendly Indian." Indians are then always disposed to be friendly. A gentleman who crossed the plains last year told me that the men of this very tribe of Indians, for attacking whom you propose to punish Chivington, were traveling through the country exhibiting strips of white cloth with the name of the Indian upon them as a token that they were friendly; but when they found unarmed and defenseless parties on the plains they stuck this white cloth under their shirts and massacred the parties, and then when they came across forces too strong for them to overcome, they again exhibited this badge of their friendship or neutrality. These cases were of continual occurrence last year on the plains. Captain Crawford, who went over with an escort and has just returned, told me that when he arrived at Laramie he came to the conclusion, and still believes, that there was complicity between some of the Government officers and Indians in the mountains. Many Government trains last year were attacked. He told me that when he arrived at the agency he found a party who had been waiting several days for him to come up. They would not proceed as several parties had been cut off; but the interpreter told a man who was in advance of Captain Crawford with a small train that he might go on and the Indians would not disturb him. The families, the women and children of the Indians, were assembled around the agency and receiving protection and favor from the Government while the young men were out fighting and butchering our parties on the plains; and he says that every night there was a constant howl going up from that village for their young men who had been slain in the different attacks on emigrants crossing the plains. He told me that he saw one man there who was the survivor of a party of whom at the first fire six men and a boy were shot down and he was left by the Indians for dead. There were two ladies in that train and several children. The Indians captured the two ladies—the wife of this wounded man, and his daughter—and took them off. The man subsequently found his way to the fort in an exhausted and wounded condition, and he induced people to go out to hunt for his wife and daughter who had been captured by the Indians. A short distance from the creek they found his daughter killed, scalped, and a stake driven through her body. His wife is yet a prisoner among the Indians, and when Captain Crawford was there he was endeavoring to raise some people to go out to attempt to rescue his wife from the hands of her barbarous captors. Do you suppose that man, if he had the opportunity of engaging in an attack upon an Indian village, would have been restrained any more than Miles Standish was? Do you not suppose that he was perfectly imbued with the idea that it was necessary to exterminate a race who would perpetrate such outrageous and heinous crimes? I have no doubt that many of the men who participated in this alleged attack near Fort Lyon were men who were smarting under wrongs of a similar character.

Captain Crawford told me of another incident. Beyond Fort Laramie a party of Indians attacked a train and were unsuccessful. One of the chiefs was desperately wounded, but he succeeded in getting away. A white man who had at some previous time been in the employment of the Government as agent or sub-agent took him to his house, nursed him, and cared for him. The commanding officer of the military forces hearing that the Indian was there wounded, that he had been wounded in an attack on an emigrant train comprising women and children, thought that he should take means of securing him. He sent a guard there to be placed over the house, but this white man who had him in charge, and who was an accomplice doubtless in his crimes, succeeded in spiriting him away. The next thing the captain heard of this vagabond chieftain was that he was lying in the United States hospital being cared for by the Government, his wounds dressed and receiving medical aid and attention from the officers of the Army.

These are a few of the circumstances that are constantly occurring upon that route. I could enlarge upon them, but I have no desire to do so. As I said before, these outrages have been committed upon both sides. I do not pretend to say that the whites upon the frontiers are always right and the Indians always wrong. There are, doubtless, occasionally, circumstances of palliation upon either side; but I do know so far as my own experience goes, these wars of extermination have always been inaugurated by the Indians themselves, and have never been inaugurated by the white man, though he may at times have been driven to them by way of retaliation. When we find ourselves surrounded by a people who will be governed and controlled by no sort of civil policy, but who upon all occasions resort to this species of warfare; who prefer to make war upon women and children because they are defenseless, and there is less danger to be apprehended in a war of that kind, and when the only manner of restraining them is their extermination, it is a question which it is well for gentlemen to consider how far it may properly be pursued. It is well, I say, to take into consideration how far a remedy of that kind may be pursued. I would not recommend extermination under ordinary circumstances; but when men whose families have suffered barbarities and cruelties at the hands of the Indians have a chance to retaliate, I am not prepared to blame them altogether when they attack the Indian villages and put them to the fire and the sword. This is an old complaint. Miles Standish attacked the Pequods, and it was said that he did so, and that was about the earliest complaint of the butchery of women and children in this country. We heard of it again in Jackson's wars in the Southwest. I believe that at Horseshoe Bend and in some other places in Alabama, he was accused of butchering women and children in indiscriminate warfare. Sometime subsequent to that, and it is within the memory of every person here, General Harney attacked the Sioux village at Ash Hollow, and he was accused of there putting men, women, and children to death indiscriminately. The next complaint we heard of this kind, I believe, was in Connor's campaign on Bear river, where in the dead of winter he attacked the Indians who had assembled in their village, and in the fight, doubtless, some women and children were killed.

It is impossible to discriminate in such cases. When the Indians can be found in a village with their women and children, it is about the only place where they will stand so that you can get a "sight" on them. All other fights with them are in the nature of foot-races; but when they have their women and children in their villages, and have collected and deposited there the plunder they have stolen, they make generally a pretty respectable sort of stand. In a case of that kind you have an opportunity of killing the men, and doubtless, while firing into Indian lodges indiscriminately, you will sometimes kill women and children. This was the case, doubtless, in those instances which I have enumerated, and I have no doubt that when Colonel Chivington's conduct comes to be investigated you will find that these were the circumstances under which he attacked the village. The young men of that village had, doubtless, been at war, and he attacked them in the village and inflicted on them indiscriminate slaughter. As I said before, I do not attempt to justify indiscriminate slaughter, but I say there are circumstances when men cannot be restrained from it. Women and children have been killed in this war. There is scarcely a town or city which has been shelled during the war where more or less of them have not been sacrificed by the missiles which have been hurled at their residences. It is not properly a cause of complaint, because it is a thing that happens unintentionally and unavoidably under the circumstances.

I trust, Mr. President, that this resolution which proposes to inflict upon Colonel Chivington and his men punishment in advance of ascertaining what has been the character of their crime or what they have done in this matter of extermination, will not pass. I hope that time will be given for a full, free, and fair investigation. If Colonel Chivington has attacked a village of mere women and children, unprovoked, and robbed and plundered them, I should be the last man to raise my hand or voice in his defense; but if he has pursued fugitive robbers and thieves who had been depredating on that community to their village and attacked them and exterminated them, I have little sympathy for the Indians. Most of my sympathy is on the side of the white man. All the experience of my life has taught me that whatever sympathy these people may derive at the hands of transcendental philosophers and persons who are at very remote distances from them and know nothing about the circumstances existing on the frontier, my sympathy should be given to the white man, because I believe he has generally been in the right and has only resorted to this sort of retaliation as a matter of self-defense.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, I do not understand that the resolution before us proposes, as is claimed and asserted by the Senator from Oregon, any considerable punishment to the parties engaged in this so-called war. It proposes simply that the pay and compensation to which they would be entitled shall at present be reserved, and that an immediate investigation shall be had. I am in favor of that proposition. If you pay for this expedition now, or let it be paid for, you will investigate it, I undertake to say, very slowly, but if you stop the compensation and take proper steps at the beginning, you will have an additional incentive to all persons connected with the expedition to have the investigation made. I do not pretend to hold any opinion upon the merits of the proposition as to whether men, women, and children of the Indian race have been massacred in this case without provocation or cause. I think the statements made by the Senator from Iowa are sufficiently direct to require the investigation that he proposes by the resolution, and I think the step he proposes, in suspending the pay and compensation until that be done, is a very safe and practical one.

The Senator from Oregon might have entertained us further, for I confess that I was very much entertained by his speech recounting the histories of the Indian wars, particularly on the side of the question which he said claims his sympathies, especially the white man's side of the question. I have no doubt that what the honorable Senator from Oregon says in one respect is true, that there is very much false sympathy expressed for the Indians upon occasions and by persons in civilized bodies and communities; but while he gives us an account of Indian wars and barbarous and cruel massacres in his own State and in the far West, he should not forget in justice and in truth to relate what he must know of the barbarities, the cruel injustice of the white man to these poor creatures whom God has made and given as much right to live and be as he has to either the Senator or myself. Why, sir, the State that I in part represent here has been the theater of these so-called Indian wars; I will not say a thing about the Chivington war, because we know nothing about the facts of that yet; but I do know of the facts connected with the so-called Indian wars of my State, and it will not be enough for me to say that I am ashamed of them to-day: my heart has bled again and again through long years over the miserable and cruel and cowardly murders perpetrated in that State against these poor defenseless creatures.

Upon the simple allegation coming from a county in the State of California that a house had been burned by an Indian boy that lived there, and that after he set fire to the house, which of course consumed some of the inmates, he ran into the Indian country, there was an Indian war got up and carried on at the expense of the State; and eventually it came to Congress to be paid for from the national Treasury—one of the most unnecessary, cruel, and barbarous butcheries that ever was perpetrated on earth. I undertook the investigation of that war in the Legislature of the State against a powerful lobby; a lobby reeking and filled with men stamped by God with an impression that could not be mistaken by the quick instincts and intuition of any clear-minded man. When I got so far in the investigation as to prove what was the mode of warfare carried on by the leaders of companies organized of white men—I shall I call them white men or recognize their claim to belong to that race?—when I got to the point of developing their system of warfare, which was to sneak along through the mountains, where there was peace and no war, in the darkness of the night until the revealing light of the morning sun gave them an opportunity of surrounding a defenseless camp occupied in peace, then alarm the camp, and as the creatures ran shoot them down, concentrating upon them a fire from which they could not possibly escape; when I got to that point with my investigation, the investigation was silenced, the lobby became too strong, as it very often does.

There were instances there, sir, where fifty to eighty bodies were mangled and cut to pieces, ay, of men, women, and children, with tomahawks in white men's hands; and when the creatures escaped into a pond of water, as they occasionally put their heads above its surface that they might breathe and live, they were dispatched upon being discovered. If those Indians had devastated the country; if they had burned homes, as was claimed; if they had pillaged, as was claimed; if they had murdered and outraged and carried white persons into captivity, and this was retaliation, there would have been at least an excuse, if not a complete justification. But that was not the case. These wars—I am not speaking of the Oregon wars now, be it remembered, but I dare to speak of what has transpired in my own State—and I say these wars have been fomented by the miserable kind of human fungi that now hang upon the vitals of the nation making money and crying for money when no man could tell whether the nation should live or die; and they were instituted for plunder, carried on with the hand of murder, maintained by the basest cowardice that the human mind can conceive, because the blows were directed at those that could not and had not the power to strike back.

Now, sir, this is a step, I undertake to say, in the right direction; and in human nature's name I thank the honorable Senator from Iowa for proposing that for once the pay shall stop until the investigation shall be made, and that it be immediately made, and we ascertain whether this was a barbarous raid contemplating rapine and murder, and nothing else, or whether it was a justifiable act. One of its consequences is the interruption of our overland communication. I was going to say (but I will not discuss that) that I do not know that these things are necessary to the interruption of our overland mail. It is constantly interrupted; we have really no overland mail; and when it fails for want of carrying on the service, although the parties having the contract are paid for carrying it on, they make these Indian wars and disturbances on the plains an excuse. If they fail to feed their horses, if they fail to provide the means of carrying the mail, a report that the Indians have taken a station and destroyed a portion of their stock is sufficient to account for the failure of the public service in that regard.

Mr. President, we have an Indian department in this Government; we have been conducting it, I will not undertake to say how long. As the Senator from Oregon said, we have taken the country of the red man. I agree with him that it belongs to the white man, rather because it is God's and we are His children, and we can put it to the higher and better use; but we have adopted a system of taking it from the Indian, and of taking care of him; and I undertake to say that our system, adopted and carried on at an immense expense, is thus far a complete failure; that it gives us a record of men appointed to look after the Indian who take advantage of the Indian to rob him and to plunder him, to incite him to acts of outrage by robbery and starvation and then holding the Indian responsible for what shall occur.

I hope, sir, that this resolution will be adopted. It does not propose to punish anybody; it proposes to stop the pay of these parties until their conduct has been investigated, and to have that investigation made immediately. Are these men to suffer any more than our brave soldiers who are in the field, and frequently not paid for months together? Why, sir, that such a charge should be made by a Senator, that the information should come to him verified in a sufficient manner to warrant this proceeding, it seems to me, should not make a question as to the propriety of the act by the Senate. Let us resolve to take the initiative, and to take the steps necessary to see hereafter that justice be done by compelling the white man to do right as nearly as we can.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this resolution does not attack the proper place. The resolution proposes to stop the pay of the privates who, under the lead and direction of officers, did the acts which they were commanded to do, while the chief officer is not assailed at all. The Governor of the Territory called into existence by his proclamation this force for the purpose and with the direction and understanding that the pay the soldiers were to get should be the plunder taken from the Indians. This resolution proposes to stop the pay of the soldiers. It proposes to let the pay of that Governor who called them into being still go on. No proposition is made to investigate the conduct of that Governor who is under the control of the Administration, while you propose by the resolution, upon information that you have, to withhold the pay of the private soldiers acting under the direction of the officer of the Governor. It seems to me that the first persons to be attacked should be the Governor, who called these troops into being, and the officer who gave them the direction to pursue the course which they did pursue.

I cannot vote for a resolution that proposes thus to condemn the private who acts under orders, while it leaves the commander, the director of the enterprise, to receive his pay and pass no censure upon him.

I will add further, Mr. President, in reference to this matter, that, in my opinion, this is not the place to investigate and to act upon that which properly belongs to one of the Departments of the Government, over which it has full control, and which I doubt not it will investigate and then apply the proper remedy. This whole thing, as far as the military is concerned, is under the direction of the War Department, and I doubt not it will discharge its duty.

I condemn, as strongly as the Senator from California or the Senator from Iowa, this assault, if it was such as they have described, upon women and children, I care not to what race they belong. While I condemn that, if the state of fact be as they say, I must give it as my opinion that in a war with Indian tribes it is impossible to make that war effective unless you drive the warriors to the villages where their women and children are. I have no great admiration for the Indian character. You may trace the whole history of the race, and there are, I apprehend, very few instances where the Indian has respected even his benefactor when it became his interest to destroy him. My experience of them is that they are the most treacherous, the most perfidious, the falsest of all people that live on the face of the earth. Still, because that is true it does not become us to apply to them a mode of warfare that we, as a Christian and civilized people, ought never to indulge in.

But, sir, in reference to this resolution, I cannot vote for it, and I do not think it ought to be passed in the shape in which it now is. I repeat that, in my opinion, the persons who are responsible for this transaction are the Governor of the Territory and the commanding officer who directed the assault, whoever he may be. The censure and the punishment ought to fall upon them, and upon them alone. I ask the Senator from Iowa, if the soldier, after he has enlisted, is ordered by his officer or led by his officer, directed by him to make an assault upon women, upon children, upon anybody else, whether he is not guilty of insubordination if he does not obey the command of the officer? Then, sir, I do not see why it is or how it is that you can withhold the pay of the private soldier. You may withhold the pay of the officers and ought to do it; but the resolution, in my judgment, goes too far; it includes too many. I think if these charges are found to be true, there is no punishment known to our law that ought not to be inflicted on the officers who commanded and directed the expedition.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Illinois seems to assume in his argument that the private soldier is bound to execute the orders of his superior officer in war, whatever they may be; that if the officer directs him to seize little children, and dash their brains out, or shoot down defenseless women, he must obey; if he does not, he is guilty of insubordination. Sir, I do not believe in that doctrine. No court-martial in the world organized to try a private soldier for disobedience of orders or insubordination in not obeying the order of an officer to shoot down defenseless women, and seize the little infants from their breasts, and dash their brains out, would find him guilty of insubordination for refusing to obey such an order.

Mr. NESMITH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. NESMITH. Suppose a body of troops are ordered to charge an Indian village in which there are warriors, women, and children, and a soldier refuses to make the charge because he supposes that the women and children there may be killed, will that exonerate him from the punishment of the military offense?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is not the question. The question is whether, when he is called upon to attack an Indian village or make a charge, he should, with his sword or his bayonet, strike down women at the command of his officer? I say no. The rules of warfare do not require it; military law does not require it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, I think he states my proposition too broadly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps I do.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will not undertake to say how far a soldier, where he is ordered to strike down an individual, is justified in having any opinion about it; but I do say this: that where he is ordered to move in assault, he is guilty of insubordination if he refuses to obey and places that refusal upon the ground that it is dealing with women and children.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not stand here to insist that the private soldier can disobey an order to make an assault; but, sir, when he makes the assault and captures the place or the camp which he is ordered to assault, he is not bound to strike down women and children who in despair are begging their lives, at the beck or bidding of any officer, high or low.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think the point which the Senator makes is involved in the controversy here.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If my honorable friend will allow me, I was going on to refer to what I understand to be the facts of this case upon information which, while I do not avow that I know it to be true, comes from such a source that it leads me to believe that it is true; at all events, in my judgment, it raises the question sufficiently to demand an investigation to see whether it is true or not. I understand from a letter addressed and written to the city of Washington by the agent of these Indians, that he had these Indians in their lodges and encampments, under the protection of Fort Lyon, I think, and that this force, which consists, as I understand, of one hundred days' men raised in Colorado, under the command of Colonel Chivington, marched a good many miles, attacked this encampment, in which there were no Indian warriors, and put to the sword indiscriminately the women and children.

That is the statement of the agent of this tribe. I know that agent. I believe him to be a gentleman who would not state anything that he did not believe. The charge is such a severe one against Colonel Chivington and those under his command that I will not vouch for its perfect truth and say that I know it to be true, but I will vouch this much for the agent, Major Calley, who went from my State some two or three years ago, and whom I know personally very well, that he is a man of truth and veracity, who, in my opinion, would not state anything which he did not believe. Possibly he may have been misinformed, or made some mistake about it, though I do not see how he could make any such mistake; but he makes this statement under circumstances that, in my judgment, call for an investigation, and I for one am not willing to pass it over without an examination.

But to return to the exact point raised by the honorable Senator from Illinois against a portion of this resolution, that it suspends the pay of the privates as well as the officers under the command of Colonel Chivington, it seems to me no rule of military law, severe as it is, compels the private soldier when he makes an attack, and women and children plead for their lives, to put them to the sword. I know that when such attacks are made soldiers very often, in the excitement of the moment, will not stay their hands; they will sometimes put to the sword both women and children; but, sir, that they are justified in doing it I do not believe. You may say that he is guilty of insubordination if he does not slay them when ordered to do so by his commanding officer; but in my judgment he is guilty of murder before God and man if he does. For my part, under circumstances like those, I think the soldier, and even the private soldier, should choose to be insubordinate and run the risk of punishment rather than be guilty, and have the blood of murder on his hands in the destruction of the lives of women and children.

Now, Mr. President, I understand the whole effect of this resolution to be, not to establish a charge of guilt against Colonel Chivington and the officers and men under his command, but simply to say that such information has come before the Senate and the country that we think there ought to be an investigation, and that until such an investigation has been had by the proper Department, the resolution would seem to imply that the investigation is to be made by the War Department, the pay of the officers in command of the expedition, as well as of the private soldiers, should be suspended. It does not assume that the Senate shall pass upon the question, and the Senate stop the pay of these officers and men, but requests the Secretary of War to examine into the case, and not to pay the troops engaged in this expedition until he shall have examined it and ascertained fully what the circumstances were, and whether the expedition was justifiable, and then having the matter under his control he will make the payments.

Mr. President, it is not from any overweening sympathy in behalf of the Indian race that I stand here to plead for the adoption of this resolution; I do not deny that I feel a sympathy for that race, for I look upon it as a dying race. Such has been its history from the beginning of the Government to the present time. It is dying through natural causes growing out of its contact with a superior race inhabiting the same country. There are causes which are at once set in operation, moral causes, physical causes, and the warfare when once begun between civilized and savage life becomes an eternal and irrepressible conflict which, in the very nature of things, will only cease when the savage life ceases. Why, sir, if you look at the state of Indian affairs anywhere in this country, even where large settlements have never been attempted by the white men, if you go into the Hudson's Bay territory, where there are one hundred and forty thousand Indians and not over three thousand white men, with perhaps six or eight thousand half breeds, you will find that the Indian race is dying even from that contact with the European race. The very contact of the races produces this result.

But, sir, while I believe this, while I look upon them as a race that is passing away, while I believe the time is coming, and rapidly coming, when the only trace that will be left of the Indian race will be the beautiful names which they leave to our towns and rivers, when they shall have disappeared, in all human probability, from the continent, yet I am unwilling that the flag and the Government of the United States shall be stained by any outrages such as it is alleged have been perpetrated by Colonel Chivington and the men under his command in this expedition. Therefore, sir, while I am as slow, I believe, as most persons to pass judgment in the absence of a hearing or the absence of a trial, upon the conduct of any officer, civil or military, yet I believe that in this case the facts are presented in such a manner that an investigation ought to be had, and I further believe that there ought to be a suspension in the payment of these hundred days' troops until the Secretary of War is satisfied with their action; and that I understand to be the substance of this resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I do not intend to resist the passage of this resolution in some form. I think that one portion of the resolution is perfectly proper. I am certainly in favor of so much of it as proposes to direct the Secretary of War to order an investigation. The other portion of the resolution implies that we have already brought in a verdict to a sufficient extent to induce us to direct the suspension of the payment of these troops. I do not object to that simply on account of the pay. The suspension of the thirteen dollars a month is not the point with me; but that implies that we have adjudged the case far enough to recommend that. I am not prepared to go that far.

I know Colonel Chivington by reputation very well, and I have a slight personal acquaintance with him. The latter part of this resolution goes on the presumption that he has committed great wrong, because it brings in a verdict of that kind. I can see very well how I can ask to have an investigation upon these charges, but I do not see how I am called upon to vote as if I had made up my mind that he was guilty. Colonel Chivington is a man who has sustained all his life not only an excellent, but I think I may say an enviable, reputation. From early manhood he has been a minister of the Methodist church, not a church with which I am connected, but a church for which I have a very high respect. He was presiding elder in that church when he entered the military service.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator will allow me,

I have been informed, and I think it is true, that this gentleman was at one time a minister in the Methodist church, but he was suspended and dismissed from the church, and he is now not even a member.

Mr. POMEROY. Then he has been dismissed since he entered the military service, for when he came on to Washington a short time ago he preached in a Methodist church and officiated as a minister.

I only mention that as prima facie evidence of his having had a good character. Governor Evans, a man distinguished for his philanthropy and kindness and religion, not only strongly recommended Colonel Chivington, but has indorsed his act since it has been reported to have been committed; and I notice that the papers in that Territory speak in the highest terms of Colonel Chivington. I take the Mountain News and two or three of their papers. They speak in the highest terms even of this act of Colonel Chivington. He was a candidate for Congress at the late election, and was elected by a large majority, and if they had not voted against a State organization he would now, I suppose, be representing that State in the House of Representatives. That, I claim, is another reason why it is to be presumed that he is a man of good character and good standing. The presumption is that a man of such a character and such a standing would not commit such an outrageous act as the one alleged unless there were some provocation and some controlling circumstances that have not yet come to the knowledge of the Senate.

This Indian war on that line from the Missouri river to California has been kept up for a whole year. Citizens from my own town, my own neighbors, were murdered there last year; and there were brought to my own town and my own house, when I was at home lately, little children with their fingers cut off, with their ears cut off, and one with his nose cut off by Indians on that line.

There are controlling circumstances, in my opinion, that have not yet come to the knowledge of the country or of the Committee on Indian Affairs; and it is on that account that I ask that a verdict and judgment may be suspended and that only an investigation may be ordered. I know that Colonel Chivington and every man there will not shrink from an investigation. But to have the case prejudged, to have the Senate declare that their pay shall be suspended as if they were criminals, before they have been heard, I say is going faster than I am prepared to go in this case. Colonel Chivington is the colonel of the third Colorado regiment. I do not know of his being colonel of any one hundred days' men called into service by a proclamation of the Governor. There may be such men in the command, but he is in the volunteer service of the Government, amenable to a court-martial, and the regular proceedings under a court-martial.

For these reasons I shall ask that the resolution be amended, by striking out so much of it as relates to the suspension of the pay of the officers and men, thus confining it to a request to the Secretary of War to order an investigation. I do this, not because there is any particular value in the pay that I am speaking of, but because if I vote for the resolution as it stands it commits me to a decision of guilty in the case; it supposes that the Senate are ready to pronounce a verdict of that character; we at least recommend that much. I think that as far as we can safely go is to order an investigation, and let that be as thorough and as rigid as the Secretary of War or the Committee on Indian Affairs may desire.

I will not pursue these remarks further, but will now submit a motion that the resolution be amended, by striking out so much of it as relates to the suspension of the officers and men.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section one, line three, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out the following words:

Be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the suspension of all pay and allowances to each of the members of the third Colorado regiment, officers, privates, and employees, and all others engaged in the recent attack made on the Cheyenne Indians, in their village near Fort Lyon, in the Territory of Colorado, under the command of Colonel Chivington, until the conduct of said Colonel Chivington, the members of said third Colorado regiment, officers, privates, and employees, and all others engaged in said attack, shall severally receive the approval of the said Secretary of War; and that the said Secretary.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. If it should be it will defeat the effectiveness of the resolution. The parties, who are chiefly hundred days' men, will probably be mustered out of the service in a very short time and receive their pay, and will disperse in the mines in the mountains, where it will be impossible to inflict on them any punishment if they be found guilty of misconduct.

I wish, in connection with this remark, to state an additional fact which aggravates the case if investigation should establish the truth of the statements which have come to the knowledge of the committee. The Governor of Colorado some months ago issued a proclamation inviting the peaceable Indians to collect together in places indicated, so as to be separated from the hostile members of tribes and the hostile tribes, for the purpose of receiving the protection of the soldiery, and in order that they might not suffer in any contemplated conflict of arms. These Indians, as we are informed, convened at this camp in the vicinity of Fort Lyon in pursuance of this invitation of the Governor. Having convened there in pursuance of the invitation of the civil authority of that Territory, where they were almost immediately assailed by the soldiery and massacred, it seems to me, if unexplained, it affords a picture of bad faith and depravity unparalleled in human history. This was not intended, doubtless, by the Governor; but how will it appear to the Indian tribes? Here the Governor of the Territory invites the peaceable Indians to separate themselves from the hostile Indians in order that they may be protected; and when they are fairly settled down in their camps in pursuance of this invitation the armed white men fall on them and massacre them.

If these allegations shall prove to be true, as the committee fear will be the case, and the perpetrators should go unpunished, it will disgrace the nation in the eyes of all just and honorable men. I know that Indians have committed outrages; they are savages, and often commit grievous wrongs; but it seems to me that that is sufficiently answered by the fact that we are not savages and should not follow their bad example. If we are not savages, we must not follow in their bloody footsteps.

Mr. WILSON. I move to strike out the word "privates" wherever it occurs in the resolution, so that it shall apply to the officers alone who are responsible. I think it is the duty of the privates to obey their officers. Our laws on that subject are very severe indeed. I think the responsibility attaches to the officers for this act. If we will strike out the privates and apply it to the officers I think it will be just and proper; but to apply it to the privates it seems to me would be to punish men who were acting under orders, and who would be shot down on the spot if they did not obey those orders.

Mr. HARLAN. I hope this amendment to the amendment may not be adopted, for this reason: it is clear, the committee think, that these privates came back laden with the loot, the fruits of this outrage and massacre, and thus connected themselves directly and criminally with the wrong. Had they simply obeyed orders and fired on these helpless creatures, there would be a palliation in the fact that they only obeyed orders, but those orders surely would not justify them in plundering the victims of the cruelty and carrying off this loot and parading it in the capital of the Territory as evidence of their prowess. The privates, it is said, came back laden with this plunder; and if it is just in relation to the officers it is just in relation to them, that the pay should be suspended until the facts can be clearly ascertained. If on investigation it shall appear that they did not connect themselves with these outrages, and are not guilty of intentional wrong, of course they will receive their pay. But then they have this plunder in their possession. They have no right to it; and one portion of the resolution directs the Secretary of War to seize it and hold it for the use of the Federal Government, or, if it should appear that the act was unwarrantable, that it shall be returned to the tribe from which it was taken; that restitution shall be made to the living part of this tribe of the plunder taken from their slaughtered comrades, and thus impress them with the conviction that the outrage was unauthorized, and that they will be treated justly by the Federal authorities.

Mr. FARWELL. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts should go further. I suppose it is as much the duty of the subordinate officers to obey the orders of the commanding officer as it is of the privates, and consequently he should move to amend the resolution by striking out all but the commanding officer, to carry out his idea.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to punish all the officers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. TEN Eyck in the chair.) The question will be on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to modify the portion of the joint resolution proposed to be stricken out by striking out the word "privates."

Mr. POMEROY. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts not now being in order, as the amendment that I moved is pending, I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts as a modification of my own motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is in order to move to modify that portion of the original resolution which it is proposed to strike out, before the vote is taken on striking out.

Mr. POMEROY. I will accept the modification suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, thus confining the operation of the resolution simply to the officers.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I do not think that this resolution, particularly in its present form, ought to pass. If this Colonel Chivington is guilty of the conduct indicated in the papers which have been read by the Senator from Iowa, he deserves the severest punishment. But, sir, I am not in favor of punishing any man without giving him a full and fair trial. I think, if the resolution is to pass, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts should first be adopted, because certainly the privates who obey orders in making a charge of the character indicated by the Senator from Iowa are not to blame.

Sir, I think the Senator from Iowa has done well in bringing this matter to the consideration of the Senate. I think it is the duty of this Senate when they are informed of such outrages on the part of any of our military commanders, by resolve, or otherwise, to call the attention of the executive department of the Government to them, and to demand that they be tried before the proper tribunals and punished. If this Colonel Chivington is guilty of the conduct stated by the Senator from Iowa he deserves to be tried before a military court and shot to death. If the facts stated in the papers which have been read to the Senate are true, that he with his command made an assault upon friendly Indians under the protection of our flag, knowing them to be such, killed them and took away their property, he is guilty of murder, peculation, and robbery, and deserves to die by the sentence of a military court.

I think it would have been better if the Senator from Iowa had introduced a resolution setting forth the facts, and asking the President or Secretary of War to appoint a military commission to investigate them, and if they found them true to inflict upon this man the punishment he deserves; and if they find them untrue, let them by a verdict of acquittal relieve our flag from the disgrace that would attach to it in consequence of the murder and robbery indicated in the papers that have been read.

But, sir, I do not think that Colonel Chivington or anybody else should be punished until his guilt has been made manifest before a legal tribunal. If the Senator will draw up a preamble embodying the facts set forth in the papers that he has caused to be read, and will then follow it up by a resolution requesting the President, or directing the Secretary of War to convene a military court, and try him and punish him if guilty, I will vote for it with the greatest pleasure. But here, by the terms of this resolution, the pay of the privates of this regiment is stopped, because they were led to this awful charge by their commanding officer. Why, sir, if these soldiers had not obeyed the orders of their superior they would have been liable to be and perhaps would have been punished in the severest manner. It is the officer who leads that is guilty; and I would not take away the pittance you give to the poor soldier. I would punish the officer for such conduct in the harshest possible manner; but I never would punish him without first trying him before a legally constituted court, and having him convicted by that court.

I know nothing of this Colonel Chivington. I do not remember ever to have heard his name before the honorable Senator from Iowa introduced these papers to the notice of the Senate. The Senator from Kansas says he knows him, and that he is a man of the most estimable character. I dare say that is all true.

Mr. POMEROY. I said he was at the time I knew him. I have not known him for the last few years.

Mr. POWELL. I know nothing and care nothing about him; but I do know this: that if an officer of the American Army leads on the regiment he commands to such deeds as are indicated by the papers read by the Senator from Iowa, he is a murderer, a robber, and a public plunderer, and deserves to be sentenced and shot to death by a military court in obedience to the military law, if, under the military law, the punishment is death.

But, sir, this colonel, I dare say, is an honorable gentleman. The presumptions are all in his favor. The presumption of the law is that every man is innocent until his guilt is made manifest. I say not one word against Colonel Chivington. I know nothing about him. But, sir, I would not punish him; I would pass no resolve that would indicate that he had acted improperly by administering any punishment, however gentle it may be, such as the stopping of his pay, until he had been properly tried and sentenced to punishment. Do that, and all will be well.

We have had enough of this kind of thing in this country of late years, of arresting and punishing men without trial or without charge against them. I know the Senator from Iowa has read charges against this officer, but the accused has had no chance to confront and to meet them. If he is guilty you do yourself a manifest injustice by inflicting any punishment upon him until you have made that guilt manifest. Besides, if he is guilty, the stoppage of his pay is a punishment altogether too light for such crimes as are charged against him. If we do anything let us pass a resolution requesting the proper authorities to order a court of inquiry upon the case. I know that we have no power to do that; but it is within our legitimate province, and we are recreant to our high duties unless we do call the attention of the executive department of the Government to such offenses, and request that the guilty parties be arraigned, tried, and punished in obedience to law.

I have, then, two objections to the resolution. First, I do not think the poor privates ought to be embraced in it, and hence I shall vote for the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. If it were amended in that form I could not still vote for it, because you so far adjudge the case as to inflict punishment on this colonel without his being heard; you adjudge him so far as to stop his pay. That may be a matter of great importance to him.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The subordinate officers are in the same condition.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Rhode Island suggests that the subordinate officers are in the same catalogue with this colonel. If there be guilt, Colonel Chivington is the guilty one; he is the man I wish to see punished, provided he is guilty; but I hope, for the honor of the flag of my country, that when the investigation is made, which I hope will be made, he will prove himself innocent of this most outrageous plunder and murder. But, sir, if he should be found by the proper legal tribunal guilty, then, in order to vindicate the majesty of the law, in order to vindicate our name and keep our flag from dishonor, he should be punished to the very extent of the law.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, exceptional crimes require exceptional remedies. Here is an exceptional crime; one of the most atrocious in the history of any country. There must be an exceptional remedy to a certain extent commensurate with the exceptional character of the crime. And, sir, the remedy, in order to be anything but a name, ought to have something of swiftness in it. It must not wait the slow ceremonies of ordinary proceedings. It must have promptitude such as can be given to it by this proposition now under consideration. I thank the Senator from Iowa for bringing it forward; let us vote upon it, put it on its passage, speed it on its way, for only by doing so can we wash our hands of this intolerable atrocity.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Massachusetts says he would be swift to punish. Suppose that Colonel Chivington and the men under his command should prove upon trial to be innocent; then the Senator's remedy would be swift to do injury. Sir, I am in favor of being swift to punish; but never, never would I punish swiftly or tardily until the party accused had been arraigned before a proper tribunal and found guilty. That is the difference between the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and myself. He is swift to punish before the party has been tried and adjudged guilty; I would only be swift to punish after the party had been tried before a legally constituted tribunal and found guilty.

Sir, propose your resolution to have this man, upon the papers you have got, ordered instantly under arrest, and request the President, the Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, or direct your Secretary of War, if you please, to arraign him before a military tribunal and try him, and if he be found guilty I would be the last man to ask that he be exempt from any punishment inflicted under the law. I know, and the Senator from Massachusetts knows, that the conduct charged by these papers against this Colonel Chivington, if true, will under the military law condemn him to death. If they are true, he is guilty of murder, which would consign him to death under the law; he is guilty of plunder and pillage, and pillage under the military law is punished by death, or by any other punishment that a court-martial may choose to inflict. Almost every count (if I may use that term) in the charges against this person, under the military law would consign him, if guilty, to death.

Sir, I would not prejudice any man. I would give him a fair and impartial trial, and if found guilty, then I would be swift in my punishment, but not till then. In my judgment, if you pass this resolution you will do this man a manifest injustice; you will do yourselves greater injustice; for the Senate of the United States ought to be governed not only by the dictates of humanity, but by the laws of the land. Every man is presumed to be innocent until his guilt appears or is made manifest before some legal tribunal. There is no such establishment of guilt against this man. I admit that without establishment of guilt you can proceed so far as to arrest and arraign him, but no further can you go. You cannot legally make that arrest in the civil courts except there is probable cause shown in the affidavit; but under the military law you have a right to make out your charges and arraign this man and try him.

I know nothing whatever of this Colonel Chivington; and it does not matter whether I know him or not. He may be guilty. I fear for the honor of my country that he is guilty; for the statements that the Senator from Iowa has brought to the attention of the Senate from Government authorities seem to indicate that all is not right in that direction. I by no means wish to censure the Senator from Iowa for bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate. I think that he has acted well in that. He has been governed by high dictates of justice and humanity, and for that I commend him. I do not think he is pursuing the proper and legal course to reach the evil of which he complains; and that is the only thing in which I think he is in fault.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the Senator makes a strong case by his statement of facts. He argues on the presumption that this proposition is a punishment, presuming that these parties are guilty, when the reverse is true. The resolution proposes that the pay shall be suspended and the plunder taken into custody of the officers of the United States, and thus—

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, it would not be so much punishment as it would be an implication of guilt. When the Senate of the United States act in this matter by solemnly passing this resolve, it certainly is an indication of guilt; for the presumption is that this honorable body would not proceed and stop this man's pay unless there was some guilt made manifest to them.

Mr. HARLAN. I have yet to learn that the suspension of pay is regarded by soldiers or officers as a punishment. In a mere civil proceeding, the officers of the court frequently take possession of the property which is the object of the litigation. It may be an inconvenience to the real owner, but to secure the ends of justice you are compelled to seize the property and hold it until the case shall have been tried. In criminal proceedings or proceedings smacking of fraud, you are frequently under the necessity of taking possession of the party implicated, the person involved in the controversy. To that extent it may be an inconvenience; but if the Senator's logic is correct as applied to this case, it would suspend all the preliminary proceedings in every criminal case and many civil cases. If a party is about to dispose of his property for the purpose of defrauding a creditor, you have the right to seize the property and hold it subject to the final order of the court after a full hearing. So if an individual is alleged to have committed a wrong of a criminal character, you seize his person and retain him in custody until the case is tried. I have yet to learn that any lawyer of reputation has maintained that you have already adjudged the case when you arrest the individual who is charged, and retain him in custody for the purposes of a trial. These personal inconveniences are sometimes necessary to secure the ends of justice.

So it is in the present case. The committee believe, and I believe, that these parties have violated the law, have violated their duty, have committed a flagrant outrage; and this resolution, if adopted, proposes that the pay to these parties shall be suspended for a temporary purpose until the case can be heard, that the plunder which it is alleged they have secured from these victims shall be retained in the custody of the officers of the Government until a final adjudication shall be had, and then if it shall prove to have been properly taken from these Indians, it will of course, revert to the Government, will belong to the Government; if otherwise, it ought to be restored to the parties from whom it has been plundered. This is the whole case. If it was really adjudging the case and proposing the punishment of these parties in advance of a hearing, I would vote as the Senator from Kentucky suggests, but I submit it does not partake of that nature. It is merely a preliminary proceeding necessary in order to secure the ends of justice in the case at bar.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no doubt the Senator from Ohio is right in that view, that his answer is a perfect one to what has been said by the Senator from Kentucky, that this resolution assumes the guilt of these parties. It does not make the assumption; but it does assume to say that such guilt has been charged, and we believe the question has been raised to such an extent that there ought to be an inquiry to see whether guilt exists or not, but that in the mean time the pay of these hundred days' troops should be suspended.

There is another reason, which in my judgment is a very strong one, why this resolution ought to be adopted. There is a constant tendency on the part of the men in command of our military forces in the neighborhood of Indian tribes, without any direct order or authority from the Government here at Washington, to commence a warlike expedition. Before it was known by the Indian department that any such policy had been adopted, the Navajos, as a nation, consisting of about ten thousand men, were captured in the mountains in New Mexico and brought over and placed upon the Pecos river.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say a word at this point?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish simply to state at this point that in my opinion, and I think I am right, the Navajos were never captured, but the military department or power there simply entered into a speculation of feeding the women and children while the Navajos in fact were out fighting us as much as they ever have been since.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will not go into the details and principles of that matter in reply to what is said by the Senator from California, as it would lead me from the question now before us; but I desire to state—

Mr. CONNESS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not desire to lead him from the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What I desire to say is this, that these military expeditions, which cost the Government from one to two and three and five million dollars, are sometimes undertaken by military commanders who have forces under their command in the neighborhood of Indian tribes, and in this way wars are inaugurated which entail upon us an expenditure of millions upon millions. I think it is well to adopt a resolution having a bearing like the present one, where we have a case presented like the present, to suspend the pay of these men until we can ascertain whether this conduct is really approved by the War Department or not.

It was said by the honorable Senator from Iowa, and there are statements coming to us which lead us to believe that it may be so, that there is a new expedition now organized against the Camanches, the most powerful of all the Indian tribes, with more than three thousand warriors, perhaps the best horsemen in the world, like the Arabs on the plains; a war which, if it once be inaugurated and undertaken and prosecuted, will cost this Government perhaps twenty million dollars before it is ended. It is time that the country should wake up to these military expeditions inaugurated, in my judgment, without the direct authority of the War Department here at Washington, against these Indian tribes, involving these wars, these expenses, and all the inhumanity, too, which follows.

But, Mr. President, I am content, so far as this resolution is concerned, that it shall be adopted in its present form, not to charge guilt upon Colonel Chivington, but simply to say that such facts have come to the knowledge of the Senate that it is desirable that further proceedings, at all events, in the payment of these troops, shall be suspended until the Secretary of War has an opportunity to look into the case, and shall either approve or disapprove of the conduct of Colonel Chivington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The question is on the pending amendment. The Senator from Kansas moves to strike out from the bill a certain clause which has been read. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out, by striking out the word "privates" wherever it occurs, which is first in order, by way of perfecting the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand that to be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It cannot be accepted. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out the word "privates" wherever it occurs.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. POMEROY. I accepted in the amendment which I offered the modification of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that; but it is not competent for a Senator moving to strike out certain words to accept a modification of the words proposed to be stricken out.

Mr. POMEROY. I knew it was not competent except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate have decided it, and negatived the proposition.

Mr. POMEROY. I said at the time that I thought it could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. You could not get that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to strike out certain words in the first section, which will be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Be, and he is hereby, directed to cause the suspension of all pay and allowances to each of the members of the third Colorado regiment, officers, privates, and employees, and all others engaged in the recent attack made on the Cheyenne Indians, in their village, near Fort Lyon, in the Territory of Colorado, under the command of Colonel Chivington, until the conduct of said Colonel Chivington, the members of said third Colorado regiment, officers, privates, and employees, and all others engaged in said attack, shall severally receive the approval of the said Secretary of War; and that the said Secretary.

So that the section will read:

That the Secretary of War shall cause all ponies, blankets, money, jewels, furs, and other property, captured from said Indians in said expedition, to be seized and held for the use of the United States, or for restitution to said Indians should it hereafter appear that said attack was unjustifiable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is for the Senate to decide as to the consistency of the words remaining if the proposition to strike out shall be carried.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to be informed whether or not—I have heard statements made either way and both ways here—these soldiers were three months' men, ninety days' men, hundred days' men, or whether they are soldiers regularly enlisted for a period of three years. Does any one know?

Mr. HARLAN. The information which the committee have received lead them to believe that the most of the men, perhaps nearly all, were hundred days' men, and probably will be mustered out of service in a few days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to strike out the words which have been read.

The motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to move to take up a bill in order to make it the special order for Tuesday or Wednesday next: I will say Wednesday next. It is Senate bill No. 213, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to provide for the adjustment and satisfaction of claims of American citizens for spoiliations committed by the French prior to the 31st of July, 1801.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to proceed to the consideration of the French spoliation bill with a view of making it a special order.

The motion was not agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 94) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. WADE submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

A message from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, informed the House that he had approved and signed bill of the House No.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1865.

595, to amend an act entitled "An act for the punishment of crime in the District of Columbia," approved March 2, 1831.

SUPPRESSION OF TELEGRAPHIC DISPATCHES.

Mr. KASSON. I ask unanimous consent to present a communication from Samuel Wilkeson, Washington editor of the New York Tribune, calling attention to a subject of great importance to the press; and I ask that, by general consent, it be read.

There being no objection, the communication was received, and was read, as follows:

The undersigned represents to the Congress of the United States that he is the Washington editor of the New York Tribune; that as such he sent on three different days within the current week to the office of the American Telegraph Company in this city, for transmission to the Tribune in New York, telegrams announcing the removal of General Butler from the command of the army of the James; that these telegrams were not sent but were suppressed; that your petitioner has been informed that they were suppressed by an order issued from the War Department; that your petitioner has reason to believe that a censorship of newspaper telegrams has been established in the city of Washington without law, and that the same is exercised therein without responsibility, in violation of the freedom of the press, to the injury of lawful business, in violation of the rights of property, and in nullification of law.

Your petitioner further represents that this suppression of the news of the removal of General Butler extended to and included the telegrams, announcing the same, sent to all the newspapers in the northern and western States by their representatives resident in Washington; and that, while this censorship and suppression were in force in Washington, the agent of one New York newspaper at the headquarters of the army of the Potomac had free let and license accorded to him to send to his paper full accounts of the said removal of General Butler, with extended comments thereon; which license he improved, and thereby secured for and gave to his paper a monopoly of said news over all the papers of the United States, to the unjust interference with business and the violation of equity.

Your petitioner therefore prays for the passage of a law which shall place the right to use the telegraph on the same ground with the right to use the mails, and that shall punish interference with and interruption or suppression of this right as law now punishes suppression or interruption of and interference with the right to use the mails of the United States.

SAMUEL WILKESON.

Washington, January 12, 1865.

The communication was, on motion of Mr. KASSON, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. THAYER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CONSIDERATION OF PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the morning hour, shall be set apart for private business, and be considered objection day. That will probably be the only opportunity we shall have to consider private business.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the enrollment act as to provide that all persons liable to the draft, who shall hereafter volunteer, shall be credited to the town in which they are enrolled; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

VENTILATION OF THE HALLS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. Speaker, I move that by unanimous consent the House take from the Speaker's table, for action at this time, the concurrent resolution from the Senate that the joint committee on ventilation and improvement of the Halls of Congress be authorized to examine witnesses and employ a reporter, and that the members of the committees of the two Houses upon Public Buildings and Grounds be added to the said joint committee upon ventilation, &c., for the purpose of deciding upon any plan or proposition of improvement which may be before said committee for consideration.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY OF DAKOTA.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to provide for a geological and scientific examination of a part of Dakota Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

VIRGINIA CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for changing the time for holding circuit courts in the district of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADDITIONAL PENSIONS.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, moved that the bill in reference to additional pensions for the widows of Generals Whipple, Baker, and Berry, heretofore laid upon the table, be taken up and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT OVER—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a motion, but before doing so I will, with unanimous consent, make a single remark. I intend to move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, so as to give the Committee of Ways and Means an opportunity to occupy the whole of to-morrow in the preparation of the appropriation bills. The morning previous to the meeting of the House does not suffice for the work we have to do, and it is necessary that we should have to-morrow. I propose the House shall take a holiday and that the committee shall work all day to-morrow. I therefore move that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from the Toledo district of Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] who has in special charge the special order—the constitutional amendment question—when he expects to bring us to a vote upon it. There are some of us who have business which will call us out of the city.

Mr. ASHLEY. After consultation with the friends of the measure on both sides of the House last night, we concluded to postpone the vote for a fortnight at least.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. If that can be so arranged I shall not object to adjourning over to-morrow.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. After the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROLLINS] concludes his remarks I hope the gentleman from Ohio will make a motion to postpone the subject until a given day.

Mr. ASHLEY. In accordance with the request I will now move that after to-day the further consideration of this question be postponed until Friday, two weeks from to-day, after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Unless the House sets aside private business, this day will be devoted to the consideration of that business.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. STEVENS to adjourn over until Monday, and it was agreed to.

POSTPONEMENT OF PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that private business be postponed for to-day.

Mr. HALE. We have had no day this session for private business. I think we ought to have one day, and hence I am opposed to the motion. I hope the gentleman will not press it. The motion to postpone was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move that the further consideration of the special order be postponed after to-day until next Tuesday two weeks, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the business in which the House was engaged at the adjournment yesterday, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House on the 15th of last June rejected a joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, on which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROLLINS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a few observations to the House upon the important proposition now pending before the final vote is taken upon it. The remarks which I shall make will be rather in the nature of a personal explanation than any elaborate argumentation of this question. At the last session of Congress when the vote was taken upon this proposition I voted against it. On this occasion when the vote is taken I propose to vote for it. I have changed my views in reference to the expediency of this measure; and while I do not suppose that anything I may say will have any influence whatever in changing the vote of any gentleman upon this floor, I am satisfied with the reasons which have induced me to change my opinion and my action; and it is perhaps due to myself, humble as I am, due to those I represent and who take any interest in the opinions which I may entertain or express here, to present to the House and the country some of the considerations which have induced me to change my action and my vote.

Mr. Speaker, I entertain the same opinion to-day in regard to the rebellion that I have ever done. I feel the same animosity, the same hatred, the same contempt for it now, and for those who initiated it, as I did when it was first put on foot. Indeed, I may say, sir, that, looking at the consequences which it has produced in my own State and throughout the country, I am less inclined to-day than ever to look upon it with any degree of forbearance. Regarding it always without excuse or justification I am inclined to the opinion to-day that there was not even the shadow of a shade of pretext for putting on foot this infamous and disastrous rebellion.

But, sir, heretofore, and even now, I have acted with that body of men who are disposed to pursue a conciliatory policy with a view to obtain the high object we all had in view, and that was the preservation of the Constitution and the salvation of the Union. When I say I have been acting with that class of men who desire to pursue a conciliatory policy, I do not mean to say that I have not ever been in favor of an earnest prosecution of this war; but I mean to say that I desire to blend the two, war and the olive-branch; the olive-branch always in front of the sword, and a constant appeal to the intelligent public sentiment of the South that it was not the object of the Government to oppress, but that it was the high and noble purpose of the Representatives of the people and of the United States Government to extend and secure to them all the rights which they can rightfully claim under the Constitution of our fathers. It is my firm conviction that we have not enough pursued a conciliatory policy; not enough tried to impress on the public mind of the masses of the South the true objects we all have in view in the prosecution of this war. And while I am not disposed to say to-day that a different line of policy would have brought about a different result, would have had the effect of putting down the rebellion, to have stopped this unfortunate war, to have sustained the Government, I am sure such a policy would have done no harm; that the effect would have been good; that at all events it would have resulted in consolidating the Union sentiment in the loyal States of the Union, and checked to a great extent the collision of sentiment and consequent diversity of action which has occurred among Union men.

I have been surprised, Mr. Speaker, that the distinguished men who have charge of the Government have not stopped long enough to listen to the suggestions of plain and humble men in regard to this question. Sir, if I had occupied the high position of the President of the United States, even now recently, I would have made every soldier in Sherman's army the bearer of a message of peace and good will to the humblest men in the humblest cabins in the State of Georgia. He then had an opportunity of reaching that distant population. I judge the people from my own experience. I know how the masses of the common people have been deluded and misled by their traitorous leaders. I have seen the effect of this thing around me at my own home, and I know the influence which such appeals, coming from those in authority, have upon the minds of the masses of the common people of the country; and I believe to-day that if such a line of policy had been pursued, and if the minds of the people of Georgia could be reached, it would be but a short time before the Administration of this Government would have a stronger and more powerful party among the people of that State than Davis himself!

Mr. Speaker, I have another general observation to make. In all my action as a Representative upon this floor it has never been my purpose to pursue a course either for the preservation or for the destruction of the institution of slavery. I have had a higher and a nobler object in view, for I regard it a more high and noble object to preserve this free Constitution of ours, to preserve our noble and happy form of government, to preserve the union of these States, than any question connected with the preservation or destruction of African slavery upon this continent. That has been a secondary and subordinate consideration altogether compared with the better purpose which I have just named; and in every vote that I have given, whether tending to weaken the institution of slavery or to strengthen that institution, it has been cast after considering the question, how far will this or that measure tend to strengthen the Government and to preserve the Constitution and the Union?

"To be, or not to be, that is the question."

Sir, if I could save this Constitution and this Union by preserving the institution of slavery in its present status in the various States I would do it most cheerfully. Perhaps I would go further than many of my friends on the other side of the House: if I could save the Constitution of my country and the union of these States even by extending the institution of slavery, I would do it. And why? Not because I am the especial friend of the institution of slavery, but because I regard as the paramount and most important question of the times the preservation of our own liberties, of our own Constitution and free Government. And, sir, I accept also the other view of the proposition: if I could save the Constitution and the Union by the partial destruction of slavery I would partially destroy it; and if I could save the Constitution and Union of my country by the total destruction of slavery—cutting it up by the roots, cutting out the cancer at once—I most unquestionably would do it; for I regard the preservation of these as paramount to and far higher than any question affecting the freedom or slavery of the African race upon this continent. In other words, I adopt precisely the sentiment so felicitously expressed by the President of the United States in a letter which he addressed to Mr. Greeley more than two years ago; and, in order to refresh the minds of these gentlemen who are pleased to give me their attention, I desire to read one or two sentences from that letter. It expresses the correct views, as I think, that all men who aim at the preservation of the Government should adhere to. The President said:

"My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and is not either to save or to destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all slaves I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the colored race, I do because I believe it helps to save this Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause."

That was the disposition of the President two years ago. That was my position two years ago; that is my position now. And what I propose to do now in the vote which I shall give upon this proposition, is simply because I believe that ultimately it will tend to save the Union; and to do that I am willing to do more now than I have heretofore done. When I cast the vote which I did before upon this proposition, I had no doubt in regard to the power of Congress to submit this amendment to the States; and the vote I gave at that time was given on the ground of expediency alone. For at that time, as I have stated, I was in favor of pursuing a more conciliatory policy. I believed at that time that by pursuing such a course and assuring the people of the South that our object was to preserve their rights under the Constitution they might be induced to return. And I was willing that they should return with the institution of slavery preserved as it then existed in different States of this Union. And I believe now that if political events had taken a different direction from what they have taken in all probability those States would be invited to return with all their rights, and along with the rest their right to the institution of slavery.

And I will make this further remark, that it was this general leading consideration that induced me to support the distinguished and patriotic man who was nominated for the Presidency in opposition to the present President. It was because I believed the one would offer and be satisfied with more liberal terms than the other, and that there would therefore be in all probability a better chance of preserving the Constitution and the Government under the administration of that man than by a continuance of the administration of Mr. Lincoln. But I confess here to-day that when I look at all the changes which would have necessarily resulted from a change of Administration, in its men and its policies, I am inclined to doubt whether, under all the circumstances, the people have not at last acted more wisely than I did. I do not claim to be infallible.

While I do not take the voice of the majority, however large, as the sole rule of my action, I am always willing to defer to it, and to treat with respect the opinions of a majority of the people of my country. It has been intimated here that perhaps there are some gentlemen who incline to change their views and action in reference to this important subject because the current seems to set in that direction. Now, if I believed that I was governed by any such consideration as that I should despise myself. I never have been a man to seek out the direction of the popular current upon which to set sail in my feeble bark. It is the pride of my public life that I have nearly always been in a minority, at home and in the nation. I never had an opportunity hardly to know how a man feels in the majority! And I have some pride in regard to it, because I believe that, as a general rule, there is more public virtue, more truth, and more honesty with the leading minds that control minorities than with those who direct majorities, and this from a principle in human nature which we all understand. No, sir, I am governed by no such consideration as that. I am governed by the single object of doing something in my humble way that may tend to preserve this Union and continue it after we shall have restored to it the States now in rebellion.

Now, sir, I come to make a few observations in reference to a question which has been very elaborately discussed here during the consideration of this subject; and that is the question of the constitutional power of Congress to do the thing we aim at to-day. I know how immodest it may be for me, after the very able and distinguished gentlemen who have discussed this question so elaborately, to say a word upon it. But as I speak for my constituents at home, as well as to this House, and especially those who act with me on this occasion, I desire to be clearly understood. If I believed this amendment to be unconstitutional, as a matter of course I would be bound by my oath not to give a vote for it; but believing it to be constitutional, and believing also in the expediency of the measure, I shall vote for the amendment.

Is this amendment constitutional? How are we to get light upon this subject? My answer is, by referring to the instrument itself; and I have yet to meet the first gentleman on either side of the House who will deny the proposition that in accordance with the letter of the Constitution this amendment may be proposed to the States for their adoption or rejection. The provision of the Constitution which confers the power of amendment, and which I do not propose to read, has but two limitations, as has been repeatedly remarked in this discussion. So far as the letter of the Constitution is concerned, except in reference to those two limitations, Congress has the right and the power to propose any amendment to be adopted or rejected by the States themselves. According to the letter of the Constitution we are governed only by the two limitations found in the instrument itself.

And the next question which presents itself is whether there are any other limitations in the Constitution, except the restrictions found in the article itself, to prevent Congress from proposing this amendment to the States.

Mr. C. A. WHITE. I understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ROLLINS] to say that no person upon this side of the House had advocated the principle that the letter of the Constitution put a limitation upon the power of Congress to pass this amendment. I beg leave to remind him that in the few remarks which I had the honor to submit on Wednesday last I made that distinct proposition. I contended that the word "amendment" was a limitation of itself; that the amendment must relate to some clause or provision already in the Constitution. And that this proposition now under consideration being to insert a separate and distinct clause in the Constitution, having no connection with any grant of power to be found in it, was a supplement to the Constitution and not an amendment; and that the very letter of the Constitution limited the power of Congress over the subject of amendments to the delegation of powers to Congress to amend the Constitution.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. My answer to the gentleman is, that all the amendments that have been made were open to the same objection. I was not so fortunate, Mr. Speaker, as to hear the gentleman's speech, nor have I had time to read it; but in reference to the question of limitation, I think that the best way to obtain light on the subject is to read what the Constitution itself says:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

The Constitution can only be changed by amendment, and, according to the gentleman's theory, we can add nothing to it, however good or desirable, unless there was already "some clause or provision in the Constitution" relating to the subject proposed to be added. This I regard as absurd.

Now, sir, I cannot for my life see, as my friend from Ohio sees, where there are any other limitations of the power of Congress, according to the letter of the instrument, than those which we find in the clause of the Constitution itself. The limitation is there according to the letter, and there alone; and if there is any other limitation in reference to the power of Congress, it must be outside of this article of the Constitution; and the next question which I propose to suggest, in order to come to a correct conclusion on this subject, is, is there any other limitation of the power of Congress in proposing amendments to this instrument? I assert that there is; and I adopt the very excellent view suggested in the running debate by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] in answer to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON;] and that is, that the limitation of amendment to this Constitution is found also in the very preamble to the instrument itself. I do not believe, sir, with my friend from Ohio [Mr. Cox] that we have a right to make any amendment whatever to this Constitution, that there is no limitation except the express limitation contained in the clause which I have just read. There are other limitations, and those limitations are found, as I conceive, in the preamble preceding the Constitution itself. What is that preamble?

Now, I do not believe that any amendment can be made to this instrument which has for its object, or whose direct tendency would be, to destroy the very object and purposes for which the Constitution was established. Therefore, sir, any amendment to this Constitution which would destroy "a more perfect union," which would fail to "establish justice," which would fail to "insure domestic tranquillity," which would fail to "provide for the common defense," or to "promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," is not an amendment which may be proposed by Congress, or may be adopted and ratified by the States; and every Representative who votes must be a "law unto himself" whether any amendment proposed is in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Who is to be the judge whether a proposed amendment comes within the scope of the preamble?

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I will be the judge myself, so far as I may be called upon to vote for or against it.

Mr. COX. I would prefer, according to my peculiar logic, to allow the States themselves to be the judges. Therefore I infinitely prefer the gentleman's first proposition—that the power of amendment is not limited except by the terms of the clause of the Constitution on that subject.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I will answer the gentleman, that so far as my action and my vote are concerned, my own judgment—and I presume so far as the vote of every other member in the House is concerned, his own judgment—must be the rule in reference to the question whether a proposed amendment comes within the scope of the preamble; and I presume that the States themselves must be the judges when an amendment is submitted for their consideration and action. If three fourths of the States adopt a proposed amendment, it becomes a part of the Constitution. But suppose the other fourth decline to adopt the amendment what then? If it is such an infringement of their rights, such a destruction of their liberties, such an interference with their domestic policy, that they regard themselves justified in raising the standard of revolt and revolution in order to resist the amendment which the other States have adopted, I take it that the State itself would be the better judge as to the course which it would have a right to pursue.

But, sir, it has been urged that this amendment is contrary, although not to the letter, to the spirit of the Constitution. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am a believer, too, in this doctrine that we must be guided by the spirit of the Constitution. I would neither violate its letter nor its spirit. But I confess, sir, that it is difficult for me to define or exactly to understand what is meant by the spirit of the Constitution. Perhaps it is like the passion which young people experience, and which is well described in the language of the young lover:

"'Tis what we feel, but can't define;

"'Tis what we know, but can't express."

We all know that there are amendments which might be proposed, and which would be in strict accordance with the letter of the instrument, but which we would feel to be violative of its spirit.

Sir, if you proposed an amendment changing entirely the form of our Government, creating a monarchy or despotism instead of a Republic, I presume, although gentlemen might find an express warrant of law in the Constitution to do this thing, yet it would be against the spirit of that instrument. I presume if an amendment were proposed to require one State to pay a much larger proportion of taxes than in accordance with its representation, although you might find a warrant for it, yet it would be against the spirit of the Constitution. I presume if you were to propose an amendment to establish a State religion throughout the land, while the letter of the Constitution might not be against it, yet every man who favored religious toleration and who was against an established Church, would feel that the spirit of the instrument had been violated.

I believe, then, sir, that this amendment is in accordance with the express letter of the Constitution. I believe that it is in accordance with the preamble of the Constitution. I believe that it is in accordance with the true spirit, meaning, and intent of that instrument, and the objects and purposes for which it was framed by our forefathers, and that if all the States could be induced to adopt it it would go far to strengthen the Government, by preventing future dissension and cementing the bonds of the Union, on the preservation of which depends our strength, our security, our safety, our happiness, and the continued existence of free institutions on the American continent.

The only question left for me to decide, sir, is whether this is a measure which is expedient and which ought to be adopted. I believe in both its expediency and constitutionality.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in making a few remarks on the other branch of the question, I want to put a few interrogatories to gentlemen who differ with me. Does any man in this House, does any intelligent man in any of the loyal States believe that the institution of African slavery will survive this rebellion? If there is such a man I choose to differ from him. I believe, as has often been remarked here, that the existence and continuance of human slavery is wholly and entirely incompatible with a state of civil war in the country. The rebellion, instigated and carried on by slaveholders, has been the death-knell of the institution; and, believing this, shall we any longer rely upon the President's proclamations, which are doubtful in their policy and character? Shall we rely upon the exercise of those extraordinary powers originating in a time of war? or shall we not, like wise and prudent statesmen, come to the rescue at once, take it up, handle it, discuss it in a statesmanlike way, and adopt the true and only peaceful mode pointed out in the Charter of our liberties for meeting and disposing of questions of this character.

Mr. Speaker, I have another remark to make in regard to the limitation in the fifth article of the Constitution. How did it happen that the framers of that instrument only extend the limitation of power to two subjects? Why did they preserve the representation of the small States from amendment? Why did they allow the African slave trade to remain untouched only prior to 1808? I answer, it was because the great men who laid the foundations of civil government upon the American continent, according to my reading and understanding, were essentially anti-slavery, North and South, and, looking upon the institution of slavery as an evil, they determined to check its growth; hence in the Constitution they placed a limitation upon the African slave trade, limiting it to the year 1808. So on the other subject of the representation of the small States. The small States represented in that Convention seeing the great inequality of authority and power given to them by that clause of the Constitution which enabled Rhode Island to exercise in the Senate of the United States as much power as New York and the other great States of the Union, and tenacious of the power thus secured to them, insisted, and it was finally yielded to them, that upon that point the Constitution of the United States should remain unamended through all time.

Now, I ask you the question how easy it was, and why the framers of the Constitution did not add to that clause that no amendment should be made changing or modifying the institution of slavery as it exists in any State of the Union? Why was this not ingrafted upon the Constitution? I have an answer satisfactory to myself on that subject. It was because the great men of that day, the men who framed this Charter of human freedom for the American people, were in heart and in principle hostile to the institution of slavery; and although they did not take the responsibility of disposing of it, they accepted it as they found it; and the writings and teachings of the great men of the North and South justify me in claiming that they looked forward to the day when their posterity would finally, in some form or other, dispose of the institution which they themselves regarded as hurtful to the happiness and progress of the country.

Hence I go a little further than my venerable friend from Missouri, [Mr. KING,] though he and I are exactly in the same category upon this question. I express my belief that the limitation preventing the abolition of slavery in the States by Congress was not placed in the Constitution for the reason of a desire to leave that an open question, and hoping and believing that at a distant day in the history of our country, when there would be a higher and more Christian-like civilization, a better view of this subject, that we, their posterity, might have the power which they gave to us in the instrument itself, to take hold of the question and dispose of it in some fair, right, and proper way. Such is my belief; whether well-founded or not is another thing. They regarded the institution as an evil, and no such limitation could have been incorporated into the Constitution by the Convention which framed that instrument. They regarded it as an evil one day or other to be disposed of, and they left the door open to those who were to come after them for the express purpose of enabling them, when a good opportunity offered, to do the very thing which they failed to do themselves.

Mr. Speaker, every man, however humble he may be, has some personal pride in the opinions he may entertain upon a great question of this sort. I am not free from considerations of that kind, and when I hear my friends over the way upon the Republican side of the House—and I know I have a great many friends there—intimate that because a man cannot vote with them and I upon this amendment he sympathizes with the rebellion, or is an apologist for the rebellion, I confess I cannot indorse either the good taste or the propriety of such imputations. Such remarks elsewhere than here have been applied to me, and yet I know they have not fitted my case, because I take this occasion to state my opinion—an opinion I have entertained for twenty-five years—that the institution of African slavery cannot be defended either upon moral or religious grounds, or upon principles of natural right or political economy.

I am a believer in the Declaration of Independence wherein it is asserted that "all men are created equal." I believe that when it says "all men" it means every man who was created in the "image of his Maker" and walks on God's footstool, without regard to race, color, or any other accidental circumstances by which he may be surrounded. I know that astute politicians, crafty and ambitious men, in various periods of the Republic have tried to draw a distinction between this man and that man because he happens to have a different colored skin; that the Declaration was applicable alone to white men, and not to the black man, the red man, or any other than the white man. That the word "all" meant a part, not "all!" But, sir, I believe that that general clause in the Declaration of Independence was meant, by the immortal man who penned it, and by the immortal men who signed it, and by a large majority of the great men of that day North and South, to assert the great principle, founded in the rights of man, founded in reason, and in strict accordance to the law of morality and of the Divine will, that "all men are created equal," without distinction of race or of color. And although our ancestors failed to apply the principle, although they were derelict in duty in living up to the great enunciation of principles which they made to the world and mankind, it is no proof to my mind that they did not mean exactly what I say they meant in the expression to which I have referred.

Mr. Speaker, all these considerations are influencing me in the very vote which I shall give upon this amendment; but I desire to say that my experience upon the subject of slavery has been quite singular and diversified. An anti-slavery man in sentiment, and yet, heretofore a large owner of slaves myself—not now, however—not exactly with my consent, but with or without my consent. The convention which recently assembled in my State, I learned from a telegram a morning or two ago, had adopted an amendment to our present State constitution for the immediate emancipation of all the slaves in the State. I am no longer the owner of a slave, and I thank God for it. Although I think this subject might have been disposed of in a better way, causing less inconvenience to our people, and doing in fact the slave no harm, I make no complaint of the convention for that act; and although there is no clause of compensation, I very gracefully yield to the public sentiment, and to the action of this distinguished body of men called in my State to consider its welfare. If the giving up of my slaves without complaint shall be a contribution upon my part to promote the public good, to uphold the Constitution of the United States, to restore peace and preserve this Union, if I had owned a thousand slaves they would most cheerfully have been given up. I say with all my heart, Let them go, but let them not go without a sense of feeling and a proper regard on my part for the future of themselves and their offspring! I say, Let them go, and let them enjoy all the privileges consistent with sound policy and that freedom which has been vouchsafed to them! Let them go; and, sir, there is no man in this House or in this nation who feels a deeper interest in their comfort, in their happiness, in their elevation than I do, and in the comfort and welfare of their children and their children's children in all time to come! I say again, sir, Let them go, and may the blessing of God rest upon them!

[Here the hammer fell, the hour having expired.]

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask that the gentleman have leave to continue his remarks.

By unanimous consent the leave was granted.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. As I have said, my experience in relation to this question of slavery has been singular and somewhat diversified. Why, sir, I remember that seventeen years ago, when I was a member of that proud, and honorable, and patriotic party, the old Whig party of the country, and when I was quite a young man, my friends placed me in the responsible position of candidate for the high office of Governor of my State, and that I found as my competitor upon that occasion my venerable and honorable friend who occupies a seat on my left, [Mr. KING.] We traversed our great State from one corner to the other; we met time and again upon the hustings; he was a friend of General Cass and I was a Whig, and the friend of General Taylor; and he must pardon me upon this occasion—and especially as we are now together—if I bring to view a single reminiscence. One of his arguments, I remember, was that the elevation of General Taylor to the office of President and the election of myself to the office of Governor would be dangerous to the institution of slavery! I, a Kentuckian by birth, supporting a large slaveowner for the Presidency, and myself a slaveowner, combatted that view as well as I could in opposition to my venerable friend. I am happy, however, to know that on this occasion we meet, and that hereafter there is to be no further controversy between him and I upon this question.

I remember also that as late as 1857 when again my political friends, regarding me far too highly, did me the honor of placing their standard once more in my hands as a candidate for the highest office in the gift of the people of my State, I found myself confronted by a gentleman who was born in New York, able and talented, and never the owner of a slave, but throughout that entire canvass the burden of his "talk" against me was that it would never do to elect me, and that if they did, in some way or other the institution of slavery would suffer at my hands in the State of Missouri; and although I think to-day that I was legally elected, after the old Democracy had figured some six or eight weeks, the election being over, they brought out a majority against me of two hundred and thirty!

But this is not the whole of my personal experience upon this subject. When first I had the honor of being a candidate for a seat upon this floor in 1860, I met as my competitor a very worthy and distinguished gentleman who now occupies a seat at the other end of the Capitol, a man of exalted talent and ability and a high order of patriotism, who is my personal friend, and who, I am gratified to see, fills his place so ably and gracefully; but I remember that it was the same old story with him as with my venerable friend here [Mr. KING] and the other gentleman to whom I have alluded, that it would not do to send me here even, because in some way or other I might be detrimental to the institution of slavery in my State. I am happy, however, to say that that distinguished gentleman and myself will no longer have any controversy upon that point.

So far as I know, we are together so far as this amendment is concerned. We take now pretty much the same view of this important question, the only difference being that he has gone far ahead of me in any view I entertain or action I expect to take in the matter. It will never do, in the day of civil war and revolution, to be justifying one's self for inconsistency. Men change every day. Read the inaugural address of President Lincoln; read the diplomatic correspondence of the Secretary of State; read your own speeches of two or three years back, and you will see how changes have taken place. Read my speeches and you will find me preaching, a short time ago one doctrine, and now preaching another doctrine. I am proud that a man has the right to change; I am gratified that I am not too obstinate to change; I am glad that additional light shines upon the darkened intellect to enable us to change our opinions when we find that we are wrong, and hope all of us have sufficient regard for the truth to embrace it when we see it. Change is a law of nature. It is written on our physical organization, on our moral organization, on our mental constitutions. If there were no right to change, change morally especially, what, in the name of God, would become of many of the gentlemen on both sides of this House? [Laughter.] There is an old adage which says, "Wise men sometimes change, fools never do." Sir, the peculiar friends of slavery have controlled the Government for much the greater part of the time since its establishment; and but for their own wickedness and folly might have saved the institution and had their full share in its management for many years to come. If they have lost the political control, all are blameless save themselves!

"But yesterday, the word of Caesar might have stood against the world: now lies he there, And none so poor to do him reverence."

Mr. Speaker, I wish to state in a very general way some other propositions. Let us dispose of this question now, now. I have signified that I would be willing to dispose of it in another way. If Jefferson Davis & Co. would come back to this Hall to-morrow and say, "We were wrong; we ask pardon; we lay down our arms; we yet remember the blessings that we have thrown away; we want that free Constitution which we have been destroying; we want to come back to you;" for the sake of peace, for the sake of running no more risk in regard to this slave question, I would say "Let them come in," and I would go pretty far in making terms with them; much farther than my friends from Missouri over there, [Mr. McCLURG and Mr. LOAN.] But we cannot have our will on this subject. The president of the so-called confederate States, and those who act with him, are not going to put themselves in that position. On the contrary, we have been told by the rebel leaders that if a blank sheet of paper were furnished to them on which to write their own terms, they would not come back. They have told us that they started out for separation, and that they mean to exhaust all the energies and resources of the country in accomplishing that object. On the other hand, we started out for the purpose of preserving the Constitution and Union, let that effort lead us where it might; destroy whoever and whatever it might. If we had the moral, the physical and the intellectual power to do the work, we started out for the purpose of putting down this rebellion, and saving this Union and Government from destruction. And while I rejoice at any movement which looks to an honorable peace, and a restored Government, I am for fighting it out "on that line" to-day. Not until every germ of patriotism shall have withered and rotted in the public heart; not until the public sense of the nation is that the thing cannot be accomplished, am I for abating one jot or tittle of the efforts of the nation to subvert the rebellion, restore the supremacy of the Constitution, and preserve the Union of these States, and republican liberty on this continent throughout all time to come.

Mr. Speaker, the American sentiment is decidedly anti-slavery; and that is another consideration why I am willing to vote for this amendment. We never can have an entire peace in this country as long as the institution of slavery remains as one of the recognized institutions of the country. It occurs to me that the surest way to obtain peace is to dispose of the institution now. From whatever cause, whether it be from northern intermeddling—if you so call it; and there has been far too much of this—or from southern arrogance and dictation and agitation, whether from the one cause or the other, or both, slavery will always be a disturbing element! There will be no peace, there will be no perfect Union in this country until some way or other we shall have disposed of it. You cannot get over moral convictions. And so long as the General Government is connected with slavery or associated with it in any way, the great tide of emigration that will flow into the South, carrying new ideas of human rights, this institution will be a disturbing element, and we will have continued agitation until, in some way or other, this question is disposed of. I have therefore brought myself up to the point. We may as well unsheathe the sword and cut the Gordian knot!

I said, Mr. Speaker, that the American public sentiment is anti-slavery. I say now, from my own experience that the public sentiment of the southern people is anti-slavery. And I assert a proposition which may startle some gentlemen, but which I believe in my heart to be true, that to-day the State of South Carolina is anti-slavery. I take South Carolina as an example, because she is the most "wayward" of all the "sisters," because she has been hitherto always wrong and never right, and especially on this question. I take her because there this institution has left its deepest and keenest impress. I believe in regard to the people of that State, that if this question of slavery, in all its bearings, and in all its phases, could be thoroughly discussed and presented in an intelligent and patriotic way; sending my honorable friend from Maryland [Mr. H. W. Davis] with his gift of argument and eloquence to combat the proudest intellects of that State—I believe, as God is my judge, that after twelve months', or even six months' discussion, the majority of the people of South Carolina would vote to rid themselves of this institution of slavery. And as in South Carolina so would it be in other States.

And how do I arrive at this conclusion? I look at the history of events in my own State of Missouri. Four years ago, a man who now has gone to the late reasonable governor of that State, Jackson, was elected by an overwhelming majority upon this very question, and almost upon this question alone. Four years have expired; four years of rebellion, four years of civil war; four years of ruin and desolation and blood and misery. All these things have occurred, and the people believe, whether correctly or not, that they are all in some way or another connected with this institution of slavery. And what has been the result? The other day a gentleman, for whom I did not vote, but who has my highest respect, and in whose patriotism I have every confidence; one who, I trust, will be equal to the great occasion before him; a radical man, far more radical than I am or expect to be, radical in all his theories growing out of this disturbing question before us; was elected governor of that State by the votes of a larger majority than that which was cast four years ago for Claiborne F. Jackson. What does that prove? I believe that, to some extent, there may have been some intimidation, some military interference. But I tell you that my conviction is that this change has resulted from the deliberate and earnest conviction of the honest masses of the people of that State, slaveowners and non-slaveowners, that the institution of slavery is wrong, that it has been to some extent the cause of all our trials, and that they are in favor of disposing of it as early as practicable.

The State convention of Missouri assembled the other day to revise the State constitution. Almost two years ago an ordinance of emancipation had been adopted, allowing the institution to stand until the 4th of July, 1870. Yet the people of Missouri were not content with that. They met in convention three days ago, and almost the very first act of that convention, after organizing, was, by a vote of 60 to 4, if the telegraph is correct, to wipe out the institution of African slavery from the soil of Missouri.

It is an old adage that "he is a fool who learns nothing from experience, but he is the greatest of fools who will not profit by his own experience." I have learned a little; not much; but I am progressing. I never expect, perhaps I am not wise enough, or perhaps I am too timid or too slow; I do not expect to get quite up to the standard of my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] or my eloquent friend from Maryland, [Mr. H. W. Davis.] But I will endeavor to keep pace with my own convictions, having in view always the restoration of the Union, the preservation of the Constitution and of republican liberty under free institutions upon the American continent. Sir, I have a firm conviction that there is such a thing as the "logic of events."

May I say a word or two to my friends from Kentucky? My life-long friend who sits on my left, who addressed the House the other day, [Mr. CLAY,] in the remarks that I understood him to make, spoke of the slaves in Kentucky being worth $150,000,000 before the rebellion, and perhaps as much now. Sir, put upon the block to-day, what would all the slaves in North America now sell for? Does he expect, after all to which I have referred, after what he has seen, does the gentleman expect that the institution of slavery is to remain anywhere safe for any length of time? If he does, if my other friends from Kentucky expect that, I have only to say that upon that one question I am wiser than they, I have passed through this sea of troubles. Thank God, I breathe freer and easier to-day in consequence of having got through it, and I tell them now, that without some obstacle in the constitution of the State of Kentucky, in less than two years from the day that I am making these poor remarks in the American Congress, Kentucky will be a free State without any regard to the views gentlemen may express here on this side of this Hall.

And, sir, if ever a set of people made a mistake on earth, it was the men of Kentucky, by whom I was somewhat governed myself, when, three years ago, they rejected the offer of the President of the United States, who, wiser than we were, seeing the difficulties before us, but seeing the bow of promise set in the sky, and knowing what was to come, proposed to us to sweep the institution of slavery from the border States, offering the assistance of the United States to aid in compensating the loyal men of those States for their losses in labor and property. I say that the unwisest of all acts, so far as the border States were concerned, was the rejection of this liberal offer on the part of the Executive of the United States. I voted for the proposition at first; and then most unwisely changed my ground, showing the versatility of the man, and would perhaps, if it had come to a final vote, have opposed it, because my constituents were likely to be offended by the passage of such a law. They are now convinced, when their slaves are gone and their pockets are empty, that I was right in the first place, and they were wrong. I have read, in the papers of this morning, that the Legislature of Kentucky, after electing that distinguished and able man, James Guthrie, to the Senate of the United States, have passed a resolution in favor of emancipation, "with the consent of the owners, and with compensation."

But where is compensation to come from? I have a right to feel something on this subject, for I am called upon to ask myself where is compensation to come from? Not out of the coffers of the national Treasury. Why, the Government will not even pay for the gallant soldiers which I and others have furnished for its Army, although the law, as I understand, expressly provides for compensation to loyal owners. While I have furnished ten soldiers, brave soldiers, (I hope they are doing good service for the cause,) I have never asked for any compensation. I do not urge my claim for compensation; but when Uncle Sam comes along I will consider whether to take it or not. I will ask my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] I will not call him "my venerable friend," because he and I sat on the same bench at school when we were boys together—does he think that the people of Kentucky will ever vote to tax themselves to pay him and others for their slaves? Does he not know that the day for compensation is past? Will he have the men of Kentucky go through all the trouble and anxiety which I have passed through, simply to preserve that which cannot, in the nature of things, be preserved but a few short years longer? I would do my full duty toward my old State; but how else can I do it than by giving her noble and patriotic men the benefit of my own experience? I think that the best way to aid and succor my proud old mother is to adopt this amendment.

"If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well It were done quickly."

Sir, she and her people rank in my affections next to my own proud adopted Commonwealth. There is not a State in this Union, nor any people of the Union, for whom I would make greater sacrifices than I would for the State of Kentucky. Especially do I sympathize with my friend to whom I have referred, because he and I were educated in the same social and political school, and have in many respects kindred sympathies. I have the highest confidence in his loyalty, in his honor, and in his patriotism, however much we may differ on some questions. I wish that I could aid him and men similarly situated. But I cannot. This is not because of any hostility to Kentucky, or any hostility to the institution of slavery. It is because I am compelled to act thus in view of the great results which, in my opinion, are to spring from the adoption of this amendment. I shall vote for it in order to help the old State of Kentucky, to help the South, but above all to help all the States of the Union in arriving at a final adjustment of the terrible agitation and conflict now prevailing.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the action of our ancestors in reference to slavery inflicted this evil upon us. And when I speak of our ancestors, I mean those of Plymouth rock and those of James river. And while in this House and in the other end of this Capitol, I have heard attacks on the pilgrim fathers, and while I saw lately a disreputable statement concerning the early settlers of Virginia, yet I have no sympathy with the spirit which prompts such efforts. Doubtless there were bad men as well as honest and good men among the original settlers of both the northern and the southern sections of our country. Through the promptings of cupidity and avarice, slavery was first established in this country. Could our ancestors who countenanced this institution in its establishment witness the scenes of the present time, they would doubtless feel that they committed an unpardonable sin. And for this sin the North and the South are equally responsible. The people of both sections were engaged in this infamous traffic, and we are this day gathering the fruits of their iniquity. And it is thus that

"Even-handed justice

Commends the ingredients of our poisoned chalice To our own lips;"

or, as the same great master expresses it—

"That we but teach Bloody instructions, which, being taught, return To plague the inventor."

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] said the other day that slavery was a blessing to the slave. I admit that it has turned out to be so, yet by accident alone. The Africans were brought from their native wilds in violation of every law of God and humanity; but when I compare the present condition of the negro in this country with his situation in his native land, I am compelled to admit that the institution of slavery has had a beneficial influence upon his moral, intellectual, and physical condition. I think that the negro of the United States is a higher order of humanity than the barbarian of Africa. Thus out of a great wrong has resulted a great good—the elevation and advancement of this large and unfortunate class. The consoling reflection will ever be, that this downtrodden race, torn by violence from their native country for the sake of gain, after passing for centuries through a weary pilgrimage of bondage, are at last admitted into the temple of freedom, with a fair prospect of enjoying all the blessings which education, true religion, and civilization confers upon man; and through them it may be at last that these blessings may be sent back to Africa, and that continent over which the dark cloud of ignorance and superstition has so long hovered, be illumined by the same bright sun which has thrown its effulgent rays over other portions of the habitable globe. And in all this, through the eye of faith, we may discern the hand of an all-wise and inscrutable Providence; for there is a

"Divinity that shapes our ends Rough-hew them how we will."

Mr. Speaker, when the framers of the American Constitution in 1787 formed that instrument they committed a great mistake in not disposing finally and forever of the institution of slavery. If the venerable man whose "counterfeit presentment" [pointing to the portrait of Washington] stands before us upon the walls of this Representative Chamber could come from the sacred spot of Mount Vernon, which holds his ashes, and the question was put to him "Would you as President of that Convention, and the noble men who composed that body, now dispose gradually and directly of the institution of slavery upon this continent?" is there a man who hears my voice who would doubt what would be the answer of the Father of his country? It was not because they were not anti-slavery, but because they were afraid to deal with it. They had other delicate and important questions to deal with which prevented them from disposing of the institution of slavery. They were planting deeply upon this continent the foundations of a temple which was to last forever; a temple of liberty which was to shield not only themselves but their posterity, and that men in all time to come should take refuge there. And they did not wish, as I have said I did not wish, to endanger that structure, to do anything that would cause it to totter and fall. They did not wish to fail in the grand object that they had in view. Hence they let the minor subject of slavery go over to other times and other men. It has therefore now come down to us. Mr. Speaker, I look ahead into our history for fifty years to come, and I ask the question, suppose the institution of slavery is to remain interwoven in our mechanism of government, and our country is again on account of it to pass through the bloody trials which now cover our land in mourning and in sorrow, and have piled upon us a debt which will tax the energies and wring the sinews of our posterity to pay; suppose you, sir, that our children will not condescend and charge upon us as a mistake that we did not during the revolution of these times wipe out forever this disturbing and dangerous element in our political system?

I again, Mr. Speaker, refer to the State of Kentucky. She was admitted into the Union in 1799. She is the oldest daughter in the family of States. She was the first that was admitted after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The great men of Kentucky of that day, proud and venerable names, advocated the propriety of a system of gradual emancipation. Will my friend from the Maysville district, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] will my friend from the Louisville district, [Mr. MALLORY,] will any of my friends who oppose this amendment declare it would not have been a great boon if the original constitution of Kentucky had disposed of slavery forever? Will my very excellent friend [Mr. CLAY] say that it would not have been better for his distinguished and venerable father, who was a member of the convention which framed the first constitution of Kentucky, would it not have been better for his immediate ancestors, to have met firmly the question at that day, and thus relieved the State from slavery, and the people of that noble Commonwealth of the terrible sorrows which have since fallen upon them?

I come now to speak a word in reference to my own State of Missouri. She came into the Union as it were in the midst of a revolution. For the purpose only of having a few thousand slaves there the whole continent shook with the agitation of this Missouri question. We were fighting for the privilege of holding a few slaves in bondage in that great State. We forgot the paramount good in this miserable struggle. Does my friend [Mr. HALL] from the district adjoining the one that I represent, does any man upon this floor, tell me that it would not have been better for Missouri at once in 1820 to have passed an ordinance for the gradual or immediate emancipation of her slaves, driving the institution beyond her boundaries? If there is such a man he is not as enlightened on the subject to-day as I am; he has not learned as much as I have done.

Why, sir, what is Missouri to-day, and what would she have been if there had been incorporated at that time with her organic law an ordinance declaring the institution of slavery forever abolished within her limits? We would have been as Ohio and Illinois and Iowa. We would have been rid of this curse which is ever reappearing, the curse of slavery, this raw head and bloody bones, and we would have been clear of all of these troubles. We would have had no bands of guerrillas watering the soil of our State with the blood of our peaceful citizens. We would have had no armed bodies of men stationed in all our borders to keep the peace. Look at Illinois just across the father of waters. She came into the Union in 1818, two years before Missouri, and with less population, fewer mineral resources, not so many rivers nor better facilities for commerce, yet she has four thousand miles of railroad while Missouri has only twelve hundred. Illinois has a prosperous, happy, and peaceful population of two million, while we have only half this number, and our people are leaving in every direction seeking homes in the Territories, in the distant mountains, in South America, in Mexico, in Illinois, flying away from the horrible specter of this infernal rebellion. Why is this? I know of but one real, substantial, specific reason, and that is that the framers of the Missouri constitution allowed slavery to remain, while Illinois was made forever free by the Ordinance of 1787, penned by Thomas Jefferson, a son of Virginia, and by which Virginia ceded an empire within itself (the Northwest Territory) to the United States.

I have been looking up for light from above, and I begin to see it streaking along the horizon, however it may be with other gentlemen in this Hall.

A word or two more and I will relieve the attention of the House. If this were a time of profound peace, and this amendment was proposed, I would not vote for it, and on the score of expediency. Why? Because if we had remained in a state of profound peace, the very proposal to submit this amendment to the States would have disturbed the public tranquillity, and therefore I would let it alone. But now I vote for it in order to restore the public tranquillity, believing that this rebellion having been set on foot, and civil war raging in the country, you cannot have entire tranquillity without a removal of the cause of the disturbance. Now, one gentleman intimated yesterday that if we pass this amendment it will induce emancipation on the part of the southern States themselves. But I ask him are they likely to be governed by any disposition we may make of this question in this House? Not at all. Whenever they are pressed to the wall, whenever our armies shall have planted our standard in every one of their States, when their principal cities shall have been taken, when they are "in articulo mortis," it may be, as a dernier ressort, that they may strike the shackles from the limbs of the slaves they now hold. But they will never be governed by any action we may take upon this or any other question. Never. Whenever they find it for their interest to do it, they will do it, and not before.

One other remark. Missouri has in advance adopted this amendment. Now, allow me, although not much given to prophecy, being neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, to make one other prediction upon this floor to-day. It is this: if this constitutional amendment be adopted by this House, or whether it be adopted by this House or not, it will be adopted by the Congress which is immediately to succeed this, in less than ninety days from the time of our adjournment; it will become the prevailing sentiment, and will be adopted not alone by the North, but by every southern State. I do not doubt it. How? By the masses of the people, as the masses of the people of Missouri have adopted it there. How? When the poor and humble farmers and mechanics of the States of Alabama and Mississippi shall have left the bloody trials in which they are now engaged to tear down this temple of human liberty; when they will return perhaps to their desolated homes; when they shall look once more upon and hug to their bosoms the wives and children whom they love, in poverty and in rags; when they will go, perhaps without an arm, or without an eye, or without a leg, and in poverty to those who are dependent upon them for support in life, taught by experience, as I have been taught by experience, they will ask the question of themselves, "Why all this? What have we been fighting for?" They will bring to mind the sweet memories of other days. They will remember the peaceful and happy home that they were induced to leave and which they enjoyed under the benign influences of wholesome and liberal laws passed here, and they will inquire, "By what sophistry, by what appeal, by what force, by what maddening influence is it that we have been induced to enter into this terrible rebellion? Not to promote any interest of wife and children, but to destroy all the blessings vouchsafed to us and to them by a free Government and equitable laws;" and they will further ask, "Who has been the author of my misfortunes, and the ruin of my family, my all?" Sir, they will point to those who hold the power at Richmond; they will direct their vengeance against them; and Davis and his traitorous crew, as I have said upon a former occasion, will, like Actæon of old, be in the end destroyed by their own friends.

I do not doubt this at all. The masses of the people of the South have no special interest in, nor sympathy with, the institution of slavery. They never had. The comparative number of slaveholders is small, and whenever you begin to drive in the wedge and exemplify the dividing line between those whose moral convictions say that slavery is right, and who are, as a property interest, identified and associated with it, and that great volume of humanity who, upon the other side of the question, deny the moral right of slavery and have no interest whatever in it, I tell you the result will be nine to one against the institution. And it is in this way that in Georgia, in Arkansas, and in South Carolina, even, at last, the very amendment we propose to adopt here to-day will receive the sanction of the good judgment of the people of those States. I judge from what I have seen in my own State; I judge from the fact that only a few years ago men who owned no slaves, but, controlled by that power, were nearly crazy upon the subject for fear I would do something to set my own slaves free! And now they are equally offended with me because I happen to be found in the unfortunate category of being the owner of slaves! Southern public sentiment, northern public sentiment, American public sentiment, and I may add, the sentiment of the civilized world, now, as from the beginning, from the very day of the adoption and ratification of the Constitution, is against the humanity, the Christianity, and the expediency of the longer continuance of the institution of slavery among us. What has Great Britain done? What has France done? What has Russia done? Everywhere, even in the despotic Governments of the Old World, we find them getting rid of and abolishing the institution of slavery. And shall free America lag in a contest, and hesitate now, when the question is that of liberty, and when it may be reached according to all the forms of law under our Constitution? Sir—

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
Omitted, all the voyage of their life
Is bound in shallows, and in miseries."

And this is equally true of nations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one more reflection and I am done. Gentlemen seem to think that the adoption of this amendment is going to lead to some other and dangerous measures. Sir, I rely upon the conservative balance-wheel of my friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and others like him to keep his party friends from going too far. My friend from the Louisville district [Mr. MALLORY] tells us that when a movement is once started it is difficult to stop it. I do not anticipate the evils which some gentlemen upon this side of the House seem to fear. I rely upon the good sense and sound judgment of the people of all the States. I believe, as much as I believe anything, that the permanent and continued existence of our free institutions is dependent upon the preservation of that beautiful harmony which exists between the powers of the States and of the General Government. I want to see no intrenchment further than is absolutely necessary to preserve the whole machine, either by the General Government upon the rightful, constitutional powers of the States, or upon the part of the States on the rightful points of constitutional power to the General Government. Not only the harmony and beauty, but the very strength of our political system consists in the preservation of both; and I do not believe, although it is frequently ascribed to gentlemen upon the other side of the House, that it is their purpose to use these vast centralized powers of a great consolidated Government with a view of oppressing the people of any one of the States. Any oppression which the people of the South now undergo is the effect of their own false teaching and conduct; and whether that oppression shall continue, whether their country shall be still further desolated, whether their towns and cities shall be still further sacked and burned, whether their property shall be still further taken, depends, not upon us, not upon the General Government, but it depends upon the people of the southern States themselves. I would rely ever on the liberality, the sound judgment, and the good faith of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.] Let these men who have rebelled without cause and without excuse come back and rely upon him and the gentleman from Vermont to do them full and ample justice, and to treat them liberally and in the spirit of broad and general philanthropy.

One word more (for the field still opens) to my Democratic friends. I have the good or the bad fortune of being rather in the middle of the House, and not exactly identified in my theories with anybody. I have been a party by myself pretty much all the time I have been here; but, thank God! I have the good opinion of myself to believe that I have been a patriot all the time, that I have had my eye upon the main question, and that I have been working to the great point of saving my country and its free institutions from wreck. As to partisan considerations, does any man ever expect to make anything further politically out of the slavery question? Sir, I have heard hardly an argument upon this side of the House which has not contained this remarkable expression, "while, Mr. Speaker, I am not an apologist for the institution of slavery," and if I were to take a vote to-day on this side of the House, with the exception of half a dozen, headed by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] I believe that every one of you would indorse the general anti-slavery remarks which I have made here to-day. I believe that the very eloquent and distinguished gentleman from the Cincinnati district, [Mr. PENDLETON,] for whose personal character I have the highest respect, and also for his patriotism and his loyalty, is against the institution of slavery; he would not plant it in my State if it was not there; he would not plant it in Ohio; he would not plant it on this continent; he does not regard it as an institution just in itself and productive of good results; and I believe that is the opinion of nine tenths of the gentlemen upon this side of the House.

Why not, then, leave the matter to the good sense and patriotism of the American people—the people of all the States? Why not cut this Gordian knot? Why not dispose at once of this distracting question? We never can have tranquillity and peace so long as it remains in the form in which it now exists.

[Here the hammer fell, another hour having expired.]

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be still further extended. There was no objection.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have but one other thought to express, and I pledge the House that I will then conclude these remarks, not, however, without thanking everybody here for the great and unusual courtesy which has been extended to me, as well as for the attentive hearing which I have received alike from the House and from these crowded galleries. Mr. Speaker, if we can get through this rebellion completely and satisfactorily, if we can steer safely between Charybdis on the one side and Scylla on the other of the passage through which we are now steering, if we survive the storm and strife, if we can march safely through the dark and dreary wilderness of rebellion and civil war, and if we can come out of it with the American Union as formed by Washington and his compatriots, if we can come out of it with our free and matchless Constitution maintained substantially in all its parts, if we can come out of it and still boast of our American nationality, if we can come out of it with the further boast that though we have passed through those trials we have not only saved our Constitution and Union, but we have caused the sun of freedom to shine on an additional four million of human beings, and if the old ship can once more be righted and set sail on calmer seas, smooth and tranquil, where is the man who feels a just pride of country and who cannot bring himself up to the standard of realizing the great influence which the American Republic, with free institutions and a broader Christian civilization, shall exert on downtrodden humanity in every land and beyond every sea? Ay, sir, let ours be the chosen land, let ours be the land where the weary wanderer shall direct his footsteps, and where he can enjoy the blessings of peace and of freedom. Let ours be the "bright particular star" next to the star that led the shepherds to Bethlehem, which shall lead the downtrodden and oppressed of all the world into a harbor of peace, security, and happiness. And let us, kneeling around the altar, all thank God that although we have had our trials, we have saved our country; that although we have been guilty of sins we have wiped them out, and that we at length stand up a great and powerful people, honored by all the earth, "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled by the genius of universal emancipation." [Loud applause on the floor and in the galleries, which was checked by the Speaker.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, we shall never know why slavery dies so hard in this Republic and in this Hall till we know why sin outlives disaster, and Satan is immortal. Its marvelous tenacity of existence has outlived the expectations of its friends and the hopes of its enemies. It has been declared here and elsewhere to be in all the several stages of mortality, wounded, moribund, dead. "The question was raised by my colleague [Mr. Cox] yesterday, whether it was indeed dead, or in a troubled sleep. I know of no better illustration of its condition than is found in Sallust's admirable history of the great conspirator, Catiline, who, when his final battle was fought and lost, his army broken and scattered, was found far in advance of his own troops, lying among the dead enemies of Rome, yet breathing a little, but exhibiting in his countenance all that ferocity of spirit which had characterized his life. So, sir, this body of slavery lies before us among the dead enemies of the Republic, mortally wounded, impotent in its fiendish wickedness, but with its old ferocity in its looks, bearing the unmistakable marks of its infernal origin.

Who does not remember that thirty years ago, a short period in the life of a nation, but little could be said with impunity in these Halls on the subject of slavery? How well do gentlemen here remember the history of that distinguished predecessor of mine, Joshua R. Giddings, lately gone to his rest, who with his forlorn hope of faithful men took his life in his hands, and in the name of justice protested against the great crime, and who stood bravely in his place until his white locks, like the plume of Henry of Navarre, marked where the battle for freedom raged fiercest. We can hardly realize that this is the same people, and these the same Halls, where now scarcely a man can be found who will venture to do more than falter out an apology for slavery, protesting at the same time that he has no love for the dying tyrant. None, I believe, but that man of more than supernal boldness from the city of New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has ventured this session to raise his voice in favor of slavery for its own sake. He still sees in its features the reflection of divinity and beauty, and only he. "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! How art thou cut down to the ground, which didst weaken the nations!" Many mighty men have been slain by thee; many proud ones have humbled themselves at thy feet! All along the coast of the political sea they lie like stranded wrecks, broken on the headlands of freedom. How lately did its advocates with impious boldness maintain it as God's own, to be venerated and cherished as divine. It was another and higher form of civilization. It was the holy evangel of America dispensing its blessings to a benighted race, destined to bear its blessings to the wilderness of the West. In its mad arrogance it lifted its hand to strike down the fabric of the Union, and since that fatal day it has been a "fugitive and a vagabond upon the earth;" like the spirit that Jesus cast out it has since then been "seeking rest and finding none." It has sought in all the corners of the Republic to find some hiding-place in which to shelter itself from the death it has so richly earned. It sought an asylum in the untrodden Territories of the West, but, with a whip of scorpions, indignant freedom drove it thence. I do not believe a loyal man can now be found who would consent that it should again enter them. It has no hope of harbor there. It found no protection or favor in the hearts or consciences of the freemen of the Republic, and has fled for its last hope of safety to the shield of the Constitution. We propose to follow it there, and hurl it as Satan was exiled from heaven. But now in the hour of its mortal agony it has found a defender.

My gallant colleague, [Mr. PENDLETON,] for I recognize him as a gallant and able man, plants himself at the door of his darling, and bids defiance to all assailants. He has followed slavery in its flight, until at last he has reached the great temple where liberty is enshrined—the Constitution of the United States—and there, in that last retreat, no hand shall strike it. It reminds me of that celebrated passage in the great Latin poet, in which the serpents of the Ionian sea, when they had destroyed Laocoon and his sons, fled to the heights of the Trojan citadel and coiled their slimy lengths around the feet of the tutelard goddess, and were covered by the orb of her shield. So, under the guidance of my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] slavery has found its way upward and upward, until it has reached the high citadel of American nationality, and coiled itself, as he believes, securely around the feet of the statue of justice and under the shield of the Constitution of the United States. We desire to follow it even there and kill it beside the very altar of liberty. Its blood can never make atonement for its crimes.

But the gentleman has gone further. He is not content that the snake sorcerer shall be merely under the protection of the Constitution. In his hands, by a strange metamorphosis, slavery becomes an invisible essence and takes up its abode in the very grain and fiber of the Constitution, and when we go to strike it he says, "I cannot point out any express form that prohibits you from striking slavery; but I find it in the intent and meaning of the Constitution. I go into the very grain of the Constitution, under the surface, out of sight, into the very spirit and genius of it, and in that invisible domain slavery is enshrined, and there is no power in the Republic to drive it thence." In order that I may do no injustice to my friend, I will read from his speech of yesterday the passage to which I have referred:

"My colleague from the Toledo district, in the speech which he made the other day, told us with reference to this point:

"If I read the Constitution aright and understand the force of language, the section which I have just quoted is to-day free from all limitations and conditions save two, one of which provides that the suffrage of the several States in the Senate shall be equal, and that no State shall lose this equality by any amendment of the Constitution without its consent; the other relates to taxation. These are the only conditions and limitations."

"I deny it. I assert that there is another limitation stronger even than the letter of the Constitution; and that is to be found in its intent and its spirit and its foundation idea. I put the question which has been put before in this debate, can three fourths of the States constitutionally change this Government, and make it an autocracy? It is not prohibited by the letter of the Constitution."

"It does not come within the two classes of limitations and conditions asserted by my colleague. Why is it that this change cannot be made? I will tell you why. It is because republicanism lies at the very foundation of our system of government, and to overthrow that idea is not to amend, but to subvert the Constitution of the United States; and I say that if three fourths of the States should undertake to pass an amendment of that kind, and Rhode Island alone dissented, she would have the right to resist by force. It would be her duty to resist by force; and her cause would be sacred in the eyes of just men, and sanctified in the eyes of a just God."

He goes behind the words and phrases of the Constitution and finds a refuge for slavery in its intent; and he says that with that intent we have no right to deal in the way of amendment. He has gone even beyond that sublime idea of protection, and has announced a discovery to which I am sure no other statesman ever laid claim, and can be no more reached by the power of law than Satan by the sword of Michael. He finds the highest warrant, the completest immunity, for slavery, not only behind the Constitution, but even behind the governments of the States themselves. For he says, in answer to a question from my friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON:]

"I will not be drawn now into a discussion with the gentleman as to the origin of slavery, nor to the law which lies behind the Constitution of the United States, and behind the government of the States, by which these people are held in slavery."

I say that the gentleman has gone even deeper than the spirit of the Constitution. Not finding anything in the words and phrases of the Constitution to forbid an amendment abolishing slavery he goes behind the Constitution of the United States and behind all constitutions, and refers to some law that overshadows States, nations, and constitutions and forms, as space envelops the universe, and far away in the eternal equities, he finds what he believes to be the law by which one man can hold another in slavery. Surely human ingenuity has never gone further to shield a malefactor.

Let me for a few moments call the attention of the House to what seems to me to be the origin of the gentleman's argument. He has given us what I believe to be the key to his legal opinions in the four words which the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] commented upon last evening. The whole theory upon which he proceeds is found in that short utterance, "the compact of confederation," and you need not go beyond that to find the whole strength of his argument. If I understand the gentleman, he holds that each State is sovereign; that in their sovereign and independent capacity the States, each for itself, granted to the Convention that framed the Constitution the power to form a Constitution of government, and that the States, as such, were the source and fountain of that power. What they did not grant they reserved. They did not grant the right to control the subject of slavery. Hence that question was reserved to the States, and no amendment by the modes pointed out in the Constitution can reach it. This, I believe, is a succinct and just statement of his argument. The whole question turns upon the sovereignty and independence of the States. Are they sovereign and independent now? Were they ever so? I shall endeavor to answer.

I appeal to the facts of history, and to bring them clearly before us, I affirm:

I. That prior to the 4th day of July, 1776, these colonies were neither free nor independent. Their sovereignty was lodged in the Crown of Great Britain. I believe no man will deny this. It was admitted even in the first declaration of right by the revolutionary Congress that assembled in 1774 to pray for a redress of grievances. That body expressly admitted that the sovereignty of those colonies lodged in the Crown of Great Britain. It has been taught by Jay and Story, and has been so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. (See Chisholm vs. State of Georgia, 2 Dallas, 240.)

II. I affirm that no colony declared itself free and independent. Neither Virginia, New York, or Massachusetts declared itself free and independent of the Crown of Great Britain. The declaration was made, not even by the whole of the colonies as colonies; but the declaration was made in the name of "the good people of the colonies," as a people.

In the following paragraph the sovereignty and its maintenance were transferred from the Crown of Great Britain to the whole people of the colonies:

"We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies solemnly publish and declare that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which independent States may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

In vindication of this view I read from the 197th page of the first volume of Justice Story's Commentaries:

"The colonies did not severally act for themselves and proclaim their own independence. It is true that some of the States had previously formed incipient governments for themselves, but it was done in compliance with the recommendations of Congress."

"But the declaration of the independence of all the colonies was the united act of all. It was 'a declaration by the representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled;' 'by the delegates appointed by the good people of the colonies,' as in a prior declaration of rights they were called. It was not an act done by the State governments then organized; nor by persons chosen by them. It was emphatically the act of the whole people of the United Colonies, by the instrumentality of their representatives, chosen for that, among other purposes. It was an act not competent to the State governments, or any of them, as organized under their charters, to adopt. Those charters neither contemplated the case nor provided for it. It was an act of original, inherent sovereignty by the people themselves, resulting from their right to change the form of government, and to institute a new government whenever necessary for their safety and happiness. So the Declaration of Independence treats it. No State had presumed of itself to form a new Government, or to provide for the exigencies of the times, without consulting Congress on the subject; and when they acted, it was in pursuance of the recommendation of Congress. It was, therefore, the achievement of the whole for the benefit of the whole. The people of the United Colonies made the United Colonies free and independent States, and absolved them from all allegiance to the British Crown. The Declaration of Independence has accordingly always been treated as an act of paramount and sovereign authority, complete and perfect, per se and ipso facto working an entire dissolution of all political connection with and allegiance to Great Britain. And this, not merely as a practical fact, but in a legal and constitutional view of the matter by courts of justice."

When these people of the colonies became free, having withdrawn the sovereignty from the Crown of Great Britain, where did they lodge it? Not in the States; but so far as they delegated it at all, they lodged it in the revolutionary Congress then sitting at Philadelphia. My colleague dissents. I ask his attention again to the language of this distinguished commentator on page 200, volume one:

"In the next place, we have seen that the power to do this act was not derived from the State governments, nor was it done generally with their cooperation. The question naturally presents itself, if it is to be considered as a national act, in what manner did the colonies become a nation, and in what manner did Congress become possessed of this national power? The true answer must be that as soon as Congress assumed to pass measures which were in their nature national, to that extent the people, from whose acquiescence and consent they took effect, must be considered as agreeing to form a nation."

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to ask my colleague from what power the delegates who sat in that Congress derived their authority to make that declaration; whether they did not derive it from the colonies, or the States, if the gentleman prefers that word, and whether each delegate did not speak in the Congress for the State government which authorized him to speak there?

Mr. GARFIELD. I say, in answer to the point the gentleman makes, as I have already said, and in the language of this distinguished commentator, that the moment the revolutionary Congress assumed national prerogatives, and the people by their silence consented, that moment the people of the colonies were constituted a nation, and that revolutionary Congress was the authorized Government of that nation. But the declaration was made "by the authority of the good people," and hence it was their declaration.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether from that moment they became the representatives of the nation, or whether they still retained their position as representatives of the States?

Mr. GARFIELD. They were both. They were still representatives of the States; but the additional function was added of their being national representatives as well as State. They then took upon them that which now belongs to the gentleman, the twofold quality of State citizenship and national citizenship. The gentleman is twice a citizen, subject to two jurisdictions; and so were they.

III. The sovereignty of this people, then, was first lodged in the revolutionary Congress; and it continued there until the 1st day of March, 1781, when they lodged it in the Articles of Confederation. They established then a confederacy, properly so called; and even that confederacy was declared to establish a "perpetual Union." Even it, with all its loose phrases and provisions, left small ground for the doctrine of secession.

IV. On the 21st day of June, 1783, a new lodgment of this sovereignty of the American people was made. It was then lodged in this Constitution of the United States under which we now act—lodged there by the action of the people. In each of these successive steps the people have altered and amended the fundamental law of the land as it has pleased them. In each change they have made a stronger and safer Government.

If the gentleman looks, then, for a kind of political "apostolic succession" of American sovereignty, he will find it in this order, and this would be the genealogy: first, the Crown and Parliament of Great Britain; second, the revolutionary Congress; third, the Articles of Confederation; and fourth and now, the Constitution of the United States.

Well, now, if no one of these colonies was sovereign and independent, when and how did any of the States become so? The gentleman must show us by whose act it was done and read us the record. I think I have shown that the gentleman's position has no foundation in history.

But let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that up to the day of the adoption of our present Constitution the colonies were separately sovereign and independent. Who made the Constitution an authoritative instrument? It tells its own story best. "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution"—not "we the sovereign States, do enter a league, or form a compact of confederation." In that great initial action of the people what limits or restrictions confined them? Absolutely no human power, no barriers of sovereignty. There was nothing to restrain them but the laws of nature and the laws of God as they understood them. Over that limitless expanse they ranged at will, and out of such material as their wisdom selected they built the fabric of our Constitution.

And now I ask my colleague [Mr. PENDLETON] by what means the will of this nation reaches me with its obligations? I answer, only as that will is revealed to me in the logical and grammatical meaning of the words and phrases of the written Constitution. Beyond this there is, there can be, no legal force or potency. If the amending power granted in the Constitution be in any way abridged or restricted, such restriction must be found in the just meaning of the instrument itself. Any other doctrine would overthrow the whole fabric of jurisprudence. What are the limitations of the amending power? Plainly and only these:

"That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."—Article V.

The first being only restricted to the year 1808, is of course functus officio, and no longer operative; the last is still binding. The gentleman [Mr. PENDLETON] does not claim that any other sentence is restrictive; but there is something not written down, a tertium quid, a kind of exhalation rising out of the depths of the Constitution, that has the power of itself to stay the hand of the people of this great Republic in their attempt to put away an evil that is deleterious to the nation's life. He would lead us in pursuit of these intangible shadows, would place us in the dominion of vague, invisible powers that exhale, like odors, from the Constitution, but are more potent than the Constitution itself. Such an ignis fatuus I am not disposed to follow, especially when it leads to a hopeful future for human slavery.

It is therefore evident to me that we are not limited in the power of amendment beyond what is fairly written down as a prohibition.

The able and distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWEN] failed to convince me in the point he made yesterday that the preamble could not be amended. I ask him to consider this: could our forefathers have adopted a different preamble when they were making the original Constitution; could they have put it in other words, or could they have declared other objects as the basis of their Constitution? If they could have made a different preamble, declaring other and different objects, so can we now declare other objects in our amendments. The preamble is itself amendable just as is every clause of the Constitution, excepting only the ones already referred to.

The gentleman [Mr. PENDLETON] puts another case which I wish to notice. He says that nine of the thirteen original colonies adopted the Constitution, and by the very terms of it it was binding only on the nine. So if three fourths of the States should pass this amendment it would not bind the other fourth.

In commenting upon this clause Judge Tucker, of Virginia, in his appendix to Blackstone, says that if the four colonies had not adopted the Constitution they would have been a foreign people. The writers of the Federalist hold a different doctrine, and fall back upon the original right of the nation to preserve itself, and say that the nine States would have had the right to compel the other four to come in. But the question is unimportant from the fact that they did come in and adopt the Constitution. The contract once ratified, and obligations once taken, they became an integral part of an indivisible nation, as indivisible as a State. I therefore agree in full with my colleague from the Columbus district, [Mr. Cox,] that with the exception of the two cases of limitation, two thirds of Congress and three fourths of the States can do anything in the way of amendment, being bounded only by their patriotism and sense of duty. The field is therefore open to us, completely and fully opened.

I ask now what those gentlemen propose by delaying the death-day of slavery? I wish they might become so jealous of their betrothed that they would say of her even out of the depths of their love as did Othello the Moor:

"Yet she must die, else she'll betray more men."

Has she not betrayed and slain men enough? Are they not strewn over a thousand battle-fields? Is not this Moloch of slavery gorged with the bloody feast? Gentlemen, you know the day of its death is fast approaching. Nothing can stay it. The States are freeing themselves one by one; and you know that in a few weeks at furthest another Congress will strike the blow if you do not. We ask you, then, in the name of justice, in the name of the Republic, hold not back the uplifted sword now drawn to strike the final blow; strike down; grant no reprieve to the bloodiest of malefactors.

I did not intend, Mr. Speaker, ever to address this House upon the subject of slavery. I had almost promised myself that I might turn my thoughts to other and larger fields soon to open before us; but when I saw the institution maintained again and again in this House I could not resist my inclination to strike one blow in hope of hastening its doom.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed, severally with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution and bill of the House of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1864; and

An act (H. R. No. 598) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, an act (H. R. No. 458) for the relief of George Mowrey.

Also, that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a joint resolution and bills of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) for the relief of Peter Wheeler;

An act (H. R. No. 43) for the relief of Milo Sutliff and Levi H. Case;

An act (H. R. No. 261) to provide for the voluntary enlistment of any persons residents of certain States into the regiments of other States;

An act (H. R. No. 516) for the relief of Frances Munson; and

An act (H. R. No. 520) for the relief of Samuel Beaton, master of the schooner George Harris.

Also, that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 595) for the relief of Edmund S. Zevely, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the resolution in relation to the reciprocity treaty, and concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I object. I should like to have the matter further considered.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill be taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY—AGAIN.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know who has the floor, but I should be glad if I could have, now that I am up, ten minutes of some gentleman's time.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I will yield the gentleman a few minutes of my time.

Mr. STEVENS. I will detain the House but a few minutes. I see, upon looking at the Globe of yesterday, that my distinguished colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] if I understand his language aright—and he always speaks with "classic accuracy"—has exonerated those in arms in the rebel States from the responsibility of this bloody war and placed it upon the shoulders of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (myself,) and those who act and think with him in this House.

Sir, that is a grave charge, coming especially from a gentleman who seeks one of the highest places in this nation, and who may possibly receive a few votes for it; and it is therefore, I think, proper that my position, and the position of those who act with me, with regard to this question and our responsibility for the cause of this war, should be in a few summary words set forth in connection with this debate.

Mr. PENDLETON. I only desire that the gentleman shall quote the language I used in immediate connection with the interpretation which he is giving it.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman said—

"Let him be careful, lest when the passions of these times be passed away, and the historian shall go back to discover where was the original infraction of the Constitution, he may find that sin lies at the door of others than the people now in arms."

This was addressed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] to the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] and others who have acted and thought with me. I infer from this, if I can understand the "classical accuracy" of the gentleman, that he means that we, and not they, were the cause of this war.

Mr. Speaker, that charge, as I have stated, is a grave one, and if true ought to induce us, not only to feel great regret, but deep remorse for our conduct. What, then, up to the time of the breaking out of this rebellion, was the position of "the gentleman from Pennsylvania," and those who acted with him upon the subject of slavery, that caused this war? I beg but a few moments to state it.

From my earliest youth I was taught to read the Declaration of Independence and to revere its sublime principles. As I advanced in life and became somewhat enabled to consult the writings of the great men of antiquity, I found in all their works which have survived the ravages of time and come down to the present generation, one unanimous denunciation of tyranny and of slavery, and eulogy of liberty. Homer, Æschylus the great Greek tragedian, Cicero, Hesiod, Virgil, Tacitus, and Sallust, in immortal language, all denounced slavery as a thing which took away half the man and degraded human beings, and sang peans in the noblest strains to the goddess of liberty. And my hatred of this infernal institution and my love of liberty were further inflamed as I saw the inspired teachings of Socrates and the divine inspirations of Jesus.

Being fixed in these principles, immovably and immutably, I took my stand among my fellow-citizens, and on all occasions, whether in public or in private, in season and, if there could be such a time, out of season, I never hesitated to express those ideas and sentiments, and when I first went into public assemblies, forty years ago, I uttered this language. I have done it amid the pelting and hooting of mobs, but I never quailed before the infernal spirit, and I hope I never shrank from the responsibility of my language.

When, thirty years ago, I entered the Legislature of the State which I now in part represent, I carried with me the same feeling and the same determination; for this feeling grew with my growth and strengthened with my strength, but I thank God it has not decayed with enfeebling age.

Carrying into that body these same feelings, I there expressed them, and at one time found a unanimous Democratic party to respond to them in the strongest resolution that I could draw. The noble Governor, the first that our party elected in those times, Governor Ritner, who is now spending an honored old age in retirement, in the first message that had come since 1780 on that subject, denounced the dark spirit of slavery.

When, fifteen years ago, I was honored with a seat in this body, it was dangerous to talk against this institution, a danger which gentlemen now here will never be able to appreciate. Some of us, however, have experienced it; my friend from Illinois on my right [Mr. WASHBURN] has. And yet, sir, I did not hesitate, in the midst of bowie-knives and revolvers and howling demons upon the other side of the House, to stand here and denounce this infamous institution in language which possibly now, on looking at it, I might deem intemperate, but which I then deemed necessary to rouse the public attention and cast odium upon the worst institution upon earth, one which is a disgrace to man and would be an annoyance to the infernal spirits.

Mr. Speaker, while I thus denounced it and uttered my sentiments in favor of universal freedom everywhere, I found in the Constitution of my country what I construed, whatever others may think, as a prohibition from touching slavery where it existed; and through all my course I recognized and bowed to a provision in that Constitution which I always regarded as its only blot; and I challenge the scrutiny of my respected colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other gentleman, through all the records of utterances in this House, to find one single motion or one single word which claimed on our part to touch slavery in the States where it existed. We admitted that it was there, protected by that instrument. We claimed that in the Territories we had full power over it, and in the District of Columbia, and I, with those who acted with me, could not hesitate as to what our duty required in excluding it from the free soil of the country and confining it to the spots it already polluted. I claimed the right to abolish it in the District of Columbia, as Congress was the only Legislature on earth that could touch it here. I heard the great man of the West once say that it was a sin and shame to believe that there was no power on earth that could abolish it over every inch of ground in the world. But, sir, I did not claim early to act upon it here, but I rather proposed to let it rest until a more propitious moment should arrive before we acted upon it.

Such, sir, was my position, and the position of the party with which I acted in this Hall—not disturbing slavery where the Constitution protected it, but abolishing it wherever we had the constitutional power, and prohibiting its further extension. I claimed the right then, as I claim the right now, to denounce it everywhere, even in foreign lands, so that if such language could anywhere affect public sentiment it might do so. I claimed the right then, as I claim it now, to hedge it into the smallest space; but no man with whom I acted ever proposed to violate the Constitution for the purpose of touching slavery.

So much on that point. One other word, not directly on that. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] says that I go on the maxim that "what is broken in one thing is broken in all," and that hence, if there was one infraction of the Constitution it was dissolved. That is the coinage of the gentleman's own fertile brain. I never uttered such a sentiment nor held it. The Constitution may be violated in many parts, and remain intact in all others. The gentleman had, perhaps naturally enough, confounded what I had said with what he finds in a sacred book, where it is said that a violation of the least of the commandments is a violation of all. It was not I that said it, but another much greater.

Ingenious gentlemen argue, and many honest men will delude their consciences in voting, in favor of still sustaining the institution on the ground that the Constitution does not allow an amendment on this point. They go on the ground that the subject of slavery has not been intrusted to us by the States, and that therefore it is reserved. Now, as the Constitution now stands, that is true. But we are not now inquiring whether we have jurisdiction over slavery. We are inquiring whether the States have granted to us the power of amendment. That is the subject—not the subject of slavery, not the subject of religion, not the subject of anything else—but, have the States yielded to Congress the right to amend? If they have, then the whole question is answered. Not only have they granted that power, but wherever they intended to except anything from the power of amendment, they have said so. My learned friend knows that when a statute excepts certain things, everything else is meant by it. Will the Clerk read the clause of the Constitution?

The Clerk read, as follows:

Mr. STEVENS. No lawyer who wishes to understand it can deny that, with the exceptions contained in that proviso, the power to amend the Constitution is unlimited. There is no subject on earth relating to Government that you cannot touch. Nowhere in that original instrument did the States grant the right of legislating on the subject of religion; and yet the very first amendment that was made under this power refers to the subject of religion and the freedom of speech, showing the fallacy of the arguments of those who say that you can amend only the subjects granted to Congress.

Perhaps I ought not to occupy so much time, and I will only say one word further. So far as the appeals of the learned gentleman [Mr. PENDLETON] are concerned, in his pathetic winding up, I will be willing to take my chance, when we all molder in the dust. He may have his epitaph written, if it be truly written, "Here rests the ablest and most pertinacious defender of slavery and opponent of liberty;" and I will be satisfied if my epitaph shall be written thus: "Here lies one who never rose to any eminence, and who only courted the low ambition to have it said that he had striven to ameliorate the condition of the poor, the lowly, the downtrodden of every race and language and color." [Applause.]

I shall be content, with such a eulogy on his lofty tomb and such an inscription on my humble grave, to trust our memories to the judgment of after ages.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, if the House were now ready to sustain a call for the previous question and come to a vote, I would gladly give way to have the vote taken. I shall not undertake an elaborate or extended argument, nor make a long speech. I propose only to take some notice of what is said or implied in one or two of the arguments that have been urged against the measure now before the House.

1. One argument against the measure assumes that the people of this Republic cannot safely be trusted with control of the form of their national government. It is said that if we admit that the people have rightful authority to amend the Constitution so as to abolish and prohibit slavery, it will follow that the people have also authority to set up a monarchy, or do anything else that implies unlimited control over the form of their government, therefore such authority must be denied. That is to say, the right of self-government, the right of democratic institutions, the right of the people of these States to be the source and the organizers of political power in the nation, must not be admitted, because it would be dangerous to trust the people with full power to amend the Constitution and decide for themselves how and by what methods they will be governed.

Certainly it is not paying a high compliment to the people of this nation to assume that they would, under any circumstances, set up a monarchy or transform the Republic into a hideous despotism like that of Dahomey. It represents nothing in the character or the political faith of the men who framed our Government. They had faith in the people, and could not tolerate a policy that would place them under guardianship. Doubtless some needy royal prince, some starving monarch out of business, some benevolent and pitiful Maximilian might have been found to undertake the business of putting the people under discipline and keeping them out of mischief; but the men of the Revolution felt no need of such keepers. Let me add that he who can see, in the endeavor to abolish and prohibit slavery, a disposition to revolutionize the Government and establish a despotism, must have eyes that can see horrid shapes of ugliness where there is nothing but perfect beauty, and be haunted by the blackest night amid the brightest and most transfiguring sunshine. Is it love of freedom and desire to establish justice that subjects nations to despotism? He is not sane who believes it.

2. It appears to me that in the discussion of this question of power to amend the Constitution two things have been confounded that should be considered separately. One is, what can be done to amend the Constitution within the limits of that instrument, while preserving it and along with it the republican form of government it has created; the other is, the right of the people to change the form of their government by setting aside the present republican Constitution and putting in its place another constitution entirely different. No man will deny that our national Constitution requires a republican form of government. Nor can it easily be denied that not only the preamble but also the whole intent and spirit of the instrument require all amendments to be in harmony with republican principles. But it does not follow that the people of these States have lost the right to change entirely the form of their government by means of a new Constitution regularly adopted. You may call such a change of the form of government "an amendment of the Constitution" if you will, for in securing it the same method must be pursued that is required for the most unimportant change; but you must admit that it is an amendment "in the nature of a substitute."

But let us consider what is chiefly meant by the representation that the measure before the House "changes the form of the Government." It is quite possible that some gentlemen are not yet emancipated from the notion that slavery itself is the chief thing in our form of government. For years the slave power was persistently put forward as "the Constitution and the laws." Slavery and nothing else is meant now, by some gentlemen, when they put on sad countenances and talk mournfully of "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." It is not surprising that such people talk as if the form of our Government would be wrecked and the foundations of the earth put out of course if slavery should be swept away by such an amendment of the national Constitution. But their astonishing monomania does not change the nature of things. It cannot transform a devil into a seraph, nor make an outrageous barbarism pass current as Christian civilization.

But, in this discussion, the representation that the measure now under consideration "changes the form of our Government," has chiefly meant that it denies that theory of "State sovereignty" to which secession treason appeals for justification, and which is so pertinaciously urged here by some gentlemen on the other side of the House. They assume that this disorganizing theory describes correctly the form of our Government, and, of course, proceed to talk as if the Government itself would be wrecked if their theory of "State sovereignty" should fail to regulate the proceedings of Congress and the people. In their view "the form of our Government would be changed" by any measure that should spurn this pestilent theory and trample it under foot; a theory that is utterly unwarranted by anything in the national Constitution or in the history of our political institutions.

Our national Union was established by the Declaration of Independence. Previous to that Declaration there were no States; there were only colonies and dependencies of Great Britain. The Union and the States came into existence together as a nation. By the Federal Constitution this national Union was organized, consolidated, and made more perfect. This doctrine of independent State sovereignty was not tolerated in the constitutional Convention, for the men who controlled that Convention and represented the spirit of the country meant that this Republic should be a great and inseparable nation. After the national Government was fully organized, and during the administration of John Adams, while the country was agitated by a storm of political excitement, the factious vehemence of the Opposition gave birth to this doctrine, that the national Union is merely a compact, league, or agency of independent State sovereignties. I refer, of course, to the notorious Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798-99. I do not think the men of that time who were concerned in this business understood very well what they did. Certainly they did not mean all that has since been meant by the nullifiers and secessionists.

These resolutions were intended chiefly as partisan devices to break down the Administration. Not until years afterward was it publicly known that Mr. Jefferson had any connection with them. Nevertheless he wrote the resolutions that were adopted by the Kentucky Legislature. It was intended that the same resolutions should be adopted by the Legislature of Virginia, but the Virginians hesitated and turned to Mr. Madison for a milder and more equivocal edition of this gospel of nullification. The political atmosphere being full of insanity, and Mr. Jefferson's influence very pressing, he complied. It was a compliance which he did not afterward remember with satisfaction. The ostensible purpose of these resolutions was to array "State sovereignty" against certain acts of Congress. With all the impressive formalities that seemed desirable they were sent forth to every State in the Union. And what was the result? What judgment did the nation pass upon the doctrines set forth in them? Not another State in the Union would indorse the resolutions. The general judgment was briefly and tersely expressed by the State of Delaware as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Delaware, in General Assembly met, That they consider the resolutions from the State of Virginia as a very unjustifiable interference with the General Government and constituted authorities of the United States, and of dangerous tendency, and therefore not fit subject for further consideration by the General Assembly."

This judgment of the whole nation against the pernicious and destructive doctrine of independent State sovereignty, passed, too, within eight years after the Constitution was adopted, shows conclusively how contrary that doctrine was to the political doctrines and purposes of the men who established the Government. No political party at that time, nor for fifty years afterward, could be induced to indorse those resolutions. Mr. Jefferson himself made no further use of them. In fact, no Administration has interpreted the Constitution more loosely, or shown less deference to the doctrines of the resolutions of 1798 and 1799, than Mr. Jefferson's. His aim was accomplished; the old Federal party was overthrown; for the next twenty-four years we had for Presidents, first Jefferson, next Madison, and then Monroe, all Virginians. The resolutions of 1798 and 1799 were laid away quietly, shielded from much of the infamy that would have been their lot under different circumstances, and henceforth were heard of only now and then when some curious explorer in the dust-holes of past political history spoke of them civilly as "Virginia abstractions."

Mr. Madison, as I have said, was never afterward quite at ease in regard to these resolutions. When Mr. Calhoun and his followers brought them forth again to justify their attempt to overthrow the Government by means of nullification, Mr. Madison protested, and denied with great earnestness that the Virginia resolutions had any such meaning as the Calhounists found in them. His private correspondence of that date is full of references to this subject. But the letter of the resolutions was evidently against him; and, feeling this, he said in a letter to William C. Rives, dated March 12, 1833:

"A few words, with prophetic gift, might have prevented much error in the glosses on those proceedings."

Writing to Martin Van Buren, March 13, 1827, on "the Georgia business," he said:

"If it be understood that our political system contains no provisions for deciding questions between the Union and its members but that of negotiation, and, this failing, but that of war, as between separate and independent Powers, no time ought to be lost in supplying, by some mode or other, the awful omission. What has been called a Government is, on that supposition, a mere league only; a league with too many parties to be uniformly observed or effectively maintained."

Writing to James Robertson, April 20, 1831, he said:

"That the people of the United States formed the Constitution will be denied or affirmed, according to the sense in which the expression is understood. The main question is whether they have not given to the Charter a sanction in a capacity and a mode that shuts the door against all such disuniting and nullifying doctrines as those lately advanced."

Writing to William C. Rives, March 12, 1833, Mr. Madison said:

"What can be more preposterous than to say that the United States, as united, are in no respect or degree a nation which implies a sovereignty; although acknowledged to be such by all other nations and sovereigns, and maintaining with them all the international relations of war and peace, treaties, commerce, &c.; and, on the other hand, and at the same time, to say that the States separately are completely nations and sovereigns, although they can separately neither speak nor hearken to any other nation, nor maintain with it any of the international relations whatever; and would be disowned as nations if presenting themselves in that character?"

In calling attention to these passages in the private correspondence of Mr. Madison, my aim is to show how completely he, the writer of the Virginia resolutions, repudiated the doctrines of the Calhounists, modern secessionists, and other advocates of independent State sovereignty, who have appealed to those resolutions, the old utterances of partisan monomania, as if they contained a very sacred political gospel. The founders of our Government intended that the great American Republic should be a nation, a sovereign Power, with right to defend its own existence by whatever means may be necessary, and to stand forth among the nations of the earth mighty and glorious in the power of free principles and free men, able to crush with irresistible force all enemies domestic or foreign. Nothing was further from their intention or their favor than this doctrine of State sovereignty which transforms the national Union into a loose league, with no central authority to enforce allegiance and assert national sovereignty, a mere sham, a structure that may fall to pieces at a word from any of the parties to it.

Mr. Speaker, if we have learned anything from the sad experience of the last three or four years, it is that slavery should be destroyed in this Republic, and by an amendment of the national Constitution be forbidden, and made for evermore impossible wherever the national banner floats as the symbol of our national sovereignty. Why should slavery be so strenuously supported at the present time? It is an outlaw to civilization; and this southern treason has now made it an outlaw to the Government, to patriotism, and to all honest regard for the welfare of the nation. The slave power has bred traitors as naturally as foul vapors breed disease, or as a den of thieves breeds villainy. Any compromise with it would necessarily become to us "the mother of woe, and death, and hell." Let it be destroyed, for our republican institutions cannot be safe while it exists! Let it be destroyed that the rights of man may be vindicated and eternal justice satisfied.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. HIGBY, who moved that the House do now adjourn.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] withdraw the motion to adjourn, to allow me to call up the amendment of the Senate to the resolution terminating the reciprocity treaty?

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up the Senate amendment to joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] withdraws the objection he made some time ago.

Mr. WARD. I object, unless I can have an opportunity to move to refer the joint resolution and amendment to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. It will not be in order to submit such a motion until the joint resolution and amendment are taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. WARD. It will be in order to submit that motion as soon as it is taken up?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order, unless the previous question shall be ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not call the previous question before giving the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] an opportunity to submit his motion to refer.

Mr. WARD. I must insist upon my objection at this time because the House is not now full. I do not wish a question of such gravity to be decided in a thin House. But when the House meets on Monday I will not object to its consideration.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be understood that this shall be taken up on Monday and considered.

The SPEAKER. It is hardly competent for the House at this time to determine, even by unanimous consent, what shall be done on Monday; for an objection will then hold against the consideration of this joint resolution and amendment at this time. The House, by unanimous consent, can take it up at this time and make it the special order for Monday at one o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will agree to that.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object. On motion of Mr. HIGBY, (at four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

TREATMENT OF PRISONERS OF WAR.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I desire to present a memorial from a great number of the most respectable citizens of Fort Wayne, in the State of Indiana; and in making a motion to refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs I propose to explain as briefly as possible my position in reference to the prayer of the memorialists. The memorial is to this effect:

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned citizens of Fort Wayne, Allen county, and State of Indiana, would respectfully request your honorable body to pass a law, with as little delay as possible, to place all of the rebel prisoners now in our hands under the control of those officers and men who have been in rebel hands, and that the same rations and treatment be extended to the rebel prisoners that our men have experienced at their hands; and that the same be continued until the rebels exchange all of our men in their hands, or treat them with that degree of humanity that the rules of war require. And for which your petitioners will ever pray.

It is made my duty, at the request of these constituents of mine, to present this memorial, and in doing so I desire to state that my own sympathies and feelings are in exact accordance with the prayer of the memorialists.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will permit me, I will offer now a resolution that I have drawn up on that very subject, so that he may make his remarks upon it.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Certainly; the interruption is very appropriate.

Mr. WADE. I send to the desk a resolution on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received at this time, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of these resolutions all prisoners, both officers and soldiers, of the confederacy, so called, who are now or shall be in the power, control, and keeping of the Federal Government, shall receive the same rations, the same amount of clothing, and be subject to the same treatment in every respect as Federal prisoners of war, both officers and soldiers, who are now or have been in the power, control, and keeping of the confederate government, so called, have received.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That when it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the President of the United States that the confederacy have changed their treatment of Federal prisoners for better or for worse, it shall be his duty to change the treatment of confederate prisoners in like manner.

Sec. 3. And be it further resolved, That if any officer or officers having such prisoner or prisoners in charge shall fail to comply with and rigidly carry out the provisions of the foregoing resolutions, such officer or officers so offending shall be immediately dismissed the service and subject to such further punishment as a court-martial shall in their discretion see fit to inflict.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I am under obligations to the distinguished Senator from Ohio for the introduction of these resolutions, that will, if passed, effect one of the objects contemplated by the memorial, but will leave untouched another object, as I think, equally important with the first, and that is, that the custody of these rebel prisoners shall be placed in the hands of Union officers who have been released from rebel prisons; who know precisely the treatment they received and the rations they got; and it seems to me the whole object contemplated by the memorial cannot be effected without the incorporation of that principle in the resolutions, though I shall certainly vote for them as now presented if they be not amended. I speak, Mr. President, for those who have no voice to speak for themselves. I speak for your brave soldier-boys in rebel prisons, languishing, undergoing uncomplaining and silent yet certain martyrdom for the great cause in which we are engaged; men who are haunted by day with the terrible specter of death from starvation, and whose uneasy repose at night is interrupted by the same grim and terrible specter. The attention of the whole country has been called to the barbarities and atrocities perpetrated against our prisoners. The world has heard, and heard with horror, of these rebel barbarities. I am not here to complain of our authorities for I know from frequent interviews, both with the President and with the Secretary of War, that they have desired most ardently and labored most earnestly and honestly to effect a fair exchange of prisoners; but the rebel authorities seem alike to trample upon all the laws of God and man. Now, sir, if this is to be a war of extermination, let not the extermination be all upon one side. Mercy to felons and traitors is cruelty to our own soldiers in southern prisons.

But gentlemen say that by this system of retaliation we shall invite counterretaliation upon the part of the rebels. Sir, to what system of retaliation can they resort more terrible in its consequences than their treatment under the present system? The law of retaliation has been resorted to in every war from the beginning of the world to the present moment. Every system of warfare is but a system of mutual retaliation, and can be carried on under no other possible principle.

I speak not only for those poor prisoners, but I speak in behalf of the agonized and bleeding hearts of one hundred thousand homes in the loyal States, whose husbands, brothers, and sons are languishing in southern prisons. I speak in behalf of the maimed and crippled veterans who are hobbling around your Halls on crutches and asking that something shall be done for the relief of your brave soldiers in rebel prisons, their noble brothers in arms, who are now dying for the cause for which they shed their blood.

We are told that our authorities have done all that they could do. They have, I doubt not, honestly endeavored to effect an amelioration of the condition of those prisoners; but so far, unfortunately, they have been unsuccessful. I think, then, it is time, and high time, that another system should be resorted to. I know that mercy is a noble attribute, a godlike attribute, but justice, patriotism, and all the high motives which are drawn from the sufferings and the horrors of these prisoners also appeal to us as men, patriots, and Christians.

We are told further that this system of retaliation will exasperate the people of the South. I have heard that statement too often already. They now indulge in a system of warfare the most barbarous and atrocious known to the history of modern civilization, and they can do no worse if we resolve, in justice to our own soldiers, to mete out to those we have captured from the rebel army their own measure; at least until they shall reform their conduct in reference to our men. Will any act of ours further exasperate those felons, and traitors, and demons in human shape? After the tiger has tasted blood, do soft words appease him, or a hostile gesture exasperate? No, sir, the savage and the beast alike act on their instincts; they have gone to the very utmost verge of barbarity and cruelty in their punishments already.

There are now about forty-five thousand Union soldiers in rebel prisons. We have about double that number of rebel prisoners in our hands. Those forty-five thousand men, a great army of themselves, are reduced by starvation to a state of utter helplessness, and if they remain in those prisons can never render active service again in our armies. Those of them who escape the slow tortures of death by starvation, return emaciated and feeble and unfit for service. Our system is, as Christian men should do, to feed and clothe and provide for their men when prisoners in our hands. Every one we send back to them is in a condition of efficiency far greater than he was when he entered our prisons. Then you see the effect. We returned last month some fifteen thousand rebel prisoners in excellent condition, having been fed and fattened upon Government rations; and we received wrecks, skeletons in their stead, shocking to our common humanity. Measures of mercy having failed, it is time we resorted to a different system—a system of strict retaliation marked by justice in every feature. I think the people demand it. They have with great patience borne all these things in the hope that by merciful treatment we still might bring these felons and traitors to their senses; but all these measures have failed. Now I propose, first, that all the camps of rebel prisoners shall be placed under the command of officers who have endured the hardships of southern captivity, who know what the southern rations have been; and, second, that we shall mete out to them the same treatment meted out to us.

You have many measures, Mr. President, pending before the Senate for the purpose of promoting enlistments in the Army and increasing its efficiency, all well in their kind; and you have had important debates in reference to the African race, and recently in reference to the Indian race; but here are forty-five thousand of our own noble soldier-boys in prison, and it is time that we should legislate somewhat in their behalf. These measures to promote enlistments in the Army and to increase the efficiency of the Army are all well enough; but if you pass the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio, or if you enact the language of this memorial into a law, you will have done more by that act to promote enlistments and to increase the efficiency of the Army than by passing any other measure now under consideration before the Senate. You wish to give inducements to men to enlist as soldiers; at least you do not wish to hold out a discouragement to enlistments. If you ask a man to enlist when he knows that if the chances of war shall make him a captive in the hands of the enemy, death would be a thousand times preferable to the horrors of captivity, where is the inducement to enlist? Nothing but the high motives and inspirations of a patriotism unparalleled in the history of the world have kept our armies full up to the present moment. But teach the soldier that your eye is upon him; that you will protect him; that you will follow him to his prison, and even to his grave, with your benefactions, and you give him an additional inducement to enlist; you encourage his family and friends, and foster that high and heroic spirit which has made our noble Army invincible, and you teach a lesson to those traitors in arms that they cannot with impunity trample upon all their obligations to God as Christians and all their obligations to the world to abide by the laws of civilized warfare; you teach them that lesson, a lesson that they should have learned long ago.

I saw recently an article in a newspaper stating that if you adopt this system of retaliation you will make the war still bloodier. How much bloodier can you make it, and what principles of savage ferocity can you exasperate these people to adopt that they have not already adopted? Make the war bloodier! How bloody is it already? Two hundred thousand of your soldiers have found martyrs' graves in southern soil. Sir, I would make the war still bloodier; I would make every rocky ravine in southern Georgia and Alabama run with the blood of traitors, and I would drive into the Gulf stream the last rebel there before I would recognize their system of conducting this war, or recognize their independence. Yea, I would invoke the spirit of the evil one, if he has not already entered and possessed the souls of these traitors, so that they should run voluntarily down into the sea, and let the Gulf stream be their last resting place, unless they are willing to return to their allegiance to the Government. The moment they do that the war ceases.

But another gentleman says this is not the time for this policy while peace commissioners at Richmond, it may be, are talking about peace. Sir, the cry of peace is a grand humbug that has been exploded a thousand times. There is but one way to peace, and that is by establishing the supremacy of the laws, by breaking down the military organization of the rebels, by destroying their armies, and then making them return to their allegiance to the Government. Peace can only come through bloody and successful war, and we are but inapt scholars of history if the experience of the last four years has not taught us that. The President has again and again offered to them all that we can constitutionally offer, which is to abandon the war, lay down their arms, become good citizens, and from that very moment the war ceases; but until they shall do that the war will never cease. This whole talk of peace commissioners at this stage is a humbug and a delusion. It is encouraging false hopes never to be realized. It is asking an armistice that the rebels may recuperate their energies and again slaughter your sons upon the battle-field.

Mr. President, the theme to which I have spoken is a great and a noble one, and I only regret that it has not had an abler and more distinguished advocate.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter extensively into a debate on this subject. Indeed I hope no debate is necessary. I know with what reluctance every man feels compelled to enter upon this system of retaliation. It is always inhuman, harrowing to the heart and feelings of every just man, and is only to be resorted to, in my judgment, when absolute necessity compels us to resort to it as a means of obtaining justice.

Nearly a year ago the committee on the conduct of the war were instructed to inquire into the condition of our prisoners as they returned from southern prisons. The committee immediately entered upon that work. We took somewhere about a hundred depositions of the victims of this inhumanity from the rebel States. We also took the testimony of a great many surgeons and medical men who testified as to what their treatment had been, and showed beyond a possible doubt that thousands of our men had suffered the most lingering and inhuman death by means of starvation and exposure. The specimens that were returned whom we saw, and whose testimony we took, were on the verge of the grave, and some of them dying as we took their testimony. We embodied our observations in a report, a report that has not been pretended to be gainsaid or denied by anybody.

I understood when we went forth to take that testimony that it was to enlighten the Executive as to the exact facts in regard to this matter; that the inhumanity was so great, it shocked the sense of mankind to such a degree, that the Executive, like everybody else, was unwilling to believe that such a thing could exist at this age of the world; and I understood also, that if the testimony proved the facts to be as alleged, the Executive had promised us that he would take the most energetic means of retaliation, and endeavor in that way to prevent it. It has run on from that day to this. I have constantly hoped and wished and believed that as this reiterated evidence came to our knowledge day after day, and month after month, it would stir those in authority to do something. But, sir, all is silent; I see no movement anywhere. I felt it therefore incumbent upon me even to endeavor to wake up the country to a sense of our responsibility, to endeavor to do something in behalf of these brave suffering men who have gone forth with a spirit of patriotism and self-denial unparalleled, and have been too long overlooked.

I was still further impelled to do this when I saw how easily the sympathies of our people were aroused in behalf of these accursed rebels, unrepentant, so far as I know, living in cities we have lately conquered. The hearts of our population seem moved in their behalf. I do not object to it. They are sending provisions by the ship load to relieve these rebels who have caused all this misery to our men, and who, if they are suffering, are suffering justly in consequence of their own crimes. Near by these very cities are now lingering in these infernal dens our brave men starving to death, tortured to death by exposure and ill treatment; and yet I do not hear of ship loads of provisions and comforts going to them. Yes, sir, perhaps within ten miles of the very place where these things are to be distributed lie our poor, brave men, suffering all that malignity, barbarity, and brutality can inflict upon men; and yet we find our people moving in behalf of those who have brought this misery on the country, and compelled us to sacrifice the best of our men in such a cause.

Sir, it has gone further. I see it announced in the papers—I do not know that it is true; I hope it is not—that a late eminent rebel, one whose counsels have done more to bring this misery upon the people than any other I know of, lately, dissatisfied with his old rival, and getting into a quarrel there, attempted to seek shelter within our lines—so the report runs—but being apprehended by his old rival and enemy before he got here was taken back; and the papers say it stirred the hearts of some of our executive Government until they put forth their threats that if a hair of his head was harmed, four of the highest rebel officers should answer for it. Sir, if such retaliation may be done in behalf of a vile, accursed rebel, I hope the same meed of justice may be extended to our own loyal, brave, and suffering men.

I look with no complacency on this misplaced humanity. Why, sir, if that renegade from the southern confederacy was taken by us, we ought to take his life ignominiously; he should hang the next hour; and yet if he gets back there, and they do him justice, we are going to sacrifice four of the rebel leaders in retaliation!

Mr. CLARK. We ought to hang them ourselves.

Mr. WADE. I do not care how many of them you hang; but I would not hang a dog in such a cause as that. [Laughter.]

But, sir, to return to the subject. I rejoice to find that my friend from Indiana is stirred up, and that I shall have his powerful aid to get through these resolutions. I like his suggestion also in regard to the treatment of these prisoners being placed in the hands of those of our men who have suffered in southern prisons; and if it had occurred to me my resolutions would have been more perfect than they are. I hope that he will offer an amendment that these prisoners shall be placed under the charge and custody of the officers and men who have served in the rebel prisons, and who know exactly what meet of retaliation they deserve. I hope they will be so amended; and I shall accept such a modification if the gentleman will offer it, and I hope he will.

I hope, sir, that this resolution will not be suffered to pass from our hands until we have passed it so far as we can do so into a law. We have waited long enough, yea, too long, and before the world and before our own consciences we cannot justify the lenity we have already bestowed upon these rebels. Why, sir, in their report the committee on the conduct of the war were compelled to announce that this system of starvation and exposure was a deliberate, premeditated principle of the rebels, adopted to kill off and destroy and render unfit for military service every man that fell into their hands. The evidence warranted us in saying so. We could come to no other conclusion. Such is the accursed fact that will stand and stare this so-called southern confederacy in the face to the end of time; a deliberate purpose by brutality, inhumanity, exposure, and starvation to destroy the manhood of the unfortunate brave men who happened to fall into their hands as prisoners of war for the base and accursed purpose of rendering them unfit for military service. We announced it; nobody denied it; and yet, to our shame and the shame of the country be it spoken, nothing has been done. We lack spirit; we lack sympathy with our brave soldiers in the field. Everything demands immediate action on that subject. Let us retrace our steps; let us, so far as we can, redeem the time, and let not an hour pass until the means of retaliation are adopted.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not rise to protract the discussion, but simply to call the attention of the Senate to the present state of the subject before this body. During the last session, when it was before us in some form—I do not now recollect what—I expressed a disposition myself to bring in a measure the object of which was to resort to the rule of retaliation for the purpose of restraining the insurgents henceforth from the practice of such barbarities upon our prisoners in their hands; but on further consideration of the subject, and on consulting with my friends about it, I thought it best to let it pass by for the present, but always in the hope that the Executive of the United States, as the head of the military authority of the United States, would take it into his hands promptly and apply such remedy as the rules of war suggest. I have always entertained that hope, and I have not dismissed it yet, although I confess that I do feel a little disappointed that no step whatever has been taken to punish the atrocious violations of the laws of war practiced upon our prisoners in the hands of the insurgents.

It is, sir, a delicate subject. The rule of retaliation is one well recognized in the laws of war, but in modern times it is seldom resorted to, and is always to be avoided so far as is practicable or possible. In the present case, so far as I am informed on the subject, and I have read with some care the reports that have been made, I feel that the Government of the United States is restrained by no rule whatever, except its own sense of propriety and its own sense of honor, from the practice of any severity within the reach of human ingenuity upon the insurgents in retaliation for the cruelties committed by them upon us. Our own self-respect is our only law in this regard.

At an early day in the commencement of the present session of Congress the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WILKINSON] submitted a resolution to the Senate recommending retaliation. He is not now in his seat. That resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia. That resolution is still pending before that committee, and has not been acted upon, but has been the matter of some consideration on the part of the committee. The committee have the subject under consideration, and I have no doubt will be prepared to report a bill in the course of the present week. I therefore move to refer the resolution of the honorable Senator from Ohio, and the memorial of the honorable Senator from Indiana to that committee in the hope that the committee will be prompt in making their report to this body, and in bringing in such a bill as may be necessary to attain the end which we have in view. I therefore move the reference of those papers to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be so referred.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 95) regulating the treatment of confederate prisoners in custody of the authorities of the United States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. POWELL, it was Ordered, That the petition of Preston Starritt, a messenger of the Senate, claiming pay which he asserts has been illegally withheld from him, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the papers connected with the case of Philip Lansdale, a surgeon in the United States Navy, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I understand the facts to be that at one time during the last Congress there was an adverse report, but the papers were recommitted to the committee by order of the Senate, and then a favorable report was made and a bill for his relief passed the Senate. I suppose in that state of facts that my motion is a proper one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It comes within the rule, and the order will be made.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire also to present some additional papers in the case, which I ask may be referred to the same committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a petition of the widow of Rev. Samuel Hibben, praying for compensation for services rendered by her husband as chaplain of the fourth cavalry regiment, Illinois volunteers, from February 10, 1862, to the time of his death in June of that year, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 203) for the relief of Jacob Weber, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) to authorize and direct an inventory of articles in the arsenals of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLE on the 13th instant, calling for the numbers of soldiers and sailors furnished by the loyal States under the proclamation of the President for five hundred thousand men, dated July 18, 1864, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DIXON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 396) to provide for the improvement of the Potomac river opposite the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 397) in relation to the rights of married women in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CONDUCT OF GENERAL PAINE AT PADUCAH.

Mr. POWELL. I submit the following resolution:

Whereas a military commission ordered by Brevet Major General Burbridge to investigate the conduct of Brigadier General E. A. Paine, of the United States volunteers, while in command at Paducah, Kentucky, have made a report in which they implicate Brigadier General Paine and others in acts of cruelty, barbarity, robbery, plunder, and pillage; Therefore,

Resolved, That the President be requested to cause Brigadier General E. A. Paine, of the United States volunteers, to be arraigned and tried before a proper tribunal for his conduct while in command at Paducah, Kentucky, in order that said Brigadier General Paine may be punished if found guilty of the charges made against him, and if not guilty, his innocence be made manifest, and the United States flag rescued from dishonor.

I move that the resolution be printed, and I notify the Senate that at an early day I shall call it up for action.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTRACTS IN THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. COWAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform the Senate whether the provisions of the act of June 2, 1862, entitled "An act to prevent and punish fraud on the part of officers intrusted with making of contracts for the Government," have been complied with by officers under him, and particularly whether the said act has been complied with and executed as to contracts for marble and marble work and iron and iron work upon the Capitol extension; and if there has been failure or neglect in the execution of the said act the reasons therefor, and why the penalties of said act have not been enforced against officers in default.

THE SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to the Senate the present condition of the Soldiers' Home, together with a detailed statement of all funds which have been received for the benefit of that institution, and the different sources from which they have been received, from its organization to the present time; also, of the disbursement of said funds, the amount of property owned by said Home, the investments, and the balances on hand, and where deposited; the number of invalid soldiers who have been supported at the Home for each year since its organization, together with the annual expenses of supporting each inmate of the institution.

PUBLICATION OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the causes of delay in the publication of "the official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States," as directed by a resolution of Congress approved May 19, 1864; "a full Army Register, including a roster of officers of volunteers," as directed by a resolution of Congress approved June 30, 1864, supplementary to the Senate resolution of December 13, 1861, and the House resolutions of February 1, 1830, and August 30, 1843; and the edition of "the President's message, with an abridgment of the accompanying documents," as directed by an act of Congress approved May 19, 1864.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day.

Mr. GRIMES. If the resolution offered by the Senator from Illinois is under consideration, I desire to amend it. I do not know whether it has passed from the consideration of the Senate or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard it as before the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. There is a standing resolution of Congress, passed many years ago, which instructs the Secretary of War to furnish, I think biennially, the Army Register, carrying out the pay that has been allowed to each Army officer during the preceding year. There has been no such report as that submitted to Congress during this Administration; and I should like to have included in the resolution of the Senator from Illinois and call upon the Secretary of War to specify why that report has not also been made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The resolution is directed to the Committee on Printing, requiring them to inquire into the causes of these delays. It is well known to the Senate that frequent calls have been made upon the Departments—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, this whole matter is out of order.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to suspend all other business for the purpose of proceeding with this. It will take but a moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the special order will be taken up, and then it can be laid aside informally while this discussion is going on.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This discussion will take but a short time; I ask, therefore, that the special order be laid aside informally until this subject is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will regard that as the order of the Senate unless there be objection. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A number of resolutions have been passed by the Senate at former sessions, and at this session, calling upon the Departments for information; and there has been exhibited within a year or two what I have never known before, a second resolution reiterating the first and inquiring why the first resolution has not been answered. I think it is quite time that the resolutions of the Senate of the United States should be replied to by the respective Departments of this Government. If they are unable to furnish the information directed to be given, let them say so; but time and again this disrespect—I can call it by no other name—has been manifested to the resolutions of the Congress of the United States and to its different branches, and it is a growing thing. When a resolution has passed this body making a call upon a Department, it is not for the officer called upon to give the information to give it or not, in his discretion, or to reply to the resolution or not. If the information is improper to be given, let him state an excuse for not giving it. If he cannot give it, let him so inform the body. But, sir, the resolutions of the Senate are treated with inattention, and time and again a second resolution has been brought in here to elicit the information called for by a former resolution. Not only this, sir, but we have several acts of Congress—three of them are recited in this resolution—directing in positive terms that certain officers of the Government shall make reports within a certain time, which are to be laid before the country, which Congress has been in the habit of laying before the country, and which the country is anxious to see. The reports of our Army officers of operations of the Army, at the last session of Congress, we directed to be furnished before the opening of this session; and by an act of Congress which passed both Houses, and was approved by the President, we directed our Joint Committee on Printing to see that they were edited, and that the parts that were supposed to be of interest to the country should be brought together and published, and they were directed to be ready for an inspection at the meeting of Congress. The Army Register, more interesting in this period of war than at any other time in the history of the Government, has not been published since April, 1863, nearly two years, and yet there is a positive law requiring its publication annually.

Now, this resolution proposes to direct the Committee on Printing to inquire into the causes of these delays. If it is impossible to make these publications let us know it. But, sir, it is idle for the Congress of the United States to sit here and pass laws and then have no attention paid to them. I should have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Iowa if it was appropriate to this resolution. His amendment calls on the Secretary of War to know why a report giving the pay received by different Army officers has not been published within the last two or three years as required by a former act of Congress. This resolution is directed to the Committee on Printing, (whose business it was to have edited the reports from the War Department and laid them before the country,) instructing that committee to inquire into the causes of these delays; and I hope, sir, that after making this inquiry they will submit a report accompanied by a bill (unless there is a good excuse for these delays) that shall hereafter enforce obedience on the part of the executive officers to the acts of Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, it was Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any information in his possession showing the practical operation of the tenth article of the treaty of Washington of the 9th of August, 1842, and the expediency of giving her Britannic Majesty's Government the notice required for the termination of such article.

FRENCH SPOILIATIONS.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, an amendment which he will hereafter offer to the bill in relation to the payment of claims for French spoiliations prior to 1801, was received informally and ordered to be printed.

COMMERCE AMONG THE STATES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order of the day is the bill (H. R. No. 307) to regulate commerce among the several States, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill, which proposes to enact that every railroad company in the United States whose road is operated by steam, its successors and assigns, shall be authorized to carry upon and over its road, connections, boats, bridges, and ferries, all freight, property, mails, passengers, troops, and Government supplies on their way from any State to another State, and to receive compensation therefor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not propose, Mr. President, to occupy the time of the Senate in advocating the passage of this bill. It was passed by the House of Representatives by an almost unanimous vote at the last session. During the last days of that session, it will be remembered by the Senators who were then present, I pressed very hard for a vote of the Senate upon it; but it was so late, and there was so much discussion provoked by the bill, that it had to go by. It is a bill that will be noticed as very general in its terms and general in its character. It simply opens all the railroads of the United States to the use of the Government and of the people of the United States. It makes them mail routes, and entitles them to carry freight, property, passengers, troops, supplies for the Government, &c., from one State to another State.

The Constitution says:

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States."

Congress has been in the habit, from the organization of the Government, of establishing post routes, and making all common roads that are required for mail purposes post roads; and this bill substantially makes all railroads post roads.

The bill is so eminently just, and right, and proper, that I had supposed it would pass this body almost without a dissenting voice or a dissenting vote; but I am informed that it is not only general but local in its operation, that it interferes with the rights of a great railroad monopoly in the State of New Jersey, and that that is the reason for its present introduction and passage. Well, sir, admitting that to be true, it simply shows that there is a necessity for such a measure in that particular case. The State of New Jersey, as I am informed, has chartered a great corporation, and given it the exclusive right of transit through that State. If that be so, I deny the right of the State of New Jersey to pass any such law. I am informed that the State of New Jersey exacts tribute from every passenger passing through that State. I deny the right of the State of New Jersey to levy that tribute upon the citizens of other States passing through that State. It interferes with the free commercial communication between the States. The State of New Jersey has no right to levy a tribute either upon passengers or upon freight passing through her limits.

If the State of New Jersey has a right to levy a small tribute upon either passengers or freight passing through that State, she has a right to levy a large tribute; and if she has a right to levy a large tribute, she has a right to prohibit their passing absolutely if she, in the exercise of her sovereignty, sees fit thus to prohibit it. No man would claim that the State of New Jersey possessed that right; probably she would not attempt to exercise it; but it is a well-known fact that she has exercised the right of levying a tribute for years, and this monopoly has been grinding upon the people of the United States, grinding upon every man who has had occasion to pass from the great capital of the nation to the actual capital of the nation. No man passes from here to New York to-day without paying a tribute to the State of New Jersey; a tribute which I claim is unconstitutional and wrong. It is a trammel upon the commerce between these two points.

Besides, sir, the State of New Jersey has never claimed that she possessed that right. It is true she has a law under which she has exercised that power; but in that very law she says by the sixth section of the act:

"That whenever any other railroad or roads for the transportation of passengers and freight between New York and Philadelphia across this State shall be constructed and established for that purpose under or by virtue of any law of this State or the United States authorizing or recognizing said road, then and in that case the said dividends shall no longer be payable to the State, and the said stock shall be transferred to the company by the treasurer of this State."

This monopoly, it would seem by this, has paid a bonus to the State of New Jersey, which bonus is to revert to the company the moment the Congress of the United States exercises its constitutional right to control commerce upon this route. As I said before, I do not propose at this time to occupy the attention of the Senate in advocating this bill. It is so eminently just and right and proper that I believe it will pass this body by almost a unanimous vote, and I shall simply ask for a vote of the body upon the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, although a member of the Committee on Commerce, I was not present when this bill received the favorable report of that committee. I shall not discuss its merits to-day, or perhaps on any other occasion; but I wish it to be distinctly understood that the bill would not have received my sanction if I had been present at the time it met the approval of that committee. I care nothing about the rival interests of corporations in the State of New Jersey, or in any other part of the country; but I have yet to learn that it is within the constitutional competency of Congress to interfere in any mode or manner with the vested rights of corporations holding their charter under State law, to enlarge their franchises or to limit their authority. It is on that distinct constitutional ground, the utter want of authority in Congress to pass such a measure as this, that I base my objection; but I will not argue the question; I merely state my position.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no amendment be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, I have been led to understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] expected to address the Senate upon this bill. This is a bill of the utmost importance, I will say while upon the floor, not only to the State of New Jersey, which I have the honor in part to represent, (it having been specially referred to by the Senator from Michigan as being designed to relieve the public from a very obnoxious and injurious charter by reason of which a company in my State levies tribute upon the citizens of the United States, which of course is a matter of vast importance to us,) but it involves questions of the utmost importance, in which the citizens of every State in this Union are interested, one striking at the rights of property in its various ramifications, involving not only an interest of perhaps hundreds of millions, but even the question of sovereignty and of power in the States themselves. It is a bill of so much importance, in which the interests of the citizens of this whole country are concerned, that I should suppose before it would be put upon its final passage it would receive some attention by members of this Senate, especially, too, upon the constitutional question involved. I myself may perhaps, before it is finally disposed of, have occasion to say a few words in relation to the topics that have been referred to by the Senator from Michigan; but not having expected to be called upon to-day, and understanding that other Senators intended to address this body, and seeing that the Senator who has been alluded to is now in his seat, I will abstain from making any further remarks at the present time.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I stated to the honorable member from Michigan, the other day, that I did desire to discuss the question, which seems to be an important one, involved in this bill, and that I thought I should be able to do so to-day; but I am very hoarse, and should not be able to do justice to myself, and, what is more important and material, I should not be able to assist the Senate, if I was capable of assisting them at all, in the deliberations on the question. Unless there is some immediate cause for the passage of the bill to-day, I ask the indulgence of the Senate until the day after to-morrow, by which time I suppose I shall be able to address the Senate without any irksomeness to myself or to them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, sir. I move, then, that the bill be postponed to and made the special order of the day for Thursday next at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senate concurring therein.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 458) for the relief of George Mowrey; and it was signed by the Vice President.

INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, there seems to be a little lull in the business now, and I desire to take advantage of it to have leave to introduce a bill of which no previous notice has been given.

By unanimous consent, leave was given to introduce a bill (S. No. 398) to repeal the eighth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, it has never been my fortune during the time I have been a member of this body to present a subject that I regard as of so much importance as this. However it may strike other Senators, I am entirely convinced in my own mind that unless this bill or such a one as this in effect be passed, we never shall subdue this insurrection, it never can be ended, it never will be ended. And now, sir, I think I have stated enough to show gentlemen that I, for one at least, regard it as the most important measure on which I have ever had occasion to speak in the Senate. Certainly nothing can be of greater importance to us than that we end this rebellion, suppress this insurrection, and that somewhat speedily; and I think this bill is absolutely necessary to the doing of that.

Mr. President, there are some laws of war which are inherent in the very nature of war. Some of these rules are incapable of being violated; others may be violated, but it cannot be done with impunity. Many of these rules, derived from adjudicated cases, have become settled laws of nations as the laws of war; but there are others that are laws of war by the force of war itself. One of the latter is this, that it is utterly impossible to carry on war with a people and carry on commercial intercourse with that people at the same time. It never was done on earth, and it never can be done on earth while the laws of nature and of God remain as they are. It is an unnatural attempt at connection; it is an illegitimate relationship; it is an illicit intercourse; and it never can produce anything but deformities and abortions.

As a part of the law of nations, a manifestation of this principle is that every contract made between subjects and citizens of belligerent Powers in time of war is void, absolutely void. So, too, a belligerent can never collect in the courts of the opposite party a debt due him. What is the reason? Is the debt destroyed by the war? Not at all; but the courts will not render a judgment for it, for the reason that if it were collected the effect would be to carry money to the enemy's country and place it in their control to use it for carrying on the war, as a sinew of war. If a vessel be taken at sea, which belongs in whole or in part to the enemy, it is forfeited, it is prize of war; and even if a citizen of ours, a good and loyal citizen, domiciliated in the enemy's country, having nothing to do with the war, owns the vessel, still that vessel is to be condemned for the very same reason I have already given. It cannot be surrendered to him or the money value of it paid to him, because the result of that would be to carry money and means into the enemy's country.

I have had from time to time occasion to intimate my opinion—not, perhaps, of any consequence on account of the source from which it came—that all sorts of devices of getting along with this war are but devices, and will never answer any good purpose. I do not believe that carrying on the war with balloons, which was tried at one time, amounted to anything. I do not believe that carrying it on with general proclamations fired at the enemy amounted to anything. I do not believe you will ever subdue them, because you think you can destroy them by the smell of gunpowder, and that firing off a great quantity of it at a time will come to anything. All such devices to get along in a manner different from that recognized and allowed by the well-known laws of war will be abortions.

Now, Mr. President, what is the section which I propose to have repealed? I will read it, but before doing so I wish to give a short summary of how we came to it.

In 1861 it was found necessary, in order to prosecute this war, that it should have given to it locality. Men were in the insurgent army in the southern States, and people were carrying them supplies from New York openly. The declaration was that they were going to trade with loyal people in the South, and the effect was of course to carry all supplies into the reach of the enemy. There was no possibility of enforcing the blockade, or doing anything, indeed, that made war with any effect, until we gave locality to the theater of war; and therefore it was provided in one of the sections of the law of July 13, 1861, that whenever the people of a State of the Union were in a state of insurrection, and professed to act under the authority of the State, and those exercising authority under the State did not disclaim it or suppress it, then, and in that case, the President by proclamation should declare the people of that State to be in a state of insurrection, and thereupon all commercial intercourse with them should cease, and all articles of merchandise, goods, and chattels, vehicles, and vessels in which they were carried to or from the enemy's country, should be forfeited to the United States. That produced a clear and distinct condition of war, and the Supreme Court in the prize cases unanimously decided that when that law was passed a state of war existed in all its relations.

But, sir, if all commercial intercourse was to cease, there came a difficulty upon the mind in this respect: what shall be done with those to whom and cities which we may subdue and of which we may take possession? Shall no intercourse be held with them? Shall commercial intercourse continue to be broken off and forever cease with those people? If so, how are they to be supplied, how are they to be fed, how are they to be subsisted? In that condition of things resort was had to a consideration of the laws of war in modern times. According to the modern laws of war, it has been held that the Power which declares war may modify that declaration in relation to intercourse with particular places for particular purposes. That has been done in Europe occasionally during the last fifty years. Therefore there was inserted in the act of 1861 a provision that the President of the United States might, in his discretion, and under regulations from the Treasury Department, permit intercourse in such articles and with such places and by such persons as the public service may require. The reason that provision was inserted in the law was because the President, having no power to declare war, of course had no authority to modify that war, except only as it should be given to him by the war-declaring power, Congress. There can be no doubt that I am correct in saying that those who had to do with the making of that law distinctly understood that provision to have been inserted for the purpose I have stated—not to get supplies from the enemy, not to buy their produce and pay them money to relieve them, but merely to sustain the people of that part of the country of which we should have taken actual military possession.

But, sir, the provision did not receive construction and execution in that sense. I need not here go over what regulations were made, altered, and changed by the Treasury Department, and allowed and approved by the President; but this I will say, licenses were granted, under what favoritisms I know not, from time to time to individuals to trade upon the Mississippi for the purpose of getting cotton; and the effect was, I will not say that all the officers of that army were thereby corrupted, but it is certain their characters very severely suffered. Upon the whole the best information we can get of it is that so far from the acquisition of the Mississippi by us, obtained by much of skill and blood and treasure, resulting in benefit to our country and to our cause, it has after all resulted in furnishing support to the enemy and relief to them infinitely more than it has been of advantage to us. I think I shall be able to show this before I conclude, by statements from those who know the facts by observation and experience. Things went on until last summer, when a bill was prepared and reported for the purpose of putting an end to the business, to stop that sort of trade. One section of that bill was:

"That so much of section five of the act of 13th of July, 1861, as authorizes the President, in his discretion, to license or permit commercial relations in any State or section, the inhabitants of which are declared in a state of insurrection, is hereby repealed, except so far as may be necessary to authorize supplying the necessities of loyal persons residing in insurrectionary States, within the lines of actual occupation by the military forces of the United States, as indicated by published order of the commanding general of the department or district so occupied."

There was a bringing of that provision of the act of 1861 to some practical purpose, to the purpose for which it was made. All other species of intercourse were then to be stopped, and the President was to have no power to license it after that. Whether any licenses have been granted since then I do not know, but I have seen an order from the Treasury Department which to me looks strange and extraordinary, limiting the operation of the licenses, implying that they were in existence and force; and I am informed that licenses to individuals have actually been granted since that act was passed on the 2d of July last, but of that I have no certain knowledge. At any rate, under that section of the act which I have just now read very considerable effect was given in Louisiana and on the Mississippi generally to the stopping of this trade.

At the time that bill was reported, the gentleman having it in charge, the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] did me the honor to consult me in relation to that section, and as I understood, it was professedly to be the end of the trade, especially in cotton, corrupting in all its influences and dangerous in all its effects. So understanding the matter I was very much surprised and astonished to learn by a proclamation of the President that Congress had actually passed a law for trading by the Government with the people of that country for their produce. I immediately went to the honorable Senator who had had the bill in charge, and I learned from him that he did not know that such a provision was there. But the section which I propose by this bill to repeal was in that law; how it came there, I know not; no doubt it was on the report of the committee, and it was passed in the hurry of the close of the session. That section I will now read; and one thing you will observe, how utterly it is at war with what I have just read, and how utterly it must defeat all the purposes for which the bill was passed. It is section eight, which I propose by this bill to repeal, in these words:

"Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to authorize agents to purchase for the United States any products of States declared in insurrection, at such places therein as shall be designated by him, at such prices as shall be agreed on with the seller, not exceeding the market value thereof at the place of delivery, nor exceeding three fourths of the market value thereof in the city of New York at the latest quotations known to the agent purchasing: Provided, That no part of the purchase money for any products so purchased shall be paid, or agreed to be paid, out of any other fund than that arising from property sold as captured or abandoned, or purchased and sold under the provisions of this act. All property so purchased shall be forwarded for sale at such place or places as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the moneys arising therefrom, after payment of the purchase money and the other expenses connected therewith, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the accounts of all moneys so received and paid shall be rendered to and audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

I believe in the month of December came the executive order, a copy of which I have here, directing, under the regulations which the Secretary of the Treasury had made, the agents appointed to go down there and execute this law and make these purchases; and by those regulations and by that executive order, the people of that country, the whole of them, not the loyal people merely, but all the people who have any control of any productions for sale, are authorized to come into the places designated in the order and offer them there for sale, and they are to have safe-conduct in so doing; and whenever they get to those places, the purchasing agent is to give them a permit to bring the property in there so that he may buy it. The places designated are of course those within our control. I do not remember the names of all of them, but New Orleans is one, Beaufort is one, Memphis is one, Pensacola is one, and there are others.

Of course the effect is to admit to these places in our military possession all the people of that country, and to allow them free intercourse to and from these places, if they have any property of this kind to sell. I suppose they have all got something to sell; every man has a little cotton at least; so that you open your camps entirely to these people. In the next place, they are to bring their products there under a permit. To whom will the permit go? Here is another opportunity for favoritism. It is to go to such persons as the purchasing agent shall allow. Whom he will favor with them I do not know; who are to have the advantages of them I do not know; but this I know, that the whole of that country is covered over with Jews and cotton speculators who would deceive, if it was possible, the very elect, and who will contrive by all possible means to accomplish their purposes. They are the persons who will have the control of this trade; they are the persons who will have the favor of the purchasing agents.

Now, I ask, how is it possible that any general in command of your forces in these places, say at New Orleans for example, can carry on his military expeditions into the enemy's country with those very enemies coming and going and carrying all the information they choose to carry directly to the camps of the opposing forces? When I say the thing is impossible, it needs nothing but to state it to show that it is utterly impossible.

Then, Mr. President, we are to have on a larger scale, and much more extensively carried on over the whole cotton country, the very trading and dealing with the enemy which we had before upon the river Mississippi. Was not that a source of corruption to your Army, to your officers, and to the people? So much so that you repealed the law authorizing it in this very act, repealed the clause which allowed the granting of licenses; and yet by this action you opened the door to an infinitely more extensive system of licenses.

But besides its corrupting influence and effect, and its direct interference with the prosecution of military enterprises, there is another thing. What have you laid a blockade for? Why was a blockade declared? The blockade is not needed to prevent neutral nations from carrying contraband of war, munitions, arms, equipments, powder, &c. Neutral vessels cannot carry those articles to a belligerent Power; they are liable to be seized, if they do so, without any blockade. A blockade is not made merely to keep military supplies out of the enemy's country, because neutrals have no business to carry them, and we have a right to seize and condemn them for doing so, even if there be no blockade. The blockade is made to prevent their trading in matters which are not contraband of war; to stop all trade with the enemy, not so much for the purpose of preventing the carrying of supplies to them as it is to prevent neutrals buying their produce, paying them money for it, and thus enabling them to go on with their efforts and advance their prosperity. By the laws of blockade, if the country declaring the blockade permits intercourse by its own people with the country whose ports are declared to be blockaded the blockade ends. I can show that very clearly by the laws of nations. It lies in a nutshell. The blockade right is to exclude a neutral from carrying on trade with the enemy's country even in articles that are not contraband of war. Now, you cannot declare that blockade and carry it into effect as against the rest of the world and yourselves undertake to monopolize that trade. If the blockading Power carries on the trade by its own citizens it must allow it to neutrals. You cannot sustain the blockade on such a ground; but I was not coming to that point just now. I ask, why did we declare the blockade? It was to keep the southern people from selling their great quantity of cotton and getting money for it from foreign nations, and having thereby the sinews of war. Would it not be strange if we should ourselves say in the face of the world, "All that was a mere pretense; we will buy their produce; we will pay them money for it; we will give them the sinews of war?" It would be the strangest anomaly under the heavens.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of honorable Senators for a moment to another thing. A law was passed here, I think in 1862, called a confiscation act, whereby we declared that all the property of persons in the rebellious States who should thereafter participate in the rebellion, should be forfeited, confiscated, become the property of the United States. But here is a law to say that we will take all that valuable property of theirs, which we have declared to be forfeited and to belong to us, and we will pay them the money for it. That is carrying out confiscation, I suppose! That is the law which I propose to repeal.

I will endeavor, Mr. President, to be as brief as I can; and the next suggestion which I wish to make—indeed I have already partly presented it—is that this is an entire end of your blockade. If it amounts to anything it is this, that we will keep up the blockade as against the world, and we will ourselves go in and get this property and monopolize this trade to ourselves. That is really it. You cannot disguise it. It requires but a few words to state the doctrine applicable to such a condition of affairs, and I will read but a sentence in support of it from a very distinguished writer, James Parker Deane, in his summary, and a very fine one it is, of the laws of war, and every principle which he announces is sustained by decisions in the Admiralty:

"And a blockade which excludes the subjects of all other countries from trading with the ports of the enemy, and at the same time permits a general access to those ports to the subjects of the State which imposes it, is irregular, illegal, and null. All blockade being for the purpose of obtaining a commercial monopoly for the private advantage of the State imposing it, would be void on the very principles on which the right of blockade is formed."—Deane on War and Neutrality, page 27.

There could be nothing more to the point. It is utterly impossible to avoid this effect by undertaking to say that we do not go into the particular ports which are blockaded, but the trade is carried on in ports in our actual possession. Of what importance is that? You invite all the people of the country to bring in their products for sale, if they have any, at those ports, and of course when they come there they get the money for their productions. You say to them, "You have nothing to do but to come to our ports and bring your productions, and you shall have the money." The fact that they bring them to a port in your possession does not alter the character of the transaction. The true character of it, as is stated by this writer, to monopolize the trade to ourselves, and keep neutrals away from it, and that is not admissible by the laws of nations. I can merely say that if the law which I propose to repeal shall go into effect, and agents shall be appointed, and purchases made throughout the southern country, if cotton shall be brought from places throughout that country to the points designated for its purchase and use by the United States, then if a blockade runner shall be seized with a cargo of cotton and brought before our admiralty courts, she cannot be condemned as prize, for that is the end of the blockade.

I have thus summarily stated my objections to the existence and continuance of this section of the law of last summer; I now propose to read a little from those who are on the ground, and who know the practical working of the system. I will first read from a letter of General Canby, who is at New Orleans, and I believe in command of the Mississippi department. Speaking of this order of the President given under that law, he says:

"The operation of this order is contingent, by the eighth section, upon the orders to be given by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy; but the General Orders of the War Department have been received in due sequence to the 14th of November, and no order corresponding in number, date, or matter, with the order submitted by Mr. Cutler, is found among them. Without waiting for the official receipt of this order, I shall at once give such orders as may be necessary to secure a due observance of the executive order of September 24, 1864, and the Treasury regulations of the same day; and while carrying out the policy adopted by the Government, will endeavor to exact the reciprocal obligation of good faith on the part of the traders; but in justice to the troops in this command and to myself, it is proper that I should submit for your consideration some facts connected with the present military situation and the embarrassment to military operations which will, in my judgment, inevitably follow the opening of this trade."

"If this trade is carried on in the manner and to the extent claimed by the speculators who now control it, its inevitable result, in my judgment, will be to add strength and efficiency to the rebel armies east and west of the Mississippi, equivalent to an addition of fifty thousand men, and will stimulate into active opposition to the successful prosecution of our operations at least ten thousand men within our own lines."

"Cotton speculators in the Mississippi valley have a prospective and hope to have an actual interest in every bale of cotton within the rebel lines; they know that expeditions within the enemy's country are followed by the capture of cotton, or its destruction by the rebels to prevent its falling into our hands; hence it is to their interest to give information to the rebels of every contemplated movement. I have not sent an expedition into the enemy's lines without finding agents of this character in communication with the rebels, giving them information regarding our movements; and nearly every expedition has been foiled to some extent, in some of its objects, by information so communicated. I have now several speculators, who were captured in the enemy's country, awaiting trial, under the fifty-seventh Article of War, for giving information to the enemy. But the punishment of these men is no compensation for the evil they have occasioned, and will not secure us from future disasters from the same cause."

"I have now in my possession papers in relation to such contracts, made with English houses in Mobile, for the exportation of two hundred thousand bales by the way of this port; the conditions of the sale require that the payments be made in supplies, in gold, or in foreign exchange. The net profits of these transactions are estimated by the contractors themselves at $10,000,000, and it is easy to see how much zeal will be evoked by profits of this magnitude. I cite this as one of many instances that have come under my observation; and to show the character of these transactions in the Mississippi valley, I ask attention to the memorandum printed on page 8 of the inclosed pamphlet, referring to the particular transaction just cited, and indicating clearly the means by which our laws are evaded, and how the amount due the rebel government is converted into foreign exchange."

"The rebel armies east and west of the Mississippi river have been supported mainly, during the past twelve months, by the unlawful trade carried on on that river. The city of New Orleans, since its occupation by our forces, has contributed more to the support of the rebel armies, more to the purchasing and equipment of privates that are preying upon our commerce, and more to maintain the credit of the rebel government in Europe, than any other port in the country, with the single exception of Wilmington. I do not make these statements as conjectures, but from evidence that will prove conclusive to any impartial mind. I know the restrictions of the law of July 2, 1864."

Referring to section nine which I first read—

"have reduced the rebel armies east and west of the river, and greatly straitened them for supplies essential to their existence. Kirby Smith has officially announced that he can no longer supply his army with clothing, and every rebel paper coming from west of the Mississippi contains appeals to the families and friends of soldiers to contribute clothing. The last Alexandria paper contains a proclamation by the rebel governor, appealing to the people of Louisiana to furnish clothing to the suffering and destitute soldiers of Missouri."

"The construction placed upon the regulations of the Treasury Department by one, at least, of the purchasing agents in this command, will, in sixty days, undo all that has been done by the law of July 2, and enable the rebel authorities to arm, equip, and clothe the armies that cannot much longer be kept together without aid from us."

"I make these statements in order to convey to you my own opinion of our actual condition, of the embarrassment under which all military operations must be conducted, and to express the hope, if the future operations of the troops in this command should fail to meet your expectations, that you will consider the circumstances by which their usefulness and efficiency were impaired."

I have here a letter from Commander W. H. Macomb, commander of the United States steamship Shamrock. It appears that there is a clause in the Treasury regulations for commercial intercourse which permits any one bringing out cotton or tobacco to take in return supplies of merchandise to the amount of one third the value of the products brought in. Commander Macomb, under date of January 4, 1865, says:

"This law is a mistake; under no circumstances should supplies be allowed to pass without our lines. I seized the other day a schooner with a cargo of every kind of contraband articles, valued at nearly seven thousand dollars, which was on its way directly into the enemy's lines, and there is very little doubt that most of it will go to feed the enemies against which we are fighting."

And he says further:

"A steamer called the Philadelphia, with a large cargo, said to have the proper Treasury permits, signed by General Shepley, &c., ran up the Chowan river the other night, and is said to have gone to Franklin, Virginia, to sell her cargo. On her way up a guard of rebel soldiers was placed on board her to take her up in safety."

Knowing that my statements were rather broad, I said that I would endeavor to sustain them by the statements of men who knew what they talk

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1865.

NEW SERIES....No. 18.

about as matters within their own observation and experience.

But gentlemen may say, we want cotton, and how are we to do? Mr. President, from the best information we are able to obtain, there is now in the confederate States about one full year's production of cotton. In the past three years they have raised about as much as they have been able to get off. There is then just about one year's supply on hand, and that is four million bales. That is a good year's supply, no more. Take the four million bales—they will average four hundred pounds to the bale—and suppose we put the value of the cotton at less than half the market price now in New York. The law is that we shall not give more than three fourths of the market price in New York; but suppose you put it at half, that would furnish to the enemy $800,000,000! At fifty cents a pound for the product which they have on hand, which they have been unable to get off and get the money for, which they cannot eat, the fruit of which they want, you would furnish to them $800,000,000! Am I at all extravagant, then, in saying that it is utterly impossible to prosecute this war successfully and permit that trade to go on, and furnish them with that advantage? I have already shown you from the letter of General Canby that within his department it is utterly impossible to prosecute the war, (to say nothing about the money feature of the question,) because it interferes with and defeats military operations; but even if it did not, the idea of furnishing an enemy with that amount of the sinews of war, of money, to prosecute the war against us, is to me the wildest thing that ever entered the head of man.

I mention this amount of money not merely to show the effect of permitting this trade, but also with another view. Can I expect to repeal this section of the law of 1864? Have I any good reason to believe that the trade can be stopped? Mr. President, any man or company of men who desire to have a law to license them to trade in cotton and tobacco could well afford to come to this Congress and give $100,000 apiece to a majority of the members of the two Houses and give $1,000,000 apiece to the two Secretaries to sign the licenses, and it would not be two per cent. on the purchase.

Mr. WILSON. Do you think that would have any influence?

Mr. COLLAMER. I have not said so. But, sir, "cotton is king." We have jeered at it, we have sneered at it, but let us see whether when we get through we shall not find it so. Cotton is king. I have shown how it is king, potential in its pecuniary influence. Two years ago a proposition came here to license this trade. There was a very short debate about it, and it received no countenance at the hands of the Senate, but I find that it was passed and was approved on the 21 day of July last, and no doubt it was passed upon the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce, and here we stand, and we see the effect of it.

Mr. TEN EYCK. It was not reported by the committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. That I do not know. I have made many inquiries, and some gentlemen seem entirely oblivious about how it got through, about how it came to be in the law at all, and they seem to know no more about it than I did who had gone home before its passage on account of sickness; but it is there. The bill was in charge of the honorable Senator from Maine, and he did not know this clause was in it until he came here at this session, or if he did he had forgotten it. I was here when that gentleman was making his very laudable efforts to get his bill through the Senate, and I know that he told us it was a bill to put an end to this trade, not to put in a section authorizing it.

Mr. President, I do not know that this trade can be stopped; but I know that if it goes on, licensed by our authority and without limitation, we cannot succeed in putting down this rebellion, in the cotton States any way.

I have no desire to trespass on the time of the Senate. It is with the utmost reluctance that I have said anything on the subject, but feeling the force of the convictions which I have stated, I felt it to be my duty to offer this proposition. When you consider the amount of money which the continuance of this trade must furnish to the enemy, when you consider the manner in which it must defeat all our military enterprises within those States, when you consider the corruptions which grow out of it, when you consider that it is the end of your blockade, when you consider that it is to furnish the enemy with such an enormous amount of money to carry on the war against us, I think I have succeeded in showing that I had occasion to present this bill.

A single word more about the money. Some gentlemen seem to think that it is a good thing to let them have our greenbacks, and that they will keep them and thus create a large circulation for them. Take the case of a man who comes from the interior country to New Orleans with a quantity of cotton. He sells it and takes greenbacks for it. He puts those greenbacks in the first express that goes out to New York to his agent there to turn them into gold, and probably ships that gold to London subject to his order when it gets there. In England the means and opportunities of exchange are well known. There is no possibility of having our greenbacks hoarded in the South in that way. Besides, by the laws of war that money in whosever hands it may be in the enemy's country is at the enemy's command.

Mr. FOSTER. If he gets cotton enough there by the time he gets the greenbacks they would be worth as much as gold.

Mr. COLLAMER. Of course he will forward them to be converted into gold, and the money in his hands may be used by the rebel government against us. The rebel government lays hold of money wherever it finds it, and it may be very well to say to its people, "We are exceedingly in want of money; our own is so depreciated that it hardly answers any of the purposes of exchange, and we will take this property and use it, and will enlist every man in this country to fight to the death, because we shall thereby, if we succeed, get rid of ever redeeming this money, and we shall not redeem our own."

In short, Mr. President, in any way in which I can view the subject, it seems to me that it is an utter mistake to attempt to hold illicit intercourse with our enemies, bribed to it by the value of their products which we want. It is an exceedingly unnatural connection—a love of money on one side and a pretended patriotism on the other. They defeat each other. I desire that this section may be repealed.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire of the Chair what the question before the Senate is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be, if there be no other, to refer the bill to an appropriate committee. The Senator from Vermont will indicate what disposition he proposes to make of the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that this very section which I propose to repeal was itself recommended by the Committee on Commerce. Is our rule such that the bill must be committed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not necessarily.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire that it shall be put on its passage.

Mr. MORRILL. I had supposed from the argument that the motion was probably to refer the matter to some other committee than the Committee on Commerce, and I was going to address myself to that subject.

With all that the honorable Senator from Vermont has said in the main I concur, both with the reasoning and the general scope, saving and excepting, perhaps, the inference as to the commercial character of the Senate. I am hardly prepared to believe that cotton will be supreme on any question before the Senate when fairly understood.

There is a little narrative connected with this question which I desire the Senate should understand, because, although I say that I agree with the Senator from Vermont in the argument and in the conclusion, I do not quite agree with his narrative.

The law originally, in 1861, was correctly stated by the honorable Senator to be that all intercourse with the insurrectionary States was prohibited by that act, with the exception therein stated, which was a limited exception. The history of it is that under that exception there sprang up a trade. That was a law with the enactment of which I believe the Senator from Vermont had very much to do. I do not know but that he reported it; at any rate, I believe he is entitled to the paternity of it, and I so conferred with him in regard to the amendatory law. At the commencement of the last session a bill was presented to the Senate—I do not remember by whom—and referred to the Committee on Commerce, the object of which was to enlarge the provision of that exception in the act of 1861. That bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and the Committee on Commerce gave diligent attention to the subject-matter of the bill. We had witnesses before us who gave us an account of the traffic under the act of the honorable Senator from Vermont, by virtue of regulations which were authorized by that act in certain cases to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury under the sanction of the President. The Committee on Commerce came to the conclusion that all traffic under the act of 1861 was injurious to the public interests, was particularly detrimental to the military service, was fraught with evil, and chiefly evil. That bill having been referred to myself to be perfected, I did, as the honorable Senator suggests, confer with him upon the subject, and the Committee on Commerce came to the conclusion to interdict all trade whatever. The Committee on Commerce, instead of not only not reporting the section now under consideration, the repeal of which is the object of this bill, went the whole length of repealing the exception ingrafted upon the bill of 1861, and came to the conclusion that the public interest demanded that there should be no trade whatever; and we reported accordingly to the Senate.

I remember very well making these general statements to the Senate, that the conclusion to which the Committee on Commerce had come was that all trade was inconsistent with the prosecution of the war; and that not only no additional provisions should be made for the commercial intercourse, but that all trade, whatever should be cut off. That bill was amended in the Senate. Precisely how it was amended, I do not remember.

Mr. COLLAMER. It was amended by the insertion of the eighth section.

Mr. MORRILL. The eighth section was put in. It was not put in on the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce were against it then, and have been against it all the time. Precisely how it came in, by whose motion, I do not remember; but I do remember the general facts under which the eighth section came in. It was very strongly urged by the Treasury Department of the Government. It was regarded as a most important and vital measure to the finances of the country, and also in connection with the management of the freedmen in insurrectionary districts. This eighth section is not only not the result of the deliberate judgment of the Committee on Commerce, but is against their judgment and against their report. It is the result of the judgment of the Senate, influenced by the considerations I have just stated, and which I suppose delicacy will require that I should not very far elaborate.

That is the whole fact of the matter; and such being the history of the subject, I submit, with all deference to the judgment of the honorable Senator from Vermont, that this bill ought to go to a committee, that it is altogether too important to be passed here in an hour or a day without further light on the subject. Although the Committee on Commerce were satisfied that the whole dealings under the former bill were injurious to the public interests, and particularly detrimental to the military service, it does not follow by any means that under the new regulations which have sprung up under the new provisions of the law, which were designed, and it was said would tend and were calculated, to remove the difficulties which had been witnessed under the old regulations, the intercourse is obnoxious to the same objections which were made by the Committee on Commerce on a former occasion; and therefore I hope that the bill will not only be referred, but that it will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, who once examined the question, who had the facts before them, and who are not disqualified, as my honorable friend from Vermont supposes, by having reported this measure, but who are qualified—

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely presumed it had been by the committee's recommendation, because I did not see how else it ever got through. I do not know anything about it more than that.

Mr. MORRILL. I will not say that the honorable Senator had no ground for his supposition, reasoning on that basis; but the fact is as I have stated.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the bill will be referred; and particularly in view of the facts mentioned by the Senator from Vermont, which I am very ready to believe, which I have no doubt exist, and to a very much greater extent than he has stated. I am very free to say in advance that I have not changed my convictions on the subject. I believed it was wrong then; I have believed so all the time; I think so now. But I think on a matter of so great importance as this we ought to act with reference to all the facts that can be gathered on the subject.

Mr. COLLAMER. What I said in relation to this section having been inserted on the recommendation of the committee was only a presumption of mine from the fact that it passed. I do not know anything about it. The gentleman knows what transpired in the Senate at the time; I was not here when the bill passed. After the remarks of the Senator from Maine, I move myself to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the reference is made I desire simply to say that I have been the recipient of many applications from parties interested who have obtained permits under this pernicious statute to trade in cotton at New Orleans and elsewhere, and that copies of the President's order and the order of the Secretary of the Treasury given to them to authorize them to trade at those places have been furnished to me. When I examined them, I confess that I was very much surprised, for, like the honorable Senator from Vermont, I was not aware of the fact that Congress had passed such a law. I was astounded that a policy such as these orders indicated could possibly have been adopted in a time of war. Succeding these applications, and in connection with them, further applications were made upon the refusal of General Canby at New Orleans, commanding that department, to carry out the instructions of the Treasury Department and of the President, asking me to go to the War Department, and to the Treasury, and to the President, respectively, to obtain an overruling of the position taken by General Canby in regard to it. I will only say here for myself that I refused to interfere in any respect, or to obtrude any advice upon any Department of the Government in that connection. These things took place with myself before the appearance of General Canby's report, which shows conclusively that he has been simply performing his duty as an honest and able officer, as he is.

In that connection also permit me just now to call the attention of the Committee on Commerce—I will submit the letters in my hand to them with this reference—to the fact that the most mischievous and pernicious action under these licenses to trade in the rebellious territories is constantly going on under and by the patronage of our Government. On Saturday morning I received the letters I have now in my hand at my desk here. One of them is written by an attorney in New York city, who refers me for his responsibility to no less a person than the Vice President of the United States. He asks in behalf of another party a permit to go to Newbern, North Carolina, to trade in turpentine, &c. He gives an account of how the business is carried on there, and I take it that it is sufficiently verified to be useful in throwing some light on this general subject. It appears that we have got a Treasury agent there whose name is Heaton; and let me say here, with no disposition to condemn humans by classes or to condemn Treasury agents as a class, that sufficient facts have come to my knowledge since my connection with the Senate and with the Government in relation to Treasury agents to convince me that taken as a class in their offices they are the most pestilential and pestiferous set connected with the Government, the most obnoxious to justice and the most injurious to us as a people. I will read from this letter:

"Heaton was appointed Treasury agent by"— the former head of the Department—

"and his business is to grant licenses to keep stores, and some other duties, as laid down in his instructions; but as yet no person has been authorized to act as agent for the Government to purchase turpentine or other produce for account of Government."

"There is a speculator at Newbern named Charley Dibble. He has no license or other authorization to trade. A person brings in fifty barrels turpentine, and reports to Heaton. Heaton says he cannot buy it, as the Government has not authorized him to do so; but he recommends them to sell to Dibble, and to no one else. If a man says he has been in the habit (before the war) of selling to Patterson, Smith, or Brown, and would like to continue to trade with them, Heaton says, 'Well, you had better trade with Dibble, who has better facilities than anybody else.' And, although he does not threaten, he hints very strongly that if Dibble is not the purchaser the seller may have trouble. Heaton and Dibble are partners in the profits of all these trades."

I might go on and read further, but you will perceive what a lucky fellow Dibble is. Fortunately Mr. Dibble indeed! There are a great many of these cases over the country; this is but a specimen. A case occurred recently in my own State—the papers in relation to it are here now—where a Treasury agent, drawing his pay from the Government, sworn to carry out its laws and its orders, engaged, as I believe, and as I have no doubt, for a moneyed consideration, in a violation of the neutrality laws, and sending out of the port arms and munitions of war that he and those connected with him might be benefited; and he went so far in his impudent attempt as to urge upon the collector of the port, (who said he would and who did seize the vessels which contained these articles contraband,) a violation of his duty, and argued indeed that it was none of his business if the oaths made before him were false; that he had nothing to do with it; and finally he discovered that it was perfectly right for the collector to grant a clearance to a schooner of fifty-five tons to clear for Hamburg in Europe with those articles contraband of war on board; and that it was none of the collector's business to assume that she could not make the voyage, but it was perfectly right for him to let them swear her through. His confederate in the transaction, not then holding the commission of the Government, whose correspondence on the subject I have in my possession, urged the collector openly to violate his oath. "What of the oath?" he said, and he put it on the ground of patriotism. "All these fellows, you know, are 'patriots.'" The truth of the business is that it is through a superabundance of that kind of patriotism, rather than through the efforts of the rebels, that this war has been prolonged. There is no doubt of it. I thank the Senator from Vermont, and the country, I think, is under obligations to him, for presenting this subject to the attention of Congress at this time.

I will say before I close that I have simply answered all such applications as have been made to me to aid these gentlemen in making money pending this war, by saying that I do no business of that kind. The letters in my possession will go to the Committee on Commerce, if they want them, so that they may have the general range of the special agents of the Treasury Department before them.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, my own convictions about this subject have been before expressed to the Senate, and I will not now repeat them. I only wish to correct one or two misapprehensions into which the Senate and the country might fall from the statement of the honorable Senator from Vermont. My own convictions have been, like his, that we cannot at the same time trade and fight with a people; commercial relations are entirely inconsistent with war; and I have also probably mentioned before the statement of a distinguished officer that the trade with the rebels had embarrassed all our military operations, especially along the river. The act of 1861, allowing permits to trade, as acted on and carried out, was very injurious, and I believe the whole country demanded its repeal.

The only thing to which I wish now to call the attention of the Senate is that this section of the act of July 2, last, which the honorable Senator proposes to repeal, was ingrafted upon that bill in the Senate when the honorable Senator himself must have been present. The bill passed this body, and it was sent to the House of Representatives shortly after the section was inserted, and the Senator voted for the bill. A motion was made to strike out this particular section, the eighth section, and the motion was rejected. The vote of the Senate is not given, because it was not taken by yeas and nays. Immediately afterward the vote was taken by yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill with the eighth section in it, and that vote is now before me. The honorable Senator voted for the bill. I only wish to call his attention and the attention of the Senate to it. I myself voted for the bill, probably without any distinct recollection of the terms of that section.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman probably has looked at the record.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the record before me.

Mr. COLLAMER. I can merely say I did not know this section was in the bill. I never knew it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very probable that the section was put in the bill in the House of Representatives. A motion to strike out was negatived, not by yeas and nays, and immediately following is the vote by yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. The bill originated here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the section was probably in the bill as it came from the Treasury Department, where I presume it was framed. The bill came here probably with this section in it from the Treasury Department, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, was debated, and a motion was made here—it does not say by whom—to strike out the eighth section. There was no vote by yeas and nays, and then the bill passed. The honorable Senator voted for it, and I voted for it, which I certainly would not have done if my attention had been called distinctly to the eighth section of the bill. I therefore do not attribute any blame to him, because I voted with him.

Mr. COLLAMER. I knew that bill; the Senator from Maine says the committee agreed upon it; I had no objection to it in that shape; but that bill with this section in it I never should have voted for. I did not know it was there. I was perfectly astonished when I saw the President's proclamation stating that to be the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. A motion was made to strike out the eighth section of the bill. That amendment was agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and when in the Senate the question was put on that amendment again. Here is the record:

"The next amendment was to strike out the eighth section, as follows."

Then follow the very words of the law as it now stands.

"This amendment was not concurred in."

No vote was taken on any other amendment; and then followed the vote on the passage of the bill, which showed a very full Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will pardon me I will correct him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have the record before me; I read from the Journal:

"On the question, Will the Senate concur in the following amendment made in Committee of the Whole, to wit, strike out the eighth section?"

The eighth section came from the Treasury Department in the bill, and was stricken out by the Committee on Commerce. The Committee on Commerce recommended an absolute prohibition of all traffic with the rebel States. While the bill was upon its passage in the Senate, the section stricken out by the committee was reinstated by the Senate on a distinct vote, against the recommendation of the Committee on Commerce and against the judgment of that committee, the committee having recommended an absolute prohibition of all trade and traffic with the rebel States of every kind and description.

The motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce was agreed to.

CHARLES ANDERSON.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust the Senate will allow me to take up a bill for the relief of a citizen of my State. I move to take up House bill No. 163, for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas. A similar bill has heretofore passed the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to pay to Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas, the sum of $1,041 66, being the amount certified by the Quartermaster General to be due to John James for back rent of Camp Hudson, in Texas, prior to July 1, 1853, the same having been regularly assigned to Charles Anderson.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

UNITED STATES CHRISTIAN COMMISSION.

Mr. ASHLEY. I offer the following resolution, and demand the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the use of the Hall of the House of Representatives be granted to the United States Christian Commission for their anniversary exercises on Sabbath evening, January 29.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. On agreeing to the resolution, I demand the yeas and nays. I do not believe in granting the Hall for this purpose.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 38, not voting 64; as follows:

Mr. ASHLEY. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DICTIONARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SPALDING offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the members of this House, a sufficient number of extra copies of the Dictionary of Congress to make the quota of the House equal to that already ordered by the Senate; provided the copyright hereby directed to be paid by the Clerk shall not exceed the amount heretofore paid per copy for the same work.

Mr. SPALDING moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Printing, and demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PEACE.

Mr. COX submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Whereas the country hails with manifestations of patriotic joy and congratulation the victories recently achieved by our brave armies; and whereas "the recognized object of war, at least among civilized and Christian nations, is an honorable and satisfactory peace; and that although we do not know that the insurgents are yet prepared to agree to any terms of pacification that our Government would or should deem acceptable, yet as there can be no possible harm resulting from ascertaining precisely what they are ready to do, and in order to refute the imputation that the Administration contemplates with satisfaction a continuance of hostilities for their own sake, on any ground of mere punctilio, or for any reason than because it is compelled by an absorbing regard for the very end of its existence;" and whereas "an established and rightly constituted Government, combating armed and menacing rebellion, should strain every nerve to overcome at the earliest moment the resistance it encounters, and should not merely welcome, but seek, satisfactory (however informal) assurances that its end has been attained;" Therefore,

Resolved, That now, in this hour of victory, which is the hour of magnanimity, it is eminently the duty of the President, on the basis of the present "rightly constituted Government," either to send or receive commissioners or agents with a view to national pacification and tranquility, or by some other rational means known to civilized or Christian nations, secure the cessation of hostilities and the Union of the States.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. COX. I have modified the resolution since it was first presented so as to remove objections of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when the rebel executive and the rebel congress have again and again peremptorily and insultingly refused to entertain any overtures for peace, I deem that it would be disgraceful for us to continue to importune them to accept peace propositions and peace commissioners.

The SPEAKER. There can be no debate on the resolution.

Mr. COX. I want the House to understand this is Horace Greeley's proposition. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion that the resolution be laid on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH. I understand that if the resolution be debated it goes over.

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered.

Mr. COX. While I would like to hear the gentleman from Kentucky, still I want the vote taken to-day.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 51, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, McClure, Samuel F. So the resolution was laid on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. THAYER stated that his colleague, Mr. O'NEILL, was paired with Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey.

Mr. VAN VALKENBURGH stated that his colleague, Mr. POMEROY, was absent from the House on account of illness in his family.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

PAYMENT OF RECRUITING OFFICERS.

Mr. FINCK submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of such field officers of regiments who were appointed by the Governors of the several States during the rebellion, and who were engaged in recruiting and organizing companies and regiments for service in the forces of the United States, or commanding, superintending, or directing camps of instruction and rendezvous established by said Governors, the same pay and emoluments allowed by the United States, at the time, to officers of like rank, from the time of entering upon such service under their appointment up to the date of their muster into the service of the United States, and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

QUOTAS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McKINNEY submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War, (if not incompatible with the public interest,) be directed to communicate to this House what is the number of troops furnished by the State of California to the General Government under the various calls, and whether the draft has been enforced in that State as in other States, and if not, the reason for its non-enforcement.

The SPEAKER. This being a call on one of the Executive Departments for information must, if objected to, lie over for one day.

Mr. COLE, of California. I object.

So the resolution was laid over.

REPAYMENT OF COMMUTATION MONEY.

Mr. NOBLE submitted the following preamble and resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas under the call made by the President for three hundred thousand troops, on the — day of —, A. D. 1864, in order to fill their quotas, some of the districts made a supplemental draft subsequent to the passage of the act regulating the subject, of July 4, 1864, which supplemental drafts were declared irregular and the persons thus drafted were ordered to be discharged therefrom, and when commutation had been paid it was also ordered that the same should be refunded, which has not been done; and whereas in many instances the persons who had thus paid commutation within a very short period thereafter were again drafted under the subsequent call and compelled to enter the service of the United States; and whereas families are now suffering for want of the return of said commutation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform this House why the said commutations have not been refunded without so much delay.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. NOBLE. Let me appeal to my friend not to move to lay that resolution on the table for this reason: I know many instances where the facts therein stated are true.

Mr. SLOAN. I do not object to an inquiry in reference to the subject-matter of the resolution. What I object to is that the resolution asserts many facts which I do not know to be true.

Mr. NOBLE. I do know that many of them are true.

Mr. SLOAN. I have no objection to a resolution of inquiry calling for all the facts in relation to the subject.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was not agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest to the gentleman that the only difficulty here seems to be that in the preamble a number of facts are stated as actually existing. Now I have no doubt that my colleague [Mr. NOBLE] is satisfied, either from evidence within his own knowledge or otherwise, that a part at least of these alleged facts are true. Still they may be capable of some rebutting testimony; and if my colleague would modify his resolution by inserting after the word "whereas" the words "it is alleged," all objection would be removed.

Mr. NOBLE. I have not the least objection to so modifying the resolution, though I know personally of the existence of many of the alleged facts.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no doubt of that; but the modification will remove all objection.

Mr. NOBLE. I will make the modification suggested; but I desire to say to my colleague that I personally know of one or two instances where men have been drafted and taken into the service a second time whose families are now suffering for want of this commutation money. And further, I know application was made more than six months ago to get the money paid back.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, requires unanimous consent to be considered this day.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

Mr. NOBLE. Who objects?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object, and if the House will pardon me, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that if he will introduce a simple resolution asking information upon this subject, without alleging any matters of fact about which the House know nothing, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. NOBLE. I myself made a number of applications more than six months ago for the repayment of this commutation which had been paid by men who were subsequently drafted. That I know to be true. Since I have been here a number of these men and their families have written to me with reference to the matter, and I have called upon the War Department time and again, but have failed to get a return of the money. I know the families need the money, and I think the resolution should pass.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have called myself upon the War Department many times for information, and have failed to get it.

Mr. NOBLE. This is a case where money has been paid, and it should be returned. The fault is in the War Department.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I insist upon my objection. So the resolution was laid over.

TAX ON PASSENGER TRAVEL.

Mr. SCHENCK submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws for the assessment and collection of internal revenue as to provide that a tax of not exceeding one cent per mile be levied on every passenger traveling by railway, steamboat, or other public conveyance, to be additional to any tax required by law to be paid by the railway companies, steamboat companies, or other owners of such public conveyances; and that provision be made under proper restrictions and penalties for the collection, accounting for, and paying over of such passenger tax by the corporations and other persons owning and running such public conveyances, for a compensation not exceeding — per cent. for such collection and paying over.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers on the demand for the previous question; and appointed Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. TOWNSEND.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye 54, noes 38.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

RIGHT TO VOTE.

Mr. MALLORY. I rise to a question of order. A short time since I was granted leave to record my vote upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.]

Now, I understand that permission has been given to the Committee of Ways and Means, of which I am a member, to sit during the sessions of the House. If so, I take it that that bestows upon the members of that committee the right to vote upon any question taken during their absence.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair thinks, and in this he has gone beyond his predecessors, that this privilege enables the members of the committee to come in and vote upon any proposition pending before the House when they were not within the bar when their names were called; but that they cannot come in at a subsequent day, or after the result has been announced, and record their votes.

Mr. MALLORY. I accept the ruling of the Chair and thank the House for the permission to vote. I vote "no" on the motion to lay the resolution of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] on the table.

EXCHANGE OF NAVAL PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, the morning hour having expired, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st of December, 1864, a statement of what measures have been taken for and what obstacles are in the way of an exchange of naval prisoners now in the hands of the rebels; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the annual statement as to the appropriations for that Department, compiled by the Second Comptroller, in compliance with the act of May 1, 1860; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MISSOURI A FREE STATE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a telegraphic dispatch received by him on Saturday last, when the House was not in session, with the request that it should be laid before the House of Representatives.

The Clerk read the dispatch, as follows:

JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI, January 14, 1865.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker House of Representatives:

The following is the proclamation of Thomas C. Fletcher, first Governor of free Missouri. We know you join in spirit with Missouri in her jubilee to-day.

GEORGE SMITH,
President Senate of Missouri.
W. L. LOVELACE,
Speaker House of Representatives of Missouri.

Proclamation by the Governor.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
JEFFERSON CITY, MISSOURI, January 11, 1865.

It having pleased divine Providence to inspire to righteous action the sovereign people of Missouri, who, through their delegates in convention assembled, with proper legal authority and solemnity, have this day ordained that hereafter in this State there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except in punishment of crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, and that all persons held to service or labor as slaves are hereby declared free: Now, therefore, by authority of the supreme executive power vested in me by the constitution of Missouri, I, Thomas C. Fletcher, Governor of the State of Missouri, do proclaim that henceforth and forever no person within the jurisdiction of this State shall be subject to any abridgment of liberty, except such as the law shall prescribe for the common good, or know any master but God.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name, and caused the great seal of the State to be affixed, [L. s.] at Jefferson City, this 11th day of January, A. D. 1865.

THOMAS C. FLETCHER.

By the Governor:

FRANCIS RODMAN, Secretary of State.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that that communication be laid on the table and printed in the archives of the Government.

The motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. On Friday the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] who objected to taking from the Speaker's table the resolution in relation to the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, said that he would make no objection this morning. I hope the House will consent to take it up and concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Is that in order?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] who had charge of the matter said that he would make no objection.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Then I move to suspend the rules in order that the House may take up and consider the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 56) authorizing the President of the United States to give to the Government of Great Britain the notice required for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, A. D. 1854.

The question was taken; and, two thirds voting in favor of it, the rules were suspended, and the resolution was taken up.

The Senate propose to amend the joint resolution by striking out the whole thereof, including the preamble, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Whereas it is provided in the reciprocity treaty, concluded at Washington the 5th of June, 1854, between the United States of the one part and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of the other part, that this treaty "remain in force for ten years from the date at which it may come into operation, and further until the expiration of twelve months after either of the high contracting parties shall give notice to the other of its wish to terminate the same;" and whereas it appears by a proclamation of the President of the United States, bearing date 16th March, 1855, that this treaty came into operation on that day; and whereas, further, it is no longer for the interests of the United States to continue the same in force: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notice be given of the termination of the reciprocity treaty, according to the provision therein contained for the termination of the same; and the President of the United States is hereby charged with the communication of such notice to the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the previous question on the amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The amendment to the joint resolution was agreed to.

The amendment to the preamble was also agreed to.

The Senate further proposed to amend the title of the joint resolution so as to read:

A joint resolution providing for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854, between the United States and Great Britain.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the several votes by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTY ON PRINTING PAPER.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following joint resolution:

Be it resolved, &c., That in lieu of the duty on printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, now levied by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of three per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. KASSON. Is the resolution offered for consideration now?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is for consideration at this time.

Mr. KASSON. This subject is before the Committee of Ways and Means, and for that reason I must object to the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman from Iowa when the Committee of Ways and Means will consider this subject.

Mr. KASSON. I hope this week. They have an extra session this evening for special and more important business. I ask the gentleman at least to postpone the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman thinks there will be some action on the subject this week and that the Committee of Ways and Means will report to the House, I will withdraw the joint resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I think there will be.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I withdraw the joint resolution.

PRINTING OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the cause of delay in printing the public documents, and to report what measures, if any, are necessary to expedite the same.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th June, 1866; and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the right to raise points of order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this bill be reserved.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is my object.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that reservation being made.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Thursday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, also reported a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; and for other purposes; and moved that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. ANCONA called for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means have a right to report general appropriation bills at any time; but this is not a bill of that character.

Mr. STEVENS. If there be any difficulty about it, I will withdraw the bill till the Committee of Ways and Means be called.

Mr. ANCONA. I did not object. I only desired to know what the bill was. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the bill.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Wednesday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, also reported back the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

Mr. BROOKS. I object to the amendments being considered in the House. They have not been printed, and we ought to have some explanation of them.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. BORTWELL in the chair,] and proceeded, as a special order, to the consideration of the Senate amendments to the deficiency bill.

First amendment of the Senate:

Insert the following:

To supply a deficiency for compensation of clerks in the Denver branch mint, $450.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Second amendment:

Insert the following:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the branch mint at San Francisco, $131,889 68.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Third amendment:

Strike out the following:

For the support and maintenance of the convicts transferred from the District of Columbia, at such place or places as may be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, $30,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Strike out the following:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to execute the resolutions of the House of July 4, 1864, directing payment of additional compensation to its officers, clerks, and other employees, and to the House reporters for the Congressional Globe, a sum sufficient for the purpose, being $37,991 40, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the same is hereby added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives; but no payments shall be made under this provision to any other persons than the clerks, officers, and other employees of the House and the reporters for the Congressional Globe.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the effect of adopting the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means will be to pay this additional amount. I hope the House will not vote for any resolution to pay additional sums to any employees, and that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

The question was taken, and the amendment was non-concurred in, there being, on a division—ayes six, noes not counted.

Fifth amendment:

Strike out the following:

For salary of the commissioner for codifying the naval laws, under joint resolution of March 3, 1863, from July 1, 1864, to March 3, 1865, $2,025.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. SPALDING. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the action of the Senate is correct, and that the House ought not to vote that appropriation. If I am correctly informed the services of that commissioner terminated some time ago, and he received his full pay. I know of no propriety in giving him another year's salary, and I hope the House will not overrule the action of the Senate in this respect.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the appropriation made by this House is right, and I ask to have a letter on the subject read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

439 H STREET, WASHINGTON, January 12, 1865.

MY DEAR SIR: I see by the Globe of yesterday that the Senate amended the deficiency bill by striking out my salary as commissioner of the code of naval laws. This, I presume, has been done under some misapprehension of the facts.

I was appointed commissioner in the spring of 1863.

In March, 1864, I reported to the House a draft of a code, complete, except a chapter upon the pay of the officers and employees, and a chapter specifically repealing the old laws which should be repealed.

Copies of the code, after it was printed, were distributed among the several bureaus, and the officers of the Navy and others interested, for suggestions of amendment or criticism. Many of them were returned to me with valuable suggestions.

I remained here during the residue of the last session endeavoring to get action upon it in the House committee. It was distributed to several sub-committees for examination, but was not considered in committee or reported to the House.

During the recess I saw the chairman of the committee, (Hon. Mr. RICE,) and, by arrangement with him, came here at the opening of this session; and I have prepared a copy with references to all the former laws and also with references noted and written on each page to all the amendments which have been proposed. This I have now submitted to the committee, and expect their action. I can hardly expect it will be agreed upon and reported so as to pass before the end of the session, or nearly the end, and I shall be compelled to remain in attendance.

I respectfully submit, therefore, that the provision for my salary should be retained in the bill, and I beg you to submit this statement to the committee.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. B. SEDGWICK,
Commissioner of Naval Code.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that that letter sufficiently explains this matter, and shows that the appropriation is quite small enough for the time employed. The work done by this gentleman since the last session is very valuable. Without it, indeed, the whole code would be almost unintelligible.

Mr. GANSON. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] whether this commissioner, or whatever he is, has had any compensation previous to this, and if so how much.

Mr. STEVENS. For one year.

Mr. GANSON. Up to what time?

Mr. STEVENS. Up to last spring, I think.

Mr. GANSON. I understand from the communication that has just been read, that this compensation is for trying to lobby this report through the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman could not have heard the communication read. The commissioner made an index to the book, and did other work which was deemed necessary.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] if this appropriation has been recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. STEVENS. We have had no recommendation from them on any subject.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. If I understand the fact in relation to the services of the commissioner in the preparation of this naval code, it is something like this: during the last session of Congress Mr. Sedgwick did make a partial report, not a complete report. The committee found, on examining the report, that it was in such form as to render it impossible for them to determine what was the codification of the existing laws, and what part of the report involved new propositions submitted by himself—original propositions. The report was distributed among the members of the committee, and they took into consideration the subjects assigned to them respectively. There was no further report in relation to the codification from the commissioner. I suggested to him that the committee would desire that he should enable them by marks and signs to distinguish what was original and that which he had supplied. And within a few days past, within a week past, I have found on the table of the committee this amended report, which I supposed was what was required by the committee, and they will immediately take the subject into consideration and report upon it as soon as they can do so. In regard to any recommendations of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the Committee of Ways and Means, I will state that the committee has received no information whatever from the Secretary of the Navy which would enlighten them upon any propositions which were before the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PIKE. I would suggest to the committee that if we vote this appropriation there would seem to be no reason why the next House should not make an additional appropriation, and make the office continuous and perpetual. The Commissioner made a partial report, as he states in his letter, on the 4th of March of last year. He was asked to specify what particular laws were amended, and what changes were made. The House remained in session until some time in July, but no additional report was received. The only portion of the code changed at the last session, as members will recollect, was in relation to the prize laws, and that was from a draft by the district attorney and the district judge of the district of Massachusetts. For myself I see no reason in the world for such an appropriation as this.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I would say that so much of the code as related to the prize law was part of a separate bill.

Mr. PIKE. That is what I stated; from a draft drawn by district attorney Dana and district judge Sprague.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] if this commissioner has any peculiar qualifications for the position. Was he ever at sea? Does he know anything about the subject? Or is he a mere lawyer from Syracuse, in the State of New York?

Mr. PIKE. I would say in reply to that question, that I have a very high respect for the commissioner, with whom I served in Congress while he held the position of chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. And I have no objection to paying him a reasonable sum for his services; but it seems to me that he has already been paid a reasonable sum.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. This gentleman, the commissioner, served as chairman of the Naval Committee of this House, and perhaps there is no gentleman here or elsewhere who is better qualified to discharge the duty imposed upon him than Mr. Sedgwick. He has given this question a great deal of attention, and much time and research. And from the investigation I have been able to make I am satisfied that the gentleman is entitled to compensation therefor.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] if he ever read the report or the codification.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. In reply to that I will say that I have seen the report and a portion of the codification, but have not read it. But I have satisfied myself, from the examination I have made, that it has required a vast amount of time and research, and that this gentleman is entitled to compensation for the labor he has performed for the public.

Mr. GANSON. I would also ask the gentleman what proposition is made by the commissioner that he deems of value to the naval service in that report.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN. I am not in the habit of being cross-questioned by gentlemen. I will simply reply, that all the laws affecting the Navy have been condensed and brought together, so that heads of Departments, and all others who desire to obtain information, will be able to understand all questions relating to the laws of the Navy, which can be obtained from this one volume.

Mr. PIKE. Does not the gentleman from New York [Mr. LITTLEJOHN] think that fifteen months, at a salary of $3,000 a year, is sufficient time to accomplish that purpose when the product is a pamphlet of perhaps about two hundred pages?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. In behalf of the gentleman who is named as commissioner of the naval code, I would like to say one word here. By an act of Congress he was entitled to an annual salary while employed in the service of the Government upon this work. The salary for last year I suppose was paid him. Now, if I understand the declaration of the chairman of the Naval Committee [Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts] that committee had a right to suppose, after he had presented the labors of the last year to the committee, that his further services would be required in preparing or following out the suggestions which had been made to him by the chairman of the Naval Committee. And in that work he has since been engaged. The result of his work has been produced to this House and has been accepted by that committee. And I question very much the fairness of saying now that for this labor, which has been bestowed with the knowledge and at the suggestion of that committee, this commissioner is not entitled to compensation from this Government. I believe that under the circumstances compensation, to some extent at least, should be awarded to him.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] whether he is aware that any service has been performed by this commissioner since the last payment was made.

Mr. PIKE. I will say in reply, that so far as I have learned at the Department, no service has been performed since the last payment was made. I am not disposed to deny one word that Mr. Sedgwick states in his letter. I only speak so far as I know; and I have made inquiries on the subject.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I stated when I was upon the floor before, that within a few days past there has been laid upon the table of the Committee on Naval Affairs a communication from the commissioner for revising this code, which, I understand, embraces a statement of the matter of his work, distinguishing that which is in the existing laws from that which is new. I suppose that that work has been performed by him since the adjournment of Congress, or since March last. The amendment was concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Insert the following:

Navy Department, Bureau of Navigation:

For binnacles, binnacle lamps, and alidades; for bunting, muslin, and sewing materials for ensigns, jacks, distinctive flags, and marks, signal flags, and foreign flags, and for making flags of all kinds; for logs, log lines, log reels, log slates, log paper, log books, and sand glasses; for leads, lead reels, lead lines, armings for leads, and sounding cups; and for signal apparatus other than signal flags, $125,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

Insert the following:

For freight and transportation of navigation materials, instruments, books, and stores; for postage on public letters; for the telegraphing of proposals; for packing-boxes and material; for blank-books, forms, and stationery at navigation office; for maps, drawings, models; and for incidental expenses not applicable to any other appropriation, $3,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

Insert the following:

For the purchase of nautical and astronomical instruments, nautical books, maps, and charts; and for repairs of instruments; and for binding and backing books and charts, $100,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

Insert the following:

Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting:

For fuel for the Navy, and for the transportation and expenses thereof, $5,347,400.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As the amount of this item is large, I would like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. STEVENS. At the time when this deficiency bill was prepared the Navy Department had not sent in any estimate for deficiencies. They sent in the estimate just as the bill was passing here. The committee examined it, and did not see how they could reject it, because it was for debts already incurred. So they sent it to the Senate to be put on there. The paper containing the estimates has not come back from that body. I remember that, among other things, it mentioned that at the time the original estimates were made, coal was seven or eight dollars per ton, whereas the Department was actually obliged to pay twelve or fourteen dollars per ton; that therefore the increased expense asked to be met in this deficiency bill had been necessarily incurred to keep the Navy in motion. The committee were satisfied that the amount was fairly estimated; and although we did not recommend the item here, we asked the Senate to put it on, and they have done it.

Mr. BROOKS. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether he remembers what was the deficiency for fuel in the last deficiency bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not.

Mr. BROOKS. I know that it was very large—larger than this, if I remember correctly. I make the inquiry for the purpose of suggesting to the Navy Department (I have no other means of doing it) that, in the regular bill which we shall shortly act upon, they should estimate for fuel sums sufficiently high to cover the whole year, so that we shall not have these immense deficiency bills.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the amount is very large; but it will be remembered that since last year coal has increased in price almost one half. I understood that the amount of fuel used has been barely sufficient—that the Department has been obliged to purchase all it has bought. This fuel has been purchased by the Government, and I suppose of course it ought to be paid for.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman whether this coal is bought by contract or in open market.

Mr. STEVENS. In both ways, as I understood—generally by contract, unless where there is a demand which must be immediately met.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, Mr. Chairman, if it is bought by contract I do not see how this deficiency could arise. The Navy Department, I take it, estimates originally at the contract price.

Mr. STEVENS. But they do not make the contracts at the time of the estimate. They make contracts, of course, through the summer, six months after they made the estimates.

Mr. BROOKS. I have no right to answer the question on behalf of the present Administration, but if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the quantity of coal consumed is much larger than was estimated for by the Department. It has not been so much the increased price of coal as the increased quantity consumed.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will look at the report, he will find that we have one hundred vessels more than we had last year.

Mr. BROOKS. There is another subject to which I wish to call the attention of the Navy Department through this House, and that is that in their estimates they fail to look to the expansion of the currency. For example, if the war continues coal will be higher next year than it is now, and it is the duty of the Administration to estimate in reference to the expenditures for coal what will be the expansion of the currency. As I have said, if the war continues next year coal must be dearer, higher in price than now.

Mr. Chairman, these deficiency bills are not only in contravention of law and of the practice of the Government, but they show the folly of the estimates on the part of the Administration. If when they do call upon us for these deficiency bills they would go into a little calculation of the possible expansion of the currency, say fifteen or twenty per cent. a year, they would probably reach some proper and satisfactory estimate.

Mr. THAYER. I ask the gentleman what the difference is provided it is shown that the money has been honestly expended.

Mr. BROOKS. I will inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is an old subject of complaint in this House, which has been discussed frequently. Congress has again and again protested against the practice of deficiency bills. The whole object of these estimates is to hold the Departments and the Administration to a strict accountability; to appropriate money upon the estimates and to restrain all expenditures within the scope of the appropriations, and on no account to permit the Administration to exceed them. It is only just and proper that the Administration should be restricted to legally-adopted appropriations, yet we have constantly-occurring instances where expenditures are made not authorized by law, and appropriations are diverted from their legitimate objects. We ought to put a stop to the use of money by the Administration for which there is no appropriation, and confine the action of the Government rigidly to the legal appropriations made by Congress.

Heretofore, sir, previous to this war, under all Administrations, it has been the practice to estimate within a few hundred thousand dollars the aggregate annual expenditures of the Government. During the war of 1812 and the Mexican war, the appropriations corresponded with the estimates of the Departments, and these appropriations were rarely exceeded. The reason why the present Administration goes beyond its estimates hundreds of millions is because of its inability to comprehend the real value of money; that a dollar now will not be a dollar one year from now. They refuse to recognize that the inflation of the currency will depreciate its value as compared with gold.

Mr. STEVENS. In one thing the gentleman has said I agree perfectly with him. The Administration, holding such opinions as it does in respect to the currency, could not be expected to calculate upon its depreciation. My idea was that our policy in reference to the finances would make gold worth 200 or 250 as compared with currency. This was to my mind in consequence of requiring interest on the public debt to be paid in gold as well as the duty on imports. The Administration holding contrary views could not be expected to make estimates according to the views of the gentleman and myself.

Again, it has been generally supposed by the Administration that this war would end shortly, and therefore they were bound to make their estimates accordingly. Now, I find from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] that peace is to be brought about by the negotiators who have gone to Richmond and the one who I am sorry to learn was arrested on his way to this city. There is no doubt that the efforts of Mr. F. P. Blair and others will bring this war to a close in sixty days, [laughter:] and the Administration may possibly reconsider its estimates. Until they do so I think we had better pass them as they are.

The amendment was concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

Insert the following:
For equipments of vessels, $500,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eleventh and twelfth amendments:

Insert the following:
Bureau of Provisions and Clothing:
For provisions, $1,500,000.
For clothing, $700,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendments were concurred in.

Thirteenth amendment.

Insert the following:
For a gold medal to Cornelius Vanderbilt, pursuant to the joint resolution approved January 28, 1864, $3,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

Mr. COLE, of California. It seems to me that this is a useless appropriation, and that even if a medal is to be presented the present condition of our finances would suggest to us to postpone it till a less sum would answer the same purpose. If we are to appropriate for a medal to a naval officer it should be for one who has suffered and not for one who has been largely benefited by this war.

It is alleged by some one near me that Commodore Vanderbilt has made a donation of a vessel to the Government. True it is, but it was not to the advantage of the Government, perhaps, so much as his own advantage, that the donation was made. I hope, therefore, this appropriation will not be made at this time. If at some subsequent time, when the national Treasury is more pléthoric than at present, such a proposition should be made, I might not perhaps oppose it, though at this time I do.

Mr. STEVENS. Let me say that the last session of Congress ordered the medal to be procured. It has been procured in pursuance of that order, and the only question is whether we shall pay for it or not. The only thing wrong about this matter is that the people of California charge three times more for their gold than they ought to; and if we could make them take one thousand instead of three I would go for it.

As to the merits of this matter, I will say that I felt at the time we passed the resolution that we had been guilty of a shameful neglect in delaying so long to make a proper acknowledgment to Commodore Vanderbilt for making a present to the Government of the fastest vessel on the ocean, worth $1,000,000. Our poor return for it is this medal, and I am sorry to hear any objection to it. At the commencement of the war Commodore Vanderbilt gave to the Government that grand vessel which was earning him its thousands a day. We neglected to acknowledge it for a long time, but at last ordered this medal.

Mr. COLE, of California. Do I understand the gentlemen to say that medal has already been obtained and bestowed upon the commodore?

Mr. STEVENS. Not bestowed yet.

Mr. COLE, of California. Then it is not clear that it has been already made, but only contracted for upon the contingency, perhaps, of making this appropriation. If so, I still maintain that the appropriation is improper at this time.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know that it is necessary that I should add anything to the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] But Commodore Vanderbilt, though not a constituent of mine, is a citizen of New York, and I feel it my duty to say a word or two. Sir, I am sorry to see any manifestation of feeling upon the part of any Californian respecting the steamboats run between Panama and San Francisco, leading to any conflict of opinion upon a subject of this nature.

The facts stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania are that in a trying time, when the Administration was utterly unable, or supposed to be unable, but for the fortunate appearance of the Monitor at Fortress Monroe, to provide a steamer of sufficient swiftness and power to confront the Merrimac, Commodore Vanderbilt gave to the Administration of the Government one of the most magnificent presents that was ever made by any man to any Government on earth; and that was a steamer worth $1,000,000, and which could not be built now for less than $1,500,000, and probably would cost nearly two millions.

That steamer has done essential service to our Navy, to its character, to its honor, and to the police of the seas in almost all parts of the world. For this the voting of a medal was our inadequate reward. At the last session of Congress both Houses almost unanimously voted that a medal should be provided for Commodore Vanderbilt in testimony of this magnificent donation; but Congress omitted at that time to vote the proper amount of money for the medal.

The Administration of the Government, unable to provide for that medal without coming to Congress, comes now and asks for the execution of our own act in this call for an appropriation of $3,000. The question, then, is this: Commodore Vanderbilt gives $1,500,000 to the Government, and the reward we offer for it is, first, the honor, a very great honor, and in addition a testimonial of $3,000, not for himself, but to be handed down to his children, to be shown as the representative of the high patriotism which induced him in a most trying time to make this noble gift to his country to open James river and to protect the country from the incursions of the Merrimac.

I hope no personal, political, or sectional feeling will be permitted to mingle itself with this question, but that the House will respond to this call on its part of the Administration with a like unanimity that the medal itself was voted.

Mr. HIGBY. It may be very well for the gentleman from New York to get up here and give us a chapter of laudation of the celebrated Commodore Vanderbilt. But he represents one constituency, and I represent another; he represents one upon the Atlantic coast, and I represent one upon the Pacific coast. And I would say to him that when I express my views, I express the views of my constituents; and I say that the Commodore Vanderbilt for whom this appropriation is made, I understand to be, and so do my constituents, one of the greatest swindlers there is in this nation. He cannot be excelled or exceeded in that respect, and I do not know but that I might add that he is a murderer. He builds crafts and puts them upon the ocean, and he resorts to all the contrivances he can to prevent other people from putting crafts upon the ocean, and monopolizes the whole business. He lies across the throat of every Californian who travels from New York to San Francisco. I should have failed in my duty here if I had not, when this question came up, risen in my place and said what I have said. It is not necessary that I should reiterate what I have said.

This matter is not understood by the members of this House. We had no opportunity of expressing our views when the resolution providing for this medal passed the House. The previous question was called, and it went ripping through this House at once.

It is said that Vanderbilt has given a steamer to the Government of the United States worth a million or a million and a half of dollars. I am credibly informed that he made money by giving it, for the reason that it cost so much money to run it that he could not make money by it, and had better give it away.

I suppose that as this medal has been voted we shall have to appropriate this money, but if I had to hang a medal on his neck it should be one of leather, and nothing more valuable. I am opposed to the amount appropriated, but if in good faith there has been a medal made which cost $3,000, why, I suppose that this appropriation must pass the House.

I have now had an opportunity to express myself upon this subject, and I have expressed myself freely and truthfully. Murder! Why, how do this man's vessels go out upon the ocean at times? Sometimes they go out upon an ocean harrowed by storms with their machinery withered, and wired up so that it is nothing but God's mercy, and not because of any precautions on the part of the owner of the vessels, that they do not go to the bottom; they are well insured. It is disgraceful when you examine the details in regard to the kind of shipping he puts on the ocean to carry men. We know that at our end of the route, and I am glad of an opportunity to express it. There is not a Californian who would not express himself precisely as I have done upon this question.

It is very easy for gentlemen from the city of New York, who do not go upon the ocean, who do not have to go upon the water and expose and hazard their lives, to rise here and speak in laudatory terms of this man. We of California have no laudations for men of that kind.

Mr. STEVENS. It is mortifying, it is humiliating, to hear an opposition of this kind in this House, and to find gentlemen departing from the question before the House in order to attack a man's private character. Sir, if there had been anything connected with this donation which was discreditable to the donor, if they could have objected to it, that would have been pertinent; but to take occasion of a valuable gift by a private gentleman to the Government, without finding the least fault with the thing given or with the manner of giving it, to enter into his private and professional character in relation to other matters, is wholly impertinent; no judge in a court would hear such a plea for a moment, but would put down the offer of such an argument as scandalous.

Now, I know nothing about the facts alluded to by the members from California. We are considering a magnificent present made to the Government by Commodore Vanderbilt, and we are not paying him for that present, but we are giving him an honorable testimonial of our regard for it. I care not how bad the man is who has done a good act. The only question is whether he should be honored for that act. Am I to bring up his former life and other things in order to defeat the consideration of that question? I say, sir, it is shameful. It is unpleasant to hear the benefactor of the nation dealt with thus irreverently in this House. I hope the amendment will be adopted unanimously with the single exception of the members from California.

Mr. HIGBY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. HIGBY. I made the statement that I was credibly informed that Vanderbilt did not run the steamer because it was no profit to him, and therefore he gave it away. Is not that pertinent?

Mr. STEVENS. "Credibly informed." That is about as much evidence as I expected.

Mr. HIGBY. It is not a question of evidence.

Mr. STEVENS. "Credibly informed." When, how, where, by whom? Sir, I do not like this "credibly informed" to justify an unjust speech.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Chairman, Commodore Vanderbilt has just been assailed on this floor in terms that those who have had an opportunity of knowing him will be astonished to hear. He needs no defense against the attacks of the gentlemen from California. His noble deeds and great enterprise, rewarded with success, are too well known to call for anything in his defense. I know that, independent of the magnificent gift which this medal is to acknowledge and commemorate, Commodore Vanderbilt, at a time when the national finances were disturbed and money could scarcely be had at any price before the war, took one Government loan of $3,000,000, and holds the bonds to-day. I should like to know from the gentleman from California whether a vessel that is worth $1,000,000 could not be disposed of for nearly that sum? What constitutes the worth of an article? What it will bring, does it not?

Commodore Vanderbilt donated his vessel to Government. The argument, then, that because he found the expense too great to retain it is too trifling to be considered. The hostile feeling in California toward him is founded on the fact that Commodore Vanderbilt manages his own affairs to suit himself. The assertion that he conducts his line of steamers in a way prejudicial to the comfort of travelers is no argument to be made in this House. He never seeks to force people into his steamers, and those who take passage do it of their own free will. That that gentleman, with his talents and his wealth always at the disposal of the Government, should be assailed in such unhandsome terms, will be a matter of profound astonishment and regret to his numerous friends. And, sir, I am simply performing what I consider a pleasant duty in defending him.

The question was taken, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTWELL reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration as a special order the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with a recommendation that some be concurred in and others non-concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were concurred in without division, with the exception of the following:

Fifth amendment:

Strike out the following:

For salary of the commissioner for codifying the naval laws, under joint resolution of March 3, 1863, from July 1, 1864, to March 3, 1865, $2,025.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended concurrence.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and Messrs. ROLLINS, of Missouri, and HOOPER were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 35.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the votes by which the amendments were severally concurred in or non-concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that there be a committee of conference appointed on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. STEVENS, PENDLETON, and WEBSTER were appointed a committee of conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act for the relief of George Mowrey; when the Speaker signed the same.

MILITARY ARRESTS AND IMPRISONMENTS.

Mr. GANSON asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be, and they are hereby, directed to ascertain and report to this House as soon as possible the number of persons now confined in the Old Capitol and Carroll prisons; when such persons were respectively arrested and confined, and upon what charges their arrests were made; whether any of such persons are officers of the Army, and have been confined without a trial beyond the time in that respect prescribed by law or by the regulations in the military service; and whether any persons so in prison are confined without any written charges made against them; and whether there are any persons now in said prisons who have not had a trial; if so, report the names of such persons, the time when they were arrested, and the alleged cause of their arrest respectively; and that the said committee be, and they are hereby, authorized to send for persons and papers.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object to the introduction of the resolution. The same avenues of information are open to the gentleman as to other members.

AMENDMENT OF ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. LITTLEJOHN asked leave to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes."

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. WILSON. I ask that two Senate bills on the Speaker's table be taken up and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, an act (S. No. 88) regulating criminal cases, and for other purposes, and an act (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, were severally taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House bill No. 163, for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ASHLEY. I now call for the special order.

The SPEAKER. The special order is the consideration of "A bill (H. R. No. 602) to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government," reported from the select committee on the rebellious States. The consideration of this bill was postponed from December 20, 1864, to Tuesday, January 10, 1865, after the morning hour, and made a special order from day to day, after the morning hour, until disposed of. It has just been reached in the regular order of business.

Mr. ASHLEY. In pursuance of previous notice, I submit the following as a substitute for the original bill:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That in the States declared in rebellion against the United States, the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint for each a provisional governor, whose pay and emoluments shall not exceed that of a brigadier-general of volunteers of such State until a State government therein shall be recognized as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That until the United States shall have recognized a republican form of State government, the provisional governor in each of said States shall see that this act, and the laws of the United States, and the laws of the State in force when the State government was overthrown by the rebellion, are faithfully executed within the State; but no law or usage whereby any person was heretofore held in involuntary servitude shall be recognized or enforced by any court or officer in such State; and the laws for the trial and punishment of white persons shall extend to all persons, and jurors shall have the qualifications of voters under this law for delegates to the convention. The President shall appoint such officers provided for by the laws of the State when its government was overthrown as he may find necessary to the civil administration of the State, all which officers shall be entitled to receive the fees and emoluments provided by the State laws for such officers.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the recognition of a State government, as aforesaid, the provisional Governor shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, cause to be assessed, levied, and collected, for the year 1865, and every year thereafter, the taxes prescribed by the laws of such State to be levied during the fiscal year preceding the overthrow of the State government thereof, in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State, as nearly as may be; and the officers appointed, as aforesaid, are vested with all powers of levying and collecting such taxes, by distress or sale, as were vested in any officers or tribunal of the State government aforesaid for those purposes. The proceeds of such taxes shall be accounted for to the provisional governor, and be by him applied to the expenses of the administration of the laws in such State, subject to the direction of the President, and the surplus shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of such State, to be paid to the State upon an appropriation therefor, to be made when a republican form of government shall be recognized therein by the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all persons held to involuntary servitude or labor in the States or parts of States in which such persons have been declared free by any proclamation of the President, are hereby emancipated and discharged therefrom, and they and their posterity shall be forever free. And if any such person or their posterity shall be restrained of liberty, under pretense of any claim to such service or labor, the courts of the United States shall, on habeas corpus, discharge them.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person declared free by this act, or any law of the United States, or any proclamation of the President, be restrained of liberty, with intent to be held in or reduced to involuntary servitude or labor, the person convicted before a court of competent jurisdiction of such act shall be punished by fine of not less than $1,500, and be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty years.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall hereafter hold or exercise any office, civil or military, except offices merely ministerial and military offices below the grade of colonel in the rebel service, State or Confederate, is hereby declared not to be a citizen of the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, the provisional governor shall direct the marshal of the United States, as speedily as may be, to name a sufficient number of deputies, and to enroll all white male citizens of the United States resident in the State in their respective counties, and to request each one to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and in his enrollment to designate those who take and those who refuse to take that oath, which rolls shall be forthwith returned to the provisional governor; and if the persons taking that oath shall, together with the citizens of the United States from such State in the military or naval service of the United States, amount to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State, he shall, by proclamation, invite the loyal people of the State to elect delegates to a convention charged to declare the will of the people of the State relative to the reestablishment of a State government, subject to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the convention shall consist of as many members as both houses of the last constitutional State Legislature, apportioned by the provisional governor among the counties, parishes, or districts of the State in proportion to the population enrolled by the marshal, in compliance with the provisions of this act, or in the military or naval service of the United States, as aforesaid. The provisional governor shall, by proclamation, declare the number of delegates to be elected by each county, parish, or election district; name a day of election, not less than thirty days thereafter; designate the places of voting in each county, parish, or district, conforming as nearly as may be convenient to the places used in the State elections next preceding the rebellion; appoint one or more commissioners to hold the election at each place of voting, and provide an adequate force to keep the peace during the election.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the delegates shall be elected by the loyal male citizens aforesaid of the United States of the age of twenty-one years, and resident in the county, parish, or district in which they shall offer to vote, or in the military or naval service of the United States, and who shall take and subscribe the oath of allegiance to the United States in the form contained in the act of Congress of July 2, 1863; and all citizens of the United States who are in the military or naval service of the United States shall vote at the headquarters of their respective commands, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the provisional governor for the taking and return of their votes; but no person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or who has voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall vote or be eligible to be elected as delegate at such election.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioners, or either of them, shall hold the election in conformity with this act, and, so far as may be consistent therewith, shall proceed in the manner used in the State prior to the rebellion. The oath of allegiance shall be taken and subscribed on the poll-book by every voter in the form above prescribed, but every person known by or proved to the commissioners to have held or exercised any office, civil or military, State or confederate, under the rebel usurpation, or to have voluntarily borne arms against the United States, shall be excluded, though he offer to take the oath; and in case any person who shall have borne arms against the United States shall offer to vote, he shall be deemed to have borne arms voluntarily unless he shall prove the contrary by the testimony of a qualified voter. The poll-book, showing the name and oath of each voter, shall be returned to the provisional governor by the commissioners of election or the one acting, and the provisional governor shall canvass such returns, and declare the person having the highest number of votes elected.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the provisional governor shall, by proclamation, convene the delegates elected as aforesaid, at the capital of the State, on a day not more than three months after the election, giving at least thirty days' notice of such day. In case the said capital shall in his judgment be unfit, he shall in his proclamation appoint another place. He shall preside over the deliberations of the convention, and administer to each delegate, before taking his seat in the convention, the oath of allegiance to the United States in the form hereinbefore prescribed.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the convention shall declare, on behalf of the people of the State, their submission to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and shall adopt the following provisions, hereby prescribed by the United States in the execution of the constitutional duty to guarantee a republican form of government to every State, and incorporate them in the constitution of the State, that is to say:

First. No person who has held or exercised any office, civil or military, except civil offices merely ministerial and military offices below the grade of colonel, State or confederate, under the usurping power, shall vote for or be a member of the Legislature, or Governor.

Second. Involuntary servitude is forever prohibited, and freedom and equality of civil rights before the law are guaranteed to all persons in said State.

Third. No debt, State or confederate, created by or under the sanction of the usurping power, or in any manner in aid thereof, shall be recognized or paid by the State; and all acts, judicial or legislative, for the confiscation or forfeiture of any debt, property, or franchise, of any loyal citizen of the United States, are hereby declared null and void.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That when the convention shall have adopted those provisions it shall proceed to reestablish a republican form of government, and ordain a constitution containing those provisions, which, when adopted, the convention shall by ordinance provide for submitting to the people of the State entitled to vote under this law, at an election to be held in the manner prescribed by the act for the election of delegates, but at a time and place named by the convention, at which election the said electors, and none other, shall vote directly for or against such constitution and form of State government. And the returns of said election shall be made to the provisional governor, who shall canvass the same in the presence of the electors, and if a majority of the votes cast shall be for the constitution and form of government, he shall certify the same with a copy thereof, to the President of the United States, who, after obtaining the assent of Congress, by act or joint resolution, shall, by proclamation, recognize the government so established, and none other, as the constitutional government of the State; and from the date of such recognition, and not before, Senators and Representatives and electors for President and Vice President may be elected in such State, according to the laws of the State and of the United States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if the convention shall refuse to reestablish the State government on the conditions aforesaid, the provisional governor shall declare it dissolved; but it shall be the duty of the President, whenever he shall have reason to believe that a sufficient number of the people of the State entitled to vote under this act, in number not less than a majority of those enrolled as aforesaid, are willing to reestablish a State government on the conditions aforesaid, to direct the provisional governor to order another election of delegates to a convention for the purpose and in the manner prescribed in this act, and to proceed in all respects as hereinbefore provided, either to dissolve the convention or to certify the State government reestablished by it to the President.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the United States, in Congress assembled, do hereby recognize the government of the State of Louisiana, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1864, at the city of New Orleans; and the government of the State of Arkansas, inaugurated under and by the convention which assembled on the 8th day of January, 1864, at the city of Little Rock: Provided, That the same or other conventions, duly assembled, shall first have incorporated into the constitutions of those States, respectively, the conditions prescribed in the twelfth section of this act, and the marshal of the United States shall have returned to the President of the United States the enrollment directed by the seventh section to be made and returned to the provisional governor, and it shall appear thereby that the persons taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, together with the citizens of the United States from such State in the military or naval service of the United States, amount to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State. And the President shall, thereupon, by proclamation, declare the recognition by the United States, in Congress assembled, of the said government of such State; and from the date of such proclamation the said government shall be entitled to the guarantee and all other rights of a State government under the Constitution of the United States; but this act shall not operate a recognition of a State government in either of said States till the conditions aforesaid are complied with, and till that time those States shall be subject to this law.

MR. ASHLEY. The select committee on the rebellious States direct me to ask of the House that this amendment may be substituted for the original bill, and considered as an original bill, to which other substitutes may be submitted as amendments.

THE SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

MR. KELLEY. I move to amend this bill by inserting after the words "to enroll all the white male citizens of the United States," the words "and all other male citizens of the United States who may be able to read the Constitution thereof."

MR. ELIOT. I move the following as a substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the States declared to be in rebellion against the United States, and within which the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States has been overthrown, shall not be permitted to resume their political relations with the Government of the United States until, by action of the loyal citizens within such States respectively, a State constitution shall be ordained and established, republican in form, forever prohibiting involuntary servitude within such State, and guaranteeing to all persons freedom and equality of rights before the law.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Louisiana is hereby permitted to resume its political relations with the Government of the United States under the constitution adopted by the convention which assembled on the 6th day of April, A. D. 1864, at New Orleans.

MR. WILSON. I move to amend the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting the following:

Senators and Representatives shall not be received from any State heretofore declared in rebellion against the United States until by an act or joint resolution of Congress, approved by the President, or passed notwithstanding his objections, such State shall have been first declared to have organized a just local government, republican in form, and to be entitled to representation in the respective Houses of Congress.

MR. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] in order under the rule?

THE SPEAKER. It is, for it is in the nature of an amendment to an amendment. By unanimous consent the House has substituted the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] in the place of the original bill reported from the select committee on the rebellious States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] submits an amendment to that bill, in the nature of a substitute. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] moves an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has also submitted an amendment to the seventh section of what is now the original bill, and as his amendment is to perfect the original bill, the first question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

MR. KERNAN. I ask leave to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

THE SPEAKER. There being already pending an amendment in the second degree, the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] can only be received at this time by unanimous consent.

MR. DAVIS, of Maryland. I object.

MR. ARNOLD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to accept as an amendment to his amendment that which I have in my hand.

MR. ELIOT. If it is the same that I have seen I have no objection to it.

MR. ARNOLD. It is the same. It is as follows:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That in all that portion of the United States heretofore declared to be in rebellion against the United States, and enumerated in the President's proclamation of January 1, 1863, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crime whereof the accused shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and the same hereby is, abolished and prohibited forever, and the reenslavement, or holding, or attempting to hold in slavery or involuntary servitude, any person within such States made free by this act, or declared to be free by the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated January 1, 1863, or of any of their descendants, otherwise than in the punishment of crime whereof the accused shall have been duly convicted, is and shall be forever prohibited, any law or regulation of either of said States to the contrary notwithstanding.

MR. ELIOT. I accept the amendment.

THE SPEAKER. The pending question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

MR. ASHLEY. I wish to enter a motion to recommit this bill, with all the pending amendments; and as I do not desire to discuss the subject now, I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

MR. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, these are indeed terrible times for timid people. Use and wont no longer serve us. The guns traitorously fired upon Fort Sumter threw us all out of the well-beaten ruts of habit, and as the war progresses men find themselves less and less able to express their political views by naming a party or uttering its shibboleth. It is no longer safe for any of us to wait till the election comes and accept the platform and tickets presented by a party. We may have served in its ranks for a life-time and find at last—costly and painful experience being our guide—that to obtain the ends we had in view we should have acted independently of, and in opposition to it and its leaders. In seasons like this, an age on ages telling, the feeblest man in whom there is faith or honesty is made to feel that he is not quite powerless, that duty is laid on him too, and that the force that is in him ought to be expressed in accordance with his own convictions and in a way to promote some end seen or hoped for.

The questions with which we have to deal, the grave doubts that confound us, the difficulties that environ us, the results our action will produce, fraught with weal or woe to centuries and constantly-increasing millions, are such as have rarely been confided to a generation. But happily we are not without guidance. Our situation, though novel, does not necessarily cast us upon the field of mere experiment. True, we have not specific precedents which we may safely follow; but the founders of our Government gave us, in a few brief sentences, laws by which we may extricate our generation and country from the horrors that involve them, and secure peace broad as our country, enduring as its history, and beneficent as right and justice and love.

The organized war power of the rebellion is on the eve of overthrow. It belongs to us to govern the territory we have conquered, and the question of reconstruction presses itself upon our attention; and our legislation in this behalf will, though it comprise no specific provisions on the subject, determine whether guerrilla war shall harass communities for long years, or be suppressed in a brief time by punishments administered through courts and law, to marauders for the crimes they may commit under the name of partisan warfare. At the close of an international war, the wronged but victorious party may justly make two claims: indemnity for the past, and security for the future; indemnity for the past in money or in territory; security for the future by new treaties, the establishment of new boundaries, or the cession of military power and the territory upon which it dwells. Indemnity for the past we cannot hope to obtain. When we shall have punished the conspirators who involved the country in this sanguinary war, and pardoned the dupes and victims who have arrayed themselves or been forced to do battle under their flag, we shall but have repossessed our ancient territory, reestablished the boundaries of our country, restored to our flag and Constitution their supremacy over territory which was ours, but which the insurgents meant to dismember and possess. The other demand we may and must successfully make. Security for the future is accessible to us, and we must demand it; and to obtain it with amplest guarantees requires the adoption of no new idea, the making of no experiment, the entering upon no sea of political speculation. Ours would have been an era of peace and prosperity, had we and our fathers accepted in full faith the great principles that impelled their fathers to demand the independence of the United Colonies, gave them strength in counsel, patience, courage, and long endurance in the field, and guided them in establishing a Constitution which all ages will recognize as the miracle of the era in which it was framed and adopted, and the influence of which shall modify and change, and bring into its own similitude, the Governments of the world. Had we, and the generation that preceded us, accepted and been guided by the self-evident truths to which I allude, the world would never have known the martial power of the American people, or realized the fact that a Government that sits so lightly as ours upon the people in peace is so infinitely strong in the terrible season of war.

The founders of our institutions labored consciously and reverently in the sight of God. They knew that they were the creatures of His power, and that their work could only be well done by being done in the recognition of His attributes, and in harmony with the enduring laws of His providence. They knew that His ways were ways of pleasantness, and His paths the paths of peace; and they endeavored to embody His righteousness and justice in the Government they were fashioning for unknown ages, and untold millions of men. Their children, in the enjoyment of the prosperity thus secured to them, lost their faith in these great truths, treated them with utter disregard, violated them, legislated in opposition to them, and finally strove to govern the country in active hostility to them. And for a little while they seemed to succeed. But at length we have been made to feel and know that God's justice does not sleep always; and amid the ruins of the country and the desolation of our homes let us resolve that we will return to the ancient ways, look to Him for guidance, and follow humbly in the footsteps of our wise and pious forefathers; and that, as grateful children, we will erect to their memory and to that of the brave men who have died in defense of their work in this the grandest of all wars, a monument broad as our country, pure as was their wisdom, and enduring as Christian civilization. So shall we by our firmness and equity exalt the humble, restrain the rapacious and arrogant, and bind the people to each other by the manifold cords of common sympathies and interest, and to the Government by the gratitude due to a just and generous guardian.

But, Mr. Speaker, I hear gentlemen inquire how this is to be done. The process is simple, easy, and inviting; it is by accepting in child-like faith, and executing with firm and steady purpose three or four of the simple dogmas which the founders of our Government proclaimed to the world, and which, alas! too often with hypocritical lip service, are professed by all Americans, even those who are now striving, through blood, and carnage, and devastation, to found a broad empire, the corner-stone of which was to be human slavery.

In announcing the reasons which impelled the colonies to a separation from the mother country, the American people declared that "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind" required "a declaration of the causes which impelled them to the separation;" and in assigning those causes announced a few general propositions, embodying eternal and ever-operating principles, among which were,

First, that "all men are created equal, are endowed with certain inalienable rights," and that "among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness;"

Second, that "to insure these rights, Governments are instituted among men;"

Third, that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed;"

Fourth, that "whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new Government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness." And in these four propositions we have an all-sufficient guide to enduring peace and prosperity. If in the legislation we propose we regard these self-evident truths, our posterity shall not only enjoy peace, but teach the world the way to universal freedom; but if we fail to regard them, God alone in His infinite wisdom knows what years of agitation, war, and misery we may entail on posterity, and whether the overthrow of our Government, the division of our country, and all the ills thus entailed on mankind may not be justly chargeable to us.

The tables of the census of 1860 exhibiting the population of the eleven insurgent States, show that it numbered, and was divided as follows:

States.	White population.	Colored population, slave and free, including Indians.
Alabama.....	526,271	436,930
Arkansas.....	324,143	111,307
Florida.....	77,747	62,677
Georgia.....	591,550	465,736
Louisiana.....	357,456	350,546
Mississippi.....	353,901	437,404
North Carolina.....	629,942	362,680
South Carolina.....	291,300	412,408
Tennessee.....	826,722	283,079
Texas.....	420,891	183,320
Virginia.....	1,047,299	519,019
	5,447,222	3,666,110

This table, as will be observed, embraces the whole of Virginia as she was in 1860, and as I have not the means of distinguishing the proportion of her population that is embraced in the new State of West Virginia, I permit it to stand as it is. The new State is in the Union; her citizens never assented to the ordinance of secession; they have provided for the extinguishment of slavery within her limits; and my remarks, save in the general scope in which they may be applicable to any or all of the States of the Union, will not be understood as applying to her. It is of the territory for which it is the duty of Congress to provide governments that I speak. I should also call attention to the fact that the Superintendent of the Census includes the few Indians that remained in some of these States in the column of white inhabitants. Their number is not important; but it certainly should not be so stated as to create the impression that they enjoyed the rights or performed the duties of citizens. How unfair this classification is will appear from the fact that the following section from the Code of Tennessee of 1858, section 3,858, indicates very fairly the position they held under the legislation of each and all the above-named States:

"A negro, mulatto, Indian, or person of mixed blood, descended from negro or Indian ancestors, to the third generation inclusive, though one ancestor of each generation may have been a white person, whether bond or free, is incapable of being a witness in any case, civil or criminal, except for or against each other."

Correcting the error of the Superintendent of the Census, I have enumerated the Indians with the people to whose fate the legislation of those States assigned them. It will be perceived that when that census was taken the white population numbered 5,447,222, and the colored population 3,666,110.

It thus appears that the colored people were considerably more than two fifths of the whole population of the insurgent States; and that while we have professed to believe that their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness was inalienable—could not be alienated or relinquished by them, nor taken away by others—we have ignored their humanity, and denied them the enjoyment of any single political right.

That, while we have professed to believe that governments are instituted among men to secure their rights, the history of our country for the last fifty years proves that the whole power and constant labor of our Government have been exerted to prevent the possibility of two fifths of the people of more than half our country ever attaining the enjoyment of political, civil, or social rights.

That, while we have professed to believe that all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, we have punished with ignominy and stripes and imprisonment and death the men who had the temerity to assert that it was wrong to deny to two fifths of the people of a country, and, as in the case of South Carolina and Mississippi, a large majority of the people of the State, the right even to petition for redress of grievance.

And while we have been swift to assure, in terms of warmest sympathy, and sometimes with active aid, any oppressed and revolting people beyond the seas that we believed it to be the right and duty of such people, "whenever any form of Government becomes destructive of the ends" above indicated, "to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new Government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness," we have, even to the boundaries of the lakes and to the far Pacific shores, stood pledged and ready to lay down our lives in the suppression of any attempt these Americans might make to carry into effect this cardinal doctrine of our professed political faith. Is it any wonder that God, seeing millions of His people thus trampled on, oppressed, outraged, and made voiceless by those whose fathers had placed their feet in His ways, and whose lips never wearied in beseeching His guidance and care, should fill the oppressors with madness and open through their blood and agony a way for the deliverance of their long-suffering victims?

But, Mr. Speaker, it is asked, who are these people? They are the laboring masses of the South—the field hand, the house servant, the mechanic, the artisan, the engineer of that region. Their sinewy arms have felled the forest, opened the farm and the plantation, made the road, the canal, the railroad. It was by the sweat of their brow that the sunny South was made to bloom; it is they whose labor has quickened the wheels of commerce and swelled the accumulating wealth of the world. Upon their brawny shoulders rested the social fabric of the South, and an arrogant aristocracy, that strove to dictate morals to the world, boasted that one product of their toil was a king to whom peoples and Governments must bow. Most of them are ignorant and degraded; but that cannot be mentioned to their disgrace or disparagement. Not they nor their ancestors enacted the laws which made it a felony to enable them to read the Constitution and the laws of their country, or the Book of Life through which their fairer brethren hope for salvation. Dumb and voiceless most of them are; but let not want of intellectual power be ascribed to them as a race, in view of the wit, humor, sarcasm, and pathos, of the learning, logical power, and scientific attainments, of a Douglass, a Garnett, a Remond, a Brown, a Stella Martin, a William Craft, and scores of others, who, evading the bloodhound and his master in the slave-hunt, have made their way to lands where the teachings of Christ are regarded and the brotherhood of man is not wholly denied. Others of them are and have been free, at least so far as to be able to acquire property and send their children to foreign lands for culture. Let some such speak for themselves. In the petition of the colored citizens of Louisiana to the President and Congress of the United States, they respectfully submit:

"That they are natives of Louisiana and citizens of the United States; that they are loyal citizens, sincerely attached to the country and the Constitution, and ardently desire the maintenance of the national unity, for which they are ready to sacrifice their fortunes and their lives."

"That a large portion of them are owners of real estate, and all of them are owners of personal property; that many of them are engaged in the pursuits of commerce and industry, while others are employed as artisans in various trades; that they are all fitted to enjoy the privileges and immunities belonging to the condition of citizens of the United States, and among them may be found many of the descendants of those men whom the illustrious Jackson styled his 'fellow-citizens' when he called upon them to take up arms to repel the enemies of the country."

"Your petitioners further respectfully represent that over and above the right which, in the language of the Declaration of Independence, they possess to liberty and the pursuit of happiness, they are supported by the opinion of just and loyal men, especially by that of Hon. Edward Bates, Attorney General, in the claim to the right of enjoying the privileges and immunities pertaining to the condition of citizens of the United States; and, to support the legitimacy of this claim, they believe it simply necessary to submit to your Excellency, and to the honorable Congress, the following considerations, which they beg of you to weigh in the balance of law and justice. Notwithstanding their forefathers served in the Army of the United States, in 1814-15, and aided in repelling from the soil of Louisiana a haughty enemy, over-confident of success, yet they and their descendants have ever since, and until the era of the present rebellion, been estranged and even repulsed, excluded from all franchises, even the smallest, when their brave forefathers offered their bosoms to the enemy to preserve the territorial integrity of the Republic! During this period of forty nine years they have never ceased to be peaceable citizens, paying their taxes on an assessment of more than fifteen million dollars!"

"At the call of General Butler they hastened to rally under the banner of the Union and liberty; they have spilled their blood, and are still pouring it out for the maintenance of the Constitution of the United States; in a word, they are soldiers of the Union, and they will defend it so long as their hands have strength to hold a musket."

"While General Banks was at the siege of Fort Hudson and the city threatened by the enemy, his Excellency Governor Shepley called for troops for the defense of the city, and they were foremost in responding to the call, having raised the first regiment in the short space of forty-eight hours.

"In consideration of this fact, as true and as clear as the sun which lights this great continent, in consideration of the services already performed and still to be rendered by them to their common country, they humbly beseech your Excellency and Congress to cast your eyes upon a loyal population, awaiting with confidence and dignity the proclamation of those inalienable rights which belong to the condition of citizens of the great American Republic.

"There is but a feeble voice claiming attention in the midst of the grave questions raised by this terrible conflict; yet, confident of the justice which guides the action of the Government, they have no hesitation in speaking what is prompted by their hearts: 'We are men; treat us as such.'"

This petition, which it is within my knowledge was prepared by one of the proscribed race, asks only for what the fathers of our country intended they should enjoy. They discovered in the Africo-American the attributes and infirmities of their own nature, and in organizing governments, local or general, made no invidious distinction between him and his fellow-men. Under the Articles of Confederation, and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and long subsequent thereto, the free colored man was with their consent a citizen and a voter. Our fathers meant that he should be so. Their faith in the great cardinal maxims they enunciated was undoubting; and they embodied it without mental reservation when they gave form and action to our Government. No one who has studied the history of that period doubts that they regarded slavery as transitory and evanescent. Neither the word "slave," nor any synonym for it, was given place in the Constitution. We know by the oft-quoted remark of Mr. Madison that it was purposely excluded that the future people of the country might never be reminded by that instrument that so odious a condition had ever existed among the people of the United States. That instrument nowhere contemplates any discrimination in reference to political or personal rights on the ground of color. In defining the rights guaranteed by the Constitution they are never limited to the white population, but the word "people" is used without qualification. When in that instrument its framers alluded to those who filled the anomalous, and, as they believed, temporary position of slaves, they spoke of "persons held to service," and in the three-fifths clause of "all other persons." They confided all power to "the people," and provided amply, as they believed, for the protection of the whole people. Thus in the second section of article one, they provided as follows for the organization of the House of Representatives:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

And in the amendments of the Constitution we see how careful they were at a later day to guard the rights of the people:

"ART. 1. Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

"ART. 2. A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

"ART. 4. The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated."

"ART. 9. The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

"ART. 10. The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

It has, I know, been fashionable to deny that the framers of the Constitution intended to embrace colored persons when they used the word "people;" and it is still asserted by some that it was used with a mental reservation broad and effective enough to exclude them; but the Journals of the Convention and the general history of the times abound in contradictions of this false and mischievous theory, the source of all our present woes. A brief review of contemporaneous events ought to put this question at rest forever.

The Congress of the Confederation was in session on the 25th of June, 1778, the fourth of the Articles of Confederation being under consideration. The terms of the article as proposed were that "the free inhabitants of each of these States (paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted) shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States."

We learn by the Journal that "the delegates from South Carolina, being called on, moved the following amendment in behalf of their State: in article four, between the words 'free inhabitants' insert 'white.'" How was this proposition, identical with that now made to us, received by the sages there and then assembled? Eleven States voted on the question. Two, South Carolina being one of them, sustained the proposition; the vote of one State was divided; and eight, affirming the colored man's right to the privileges of citizenship, voted "no," and the proposition was thus negatived. South Carolina—then, as she has ever been, persistent in mischief—further moved, through her delegates, to amend by inserting after the words "the several States" the words "according to the law of such States respectively for the government of their own free white inhabitants." This proposition was also negatived by the same decisive vote, as appears by the Journal of the Congress of the Confederation, volume four, pages 379, 380. What two States did not vote upon the question the Journal does not indicate; but when it is remembered that Pennsylvania led her sisters in the great work of emancipation, and that it was not till nearly two years after that date that she abolished slavery, it will be seen that it was by a vote of slaveholders representing slave States, that the proposition to deny citizenship, its rights, privileges, and immunities, to the colored people was so emphatically rejected. The delegates could not, with propriety, have voted otherwise. To have done so, they would have agreed that, in violation of all comity, while they secured the rights of citizenship within the limits of their State to citizens of others, those other States might deny them to citizens of their own. They did not probably foresee that South Carolina might cast the shipwrecked citizen of another State who had been thrown upon her shores into a jail, because of the decree of the Almighty, who had given him a complexion not agreeable to the eyes of her people, and in default of the ability to pay jail fees thus unwillingly incurred, doom him and his posterity to the woes of perpetual slavery; but they did see that such a proposition opened the door to inequality, and possibly to oppression, and they resisted it with a firmness and forecast which their posterity have failed to honor or emulate.

Again, they could not have consistently voted for such a proposition; for, by the constitutions of their own States, free colored men were voters, and in the enjoyment of the rights of citizenship. Not only then, but in 1789, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, there was but one State whose constitution distinguished in this respect against the colored man. This odious distinction, so fraught with unforeseen but terrible consequences, marred the constitution of South Carolina alone at the latter date.

The constitution of Massachusetts provided that

"Every male person (being twenty-one years of age, and resident in any particular town in this Commonwealth for the space of one year next preceding) having a freehold estate within the same town of the annual income of three pounds, or any estate of the value of sixty pounds, shall have a right to vote in the choice of a representative or representatives for the said town."

Rhode Island had adopted no constitution, but continued under colonial charter, which provided for the election of members of the General Assembly by "the major part of the freemen of the respective towns or places."

Connecticut also continued under colonial charter, according to which the qualifications of an elector were "maturity in years, quiet and peaceable behavior, a civil conversation, and forty shillings freehold, or forty pounds personal estate."

The constitution of New York provided that—

"Every male inhabitant of full age, who shall have personally resided within one of the counties of this State for six months immediately preceding the day of election, shall, at such election, be entitled to vote for representatives of the said county in the Assembly, if, during the time aforesaid, he shall have been a freeholder possessing a freehold of the value of twenty pounds within the said county, or have rented a tenement therein of the yearly value of forty shillings, and have rated and actually paid taxes to this State."

The constitution of New Jersey contained this provision:

"All inhabitants of this colony of full age, who are worth fifty pounds proclamation money clear estate in the same, and have resided within the county in which they claim to vote for twelve months immediately preceding the election, shall be entitled to vote for representatives in Council and Assembly, and also for all other public officers that shall be elected by the people of the county at large."

The constitution of Pennsylvania provided that—

"Every freeman of the full age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State for the space of one whole year next before the day of election for representatives, and paid public taxes during that time, shall enjoy the right of an elector; provided always that sons of freeholders of the age of twenty-one years shall be entitled to vote although they have not paid taxes."

The constitution of Delaware declared that—

"The right of suffrage in the election for members of both houses shall remain as exercised by law at present."

The declaration of rights, prefixed to the constitution, contained the following:

"Every freeman, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with and attachment to the community, hath a right of suffrage."

The constitution of Maryland provides that—

"All freemen, above twenty-one years of age, having a freehold of fifty acres of land in the county in which they offer to vote, and residing therein, and all freemen having property in this State above the value of thirty pounds current money, and having resided in the county in which they offer to vote one whole year next preceding the election, shall have a right of suffrage in the election of delegates for such county."

The constitution of Virginia contained a provision that—

"The right of suffrage in the election of members for both houses shall remain as exercised at present."

The declaration of rights, prefixed to the constitution, contained the following:

"All men having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with and attachment to the community have the right of suffrage."

The constitution of North Carolina provided that—

"All freemen of the age of twenty-one years, who have been inhabitants of any one county within the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of any election, and shall have paid public taxes, shall be entitled to vote for members of the House of Commons for the county in which they reside."

The constitution of Georgia declared that—

"The electors of the members of both branches of the General Assembly shall be citizens and inhabitants of this State, and shall have attained to the age of twenty-one years, and have paid tax for the year preceding the election, and shall have resided six months within the county."

The constitution of South Carolina provided that—

"The qualifications of an elector shall be, every free white man, and no other person, who acknowledges the being of a God, and believes in a future state of rewards and punishments, and who has attained the age of one and twenty years, and hath been an inhabitant and resident in this State for the space of one whole year before the day appointed for the election he offers to give his vote at, and hath a freehold at least of fifty acres of land or a town lot, and hath been legally seized and possessed of the same at least six months previous to such election, or hath paid a tax the preceding year, or was taxable the present year, at least six months previous to the said election, in a sum equal to the tax on fifty acres of land, to the support of this government, shall be a person qualified to vote for, and shall be capable of electing, a representative or representatives."

But, Mr. Speaker, to evade the force of this overwhelming array of facts, the pro-slavery Democracy and purblind conservatism of the country have suggested that the thought of the black man was not present in the minds of those who fashioned these constitutions and bills of rights; that they could not have imagined that the freed slave or his posterity would have the audacity to ask that they should be recognized as freemen and citizens of our country; and with unblushing effrontery they have made the ignorant believe that the Government was organized, not for mankind, but for the white man alone. The falsity of these suggestions is fully exposed by the fact that South Carolina made the distinction, and in the Congress of the Confederation pressed it on the attention of the whole country, but will be still more amply demonstrated by the facts I shall hereafter cite. In every State but South Carolina, and possibly Virginia and Delaware, in which the right of suffrage was regulated by statute, and not by constitutional provision, the free colored man at that time was a voter. In no State constitution except that of South Carolina, which was replete with aristocratic provisions, was the right of suffrage limited by express terms to the white man; consequently but few, if any, of the members of the Convention that framed the Constitution of the United States could have failed to meet him as a voter at the polls. I remember well to have seen negroes at the polls exercising the right of suffrage in Pennsylvania, where they enjoyed it from the foundation of the government to the year 1838, when the growing influence of the increasing slave power of the country, operating on the political ambition of those whom the people had charged with no such duty, deprived colored men of this right by following the example of South Carolina and inserting the word "white" in the constitution of the State. Similar action restricted their right in New York, making it dependent on a property qualification, and deprived them of it in New Jersey and other States now free. To her praise be it spoken, except in Connecticut, which State, in 1817, in compliance to South Carolina, inserted the word "white" in her constitution, they still enjoy the right throughout New England, not as a concession from men of modern days, but hereditarily, from the times in which the foundations of the Government were laid. Gentlemen around me from the State of Maryland doubtless well remember the days when the free colored man voted in their State. It was only in 1833 that he was deprived of that inestimable right by constitutional amendment within her limits. That the negro enjoyed this right in North Carolina until he was deprived of it in the same way is proven by the following extract from the opinion of Judge Gaston, of that State, in the State vs. Manuel, which was decided in 1838, and may be found in 4 Devereux and Battle's North Carolina Reports, page 25:

"It has been said that before our Revolution free persons of color did not exercise the right of voting for members of the colonial Legislature. How this may have been it would be difficult at this time to ascertain. It is certain, however, that very few, if any, could have claimed the right of suffrage for a reason of a very different character from the one supposed. The principle of freehold suffrage seems to have been brought over from England with the first colonists, and to have been preserved almost invariably in the colony ever afterward." "The very Congress which framed our constitution [the State constitution of 1776] was chosen by freeholders. That constitution extended the elective franchise to every freeman who had arrived at the age of twenty-one and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety that under it free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise until it was taken from free men of color a few years since by our amended constitution."

Tennessee was admitted to the Union in 1796. Her constitution provided as follows:

"Every freeman of the age of twenty-one years and upward, possessing a freehold in the county wherein he may vote, and being an inhabitant of this State, and every freeman being an inhabitant of any one county in the State six months immediately preceding the day of election, shall be entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly for the county in which he may reside."

This constitution, as will be seen, endured for forty years, during which the free colored men of the State enjoyed their political rights, and exercised, as will appear, a powerful and salutary influence upon public opinion and the course of legislation.

In 1834, a convention to revise that constitution assembled at Nashville, and, accepting the suggestion of South Carolina, by a vote of 33 to 23 limited the suffrage to free white men. During those forty years free negroes had enjoyed a right which made them a power; and no chapter in our history better illustrates the value of this power to both races, or how certainly great wrongs of this kind react and punish the wrong-doer. Cave Johnson is a name well known throughout the country and honored in Tennessee; and it was his boast that the free men of color gave his services to the country by electing him to Congress. On page 1305 of the Congressional Globe for the session of 1853-54, will be found the following statement of Hon. John Pettit, of Indiana, made in the United States Senate, May 25, 1854, while discussing the suffrage clause of the Kansas-Nebraska bill:

"Many of the States have conferred this right [of suffrage] upon Indians, and many, both North and South, have conferred it upon free negroes without property. Old Cave Johnson, of Tennessee, an honored and respectable gentleman, formerly Postmaster General, and for a long time a member of the other House, told me with his own lips that the first time he was elected to Congress from Tennessee (in 1828) it was by the votes of free negroes; and he told me how. Free negroes in Tennessee were then allowed by the constitution of the State to vote; and he was an iron manufacturer, and had a large number of free negroes as well as slaves in his employ. I well recollect the number he stated. One hundred and forty-four free negroes in his employ went to the ballot-box and elected him to Congress the first time he was elected."

Few will now deny that slavery is a curse alike to the master and the servile race. None will deny that slavery has been a curse to that State in view of the vast mineral resources of Tennessee; her fine natural sites for great cities; her capacity to feed, house, clothe, educate, and profitably employ free laborers; her recent history, the abundant source of future song and story; the pious and patriotic endurance of the brave and God-fearing people of the eastern section of the State, and the perfect abandon with which their more aristocratic fellow-citizens of the western section of the State espoused the cause of the rebellion; the cruelties inflicted on the loyal people by the traitors; the horrors and the heroism of the border warfare that has desolated her fair fields, and the rancorous feuds and intense hatreds, which the grave can only extinguish, that have been engendered among her people by the war. And who, if the apparently well-founded tradition be true, that a proposition to incorporate in her constitution of 1796 a clause prohibiting slavery was lost by a majority of one vote, will estimate the evil done by the man who thus decided that momentous question?

The history of slavery in Tennessee, and the determined resistance so long made against its struggles for supremacy, will, I am sure, justify a brief digression. There were in 1796, it is said, considerably less than five thousand slaves within her limits, who had been brought thither by the earlier settlers of what was then known as the territory south of the Ohio. The influence of the colored citizens is traceable throughout her earlier history. So early as 1801, before she had existed five years as a State, the Legislature conferred the power of emancipation upon the county courts of the State by an act, the preamble to which significantly says:

"Whereas the number of petitions presented to this Legislature praying the emancipation of slaves, not only tends to involve the State in great evils, but is also productive of great expense."

In 1812, the introduction of slaves into the State for sale was prohibited by law. Yet in the twenty years between 1790 and 1810, by the power of emigration from slave States and natural increase, the number swelled from less than four thousand to upward of forty-four thousand. This rapid increase of slave population alarmed the people, and emancipation societies were organized in different parts of the State. Extracts from an address delivered on the 17th of August, 1816, by request of one of these societies, and repeated with its approval on the 1st of January, 1817, and which, having been printed, not anonymously, but by Heiskell & Brown, was largely distributed by the society, are before me. It proposes to show,

First, the object or design of the society.
Second, that the principles of slavery are inconsistent with the laws of nature and revelation.
Third, some of its evils, both moral and political.

Fourth, that no solid objections lie against gradual emancipation.

To show the freedom with which the subject was then discussed, I offer a brief extract or two. In those days the people of America had not learned, nor did they yet pretend to believe, that the Constitution of the United States denied them the right to think of the condition of any class of suffering people, or made it a crime to utter their convictions and their philanthropic emotions. Thus this address to the people of Tennessee says:

"Slavery, as it exists among us, gives a master a property in the slaves and their descendants as much as law can give a property in land, cattle, goods, and chattels of any kind, to be used at the discretion of the master, or to be sold to whom, when, and where he pleases, with the descendants forever. It is true, if the master take away the life of the slave under certain circumstances, our laws pronounce it murder. But the laws leave it in the power of the master to destroy his life by a thousand acts of lingering cruelty. He may starve him to death by degrees, or he may whip him to death if he only take long enough time, or he may so unite the rigors of hard labor, stinted diet, and exposure as to shorten life. The laws watch against sudden murder, as if to leave the forlorn wretches exposed to any slow death that the cruelty and malignant passions of a savage may dictate. Nor is there any restraint but a sense of pecuniary loss, feeble barrier against the effects of the malevolent passions that are known to reside in the human heart. The most inhuman wretch may own slaves, as well as the humane and gentle. Should laws leave one human being in the power of another to such an extent? In many countries where slavery exists the laws prescribe the manner in which they shall be used, and that, too, in lands which do not boast either of the light and science we enjoy or of the liberty and equality which raise us above and distinguish us from all the nations of the globe."

Nor did the movement, as appears at least from this address, contemplate the abolition of slavery in Tennessee alone; for, after alluding to the great doctrines promulgated in the Declaration of Independence, it says:

"On the certainty of the unchangeableness of these truths, we justify our separation from the Government of Great Britain. For the defense and enjoyment of these principles our fathers willingly met death, and surrendered their lives martyrs. They bequeathed them to us as the greatest of human legacies. Yet slavery, as it exists in the United States, is in direct opposition to these self-evident maxims. Every line of our history, every battle in our struggle for independence, every anniversary of our national birth condemns the principles of slavery, and fixes on us the charge of glaring inconsistency; and every law passed by Legislatures in favor of slavery is in direct opposition to the principles of our national existence. Let us willingly do that which we justly blame Great Britain for refusing to do until forced, namely, acknowledge the rights of men, and give, in a suitable way, more than one million and a half of people to enjoy these sacred rights."

In 1834, when the convention to revise the constitution assembled, the slaves in the State numbered more than one hundred and fifty thousand. The power of the slave oligarchy had increased, and opposition to the institution had perhaps become less powerful. But in the first week of the convention, petitions on the subject of emancipation were presented from the citizens of Maury county, and were soon followed by others from Robertson, Lincoln, Bedford, Overton, Roane, Rhea, Knox, Monroe, McMinn, Blount, Sevier, Cocke, Jefferson, Greene, and Washington, many of the signers being slaveholders, and all praying that all the slaves should be made free by the year 1866. By an unforeseen process, the prayer of those petitioners will be granted, though the convention to which they addressed their prayer gave an unfavorable response, and as if in derision of the petitioners, attempted to fasten his shackles more firmly on the slave. God, whose

"Ways seem dark, but, soon or late, They touch the shining hills of day," in His infinite mercy and wisdom has in this respect reversed the decrees of man. Well for Tennessee and her bleeding people would it have been had the members of that convention bowed reverently to His will, as did the framers of the Constitution of the United States, and so worded the instrument they fashioned that it would not have informed posterity that so odious an institution as slavery had ever been tolerated by the State.

During the second week of the session, Matthew Stephenson, a farmer of Washington county, a native of Rockingham county, Virginia, moved "that a committee of thirteen, one from each congressional district, be appointed to take into consideration the propriety of designating some period from which slavery shall not be tolerated in this State, and that all memorials on that subject that have or may be presented to the convention be referred to said committee to consider and report thereon;" which resolution, by a vote of 38 to 20, was laid on the table on the 1st of January, 1835.

This action of the convention was not readily acquiesced in by the people; and to avert popular indignation it was "resolved that a committee of three, one from each division of the State, be appointed to draft the reasons that governed this convention in declining to act upon the memorials on the subject of slavery." The address prepared by the committee appointed under this resolution does not attempt to defend or apologize for slavery; does not deny that it is a great wrong; speaks of "the unenviable condition of the slave;" of slavery as "unlovely in all its aspects," and deplores "the bitter draught the slave is doomed to drink." It rests the defense of the convention on other grounds than divine sanction of this monstrous wrong, this hideous outrage upon every precept of Christianity, this violation of every clause of the decalogue. It puts its defense on the ground of policy, and asserts that a constitutional provision looking to gradual emancipation would deplete the State of its laborers; that men would hurry their slaves into Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, or Arkansas, where they would be less kindly treated than in Tennessee, and where the prospect of ultimate emancipation would be more remote. This address to the people of Tennessee admonishes us of the preten-mial fountain of evil they would inflict on the people of the insurgent district, who would doom the more than three million six hundred and sixty-six thousand people of color, dwelling within its limits, to that dubious measure of freedom enjoyed by men to whom political rights are denied, by the following pointed passage:

"The condition of a free man of color, surrounded by persons of a different caste and complexion, is the most forlorn and wretched that can be imagined. He is a stranger in the land of his nativity; he is an outcast in the place of his residence; he has scarcely a motive to prompt him to virtuous action or to stimulate him to honorable exertions. At every turn and corner of the walks of life he is beset with temptations, strong, nay, almost irresistible, to the force of which in most cases he may be expected to yield, the consequence of which must be that he will be degraded, despised, and trampled upon by the rest of the community. When the free man of color is oppressed by the proud, or circumvented by the cunning, or betrayed by those in whom he has reposed confidence, do the laws of the land afford him more than a nominal protection? Denied his oath in a court of justice, unable to call any of his own color to be witnesses, if the injury he complains of has been committed by a white man, how many of his wrongs must remain unredressed; how many of his rights be violated with impunity; how poor a boon does he receive when he is receiving freedom, if what he receives can be called by that name. Unenviable as is the condition of the slave, unlovely as slavery is in all its aspects, bitter as the draught may be that the slave is doomed to drink, nevertheless his condition is better than the condition of the free man of color in the midst of a community of white men with whom he has no common interest, no fellow-feeling, no equality."

And it speaks to such with more pertinency than it did to those for whom it was written when it says:

"What, then, would be the condition of the community, with such a multitude of human beings turned loose in society, with all the habits, morals, and manners of the slave, with only the name and nominal privileges, but without any of the real blessings of liberty or the real privileges of the freeman? Would not two distinct classes of people in the same community array themselves against each other in perpetual hostility and mutual distrust? Would not the constant collision that would take place between them produce a feverish excitement, alike destructive to the happiness of both parties? Would not the condition of free people of color, under the operation of the causes already enumerated, be more wretched than the condition of the slaves? Would not the white portion of the community be more insecure with such a multitude among them, who had no common interest with, no bond of union to, that part of the community with whom they were mixed, and yet from whom they were forever separated by a mark of distinction that time itself could not wear away? The people of color, numerous as they would be, with no kindred feeling to unite them to that part of the community, whom they would both envy and hate, would nevertheless have at their command a portion of physical strength that might and probably would be wielded to the worst purposes. They would look across the southern boundary of the State, and there they would see in a state of servitude a people of their own color and kindred, to whom they were bound by the strong bonds of consanguinity, and with whom they could make a common cause, and would they not be strongly tempted to concert plans with them to exterminate the white man and take possession of the country? They would then possess the means of consulting together, of cooperating with each other, and let it not be forgotten that they would be animated by every feeling of the human heart that impels to action."

Our millions will not look across the boundary and behold a people of their color and kindred in bondage. In all the States of Central America, as in Mexico, the colored man is not only free, but a citizen in the full enjoyment of all the rights accorded to any man under his Government. But on this point I shall have a few words to say hereafter.

How blinded by the pride of caste were the authors of the address from which I make these extracts! How fatally did they ignore the fact that God had made all nations of one blood! It was not necessary that Tennessee should expatriate her laborers, or maintain slavery, or create in her midst so dangerous a class. It was open to that convention to avoid the great iniquity which, it appears, a majority of its members had predetermined, namely, the deprivation of the free colored man of the political rights he had enjoyed for forty years, and to have maintained the existing rights of those whose labor was giving consideration to the State and wealth to its people. But they had already forgotten the maxims of the fathers; and it will be well if we do not adopt their folly as our wisdom. Let us profit by their sad experience, and be warned by the voice of Jefferson, who exclaimed:

"With what execration should the statesman be loaded, who, permitting one half the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despots and these into enemies—destroys the morals of the one part, and the amor patriæ of the other!"

And let us remember, too, that a wiser than he has said—

"Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and write grievousness which they have prescribed; to turn aside the needy from judgment, and take away the right from the poor."

But plausible as were the reasons set forth in this address, its authors did not intimate to the people that even they doubted that the great wrong of slavery would soon disappear; and, as appears by pages 92 and 93 of the Journal, they further said:

"But the friends of humanity need not despair; the memorialists need not dread that slavery will be perpetual in our highly-favored country." * * * "Under the approving smile of Heaven, and the fostering care of Providence, slavery will yet be extinguished in a way that will work no evil to the white man, while it produces the happiest effects upon the whole African race."

* * * "Let it be remembered that there is an appropriate time for every work beneath the sun, and a premature attempt to do any work, particularly any great work, seldom fails to prevent success. A premature attempt on the part of a sick man to leave his bed and his chamber would inevitably prolong his disease, or perhaps place it beyond the power of medicine. A similar attempt on the part of the poor man to place himself in a state of independence, by engaging in some plausible but imprudent speculation, would probably involve him in embarrassment from which he could not extricate himself throughout the whole remaining portion of his life. So a premature attempt on the part of the benevolent to get rid of the evils of slavery would certainly have the effect of postponing to a far distant day the accomplishment of an event devoutly and ardently desired by the wise and the good in every part of our beloved country."

The sophisms of this report were not permitted to pass without notice. Stout old Matthew Stephenson, (for he was then in the fifty-eighth year of his age,) sustained by several of his associates, caused their protest to be entered on the journals. They said, among other things:

"We believe the principles assumed in the report, and the arguments used in their support, are in their tendency subversive of the true principles of republicanism, and before we can consistently give them our unqualified assent we must renounce the doctrine that 'all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' Above all, we believe the report is at variance with the spirit of the gospel, which is the glory of our land, the precepts and maxims of which are found in the Bible. One of its excellent rules is, 'As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.' Now, to apply this golden rule to the case of master and the slave, we have just to place each in the other's stead, then ask the question honestly, 'What would I that my servant, thus placed in power, should do unto me?'"

* * * "But we are told nature has placed on the man of color a mark of distinction which neither time nor circumstances can obliterate."

"We admit the fact, but are nevertheless unable to perceive in that a good reason for denying to them the common rights of man. The words of eternal truth are, that God has made of one blood all nations that dwell upon the earth, and the undersigned, in the language of Cowper, are unwilling to 'find their fellow-creatures guilty of a skin not colored like their own;' nor can we admit as just the rule that would assign to men their rights according to the different shades of color. In the opinion of the undersigned, all the evils so strikingly and so eloquently portrayed in the report, respecting the free people of color while among us, apply with equal, nay, with greater force to the same people while in slavery, unless, indeed, slavery gives dignity to man. And although the memorialists do not hint at retaining the people of color among us when free, but ask that some means be devised for their removal; nor would the undersigned be understood as advocating any system of emancipation unconnected with or without a view to their colonization; yet we believe they would be happier and safer subjects of our Government as free men than as slaves. As we hold it wise policy in every Government to make it the interest of all its subjects to support, defend, and perpetuate its civil institutions, is it reasonable to suppose that any would desire the permanent existence of that Government which denied to them all the rights of freemen? Solomon in his wisdom has said, 'Oppression makes a wise man mad.'"

Dr. Joseph Kincaid, of Bedford county, a native of Madison county, Kentucky, also prepared a protest against the doctrines of the address, and caused it to be entered on the Journals. From that protest I make but the following extract:

"Can the free man of color be torn from his wife and family and driven in chains to a foreign land and there sold in the market like a dumb brute to him who will give the greatest sum for him, though his heart bleeds and bosom yearns with bowels of compassion and paternal tenderness for the wife and children of his bosom, who are bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh? He cannot. Or can the children of the fond mother be torn from her bosom while her heart is wrung with distress, and she agonizes in despair and mourns for them, and will not be comforted, because they are not? This cannot be done. Then does this not sweeten the draught which the free man of color daily drinks? Most indubitably it does. Are those blessings secured to the slave? We have seen they are not. What is it, then, which constitutes the situation of the slave better than that of the free man of color? Does the superior happiness and comfort of the slave over that of the free man of color consist in the amount of bread and meat which he receives at the hands of his master to subsist him, which he has not to trouble himself about the procuring of? The report seems to predicate a good portion of the solid comfort of the slave upon the daily rations which he draws from his master's stores. But this conclusion the undersigned cannot subscribe to; as an American citizen he would put a higher estimate upon the liberty which is enjoyed even by the free man of color. What! will it be said that his rights, privileges, and happiness shall be balanced in the scale against the allowance of coarse fare which is given for daily subsistence to the slave, and the tattered garments that are furnished him to defend his body against the inclemency of the season, and the chains with which he may be bound in order to send him to a foreign market? Monstrous doctrine! Cannot the free man of color, with the labor of his hands, one sixth part of his time, procure as ample a supply of food and raiment as is furnished the slave? Yea, and can he not then sit down under his own vine, in the bosom of his family, and enjoy it, and there shall 'be none to disturb or make him afraid?'"

Nor did the controversy end here; for the committee made a supplementary report, and true-hearted old Matthew Stephenson and his associates entered their second protest on the journal of the convention.

In drawing the picture of the condition of the free man of color, the committee representing the majority of the convention evidently had in view what they intended to make his future and not his past condition in that State; for the convention, instead of providing for the abolition of slavery, threw around that institution an additional safeguard by providing that "the General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owner or owners;" and by a vote of 33 to 23 changed the language of the clause regulating the elective franchise from "freemen," as it had stood from the organization of the State, to "free white men," since which time the negro has had no voice or share in the management of the public affairs of that State. Thus South Carolina triumphed over freedom in Tennessee.

But to return to my line of argument, having wandered too far in this interesting digression.

Ample as this is, we do not depend on the action of the Congress of the Confederation, and of the Convention for framing the Constitution of the United States, and the provisions of the several State constitutions for all the proof the men of that period left that they recognized the right of man, by reason of his manhood, to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizenship. A long and uniform course of legislation relating to and regulating territory stretching from the lakes southward to the Gulf of Mexico, confirms the fact. Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, twice provided for the government of Territories, and under our present Constitution the Congress of the United States much more frequently. The distinguished men who occupied seats in those bodies prior to 1812 had not been enlightened by the sibylline mysteries given to the world in the celebrated letter of General Cass to Mr. Nicholson, nor by the doctrine of "popular sovereignty" so persistently reiterated by Douglas as his "great doctrine;" nor by Calhoun's theory, which was finally accepted as the cardinal, if not the sole doctrine of Democratic faith, that the flag of the United States, wherever it may be borne, on land or sea, carries with it and protects human slavery, as announced by Toombs in his Boston address of January 24, 1856. They knew that it was the duty of Congress, alike under the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution of the United States, to legislate for the Territories and provide governments for their regulation. The resolutions of the Congress of the Confederation for the temporary government of territory ceded by the individual States to the United States, adopted April 23, 1784, provided for the establishment of territorial governments by the "free males of full age;" and the famous Ordinance of July 13, 1787, for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, which repeals the resolutions of 1784, and the salient point of which was known first as the "Jefferson proviso," and later, in connection with the Oregon struggle, as the "Wilmot proviso," vested the right of suffrage in the "free male inhabitants of full age," with a certain freehold qualification. This Ordinance was re-enacted immediately after the adoption of our present Constitution, by the act of Congress of August 7, 1789; and in this respect was the precedent for every subsequent territorial act passed until 1812. The several acts passed from the foundation of the Government to that date, were as follows:

Under the Congress of the Confederation, those to which I have referred, namely, that of April 23, 1784, "for the temporary government of territory ceded or to be ceded by the individual States to the United States;" and that of July 13, 1787, "for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio."

And by the Congress of the United States since the adoption of the Constitution:

The act of August 7, 1789, already referred to as reenacting the Ordinance of 1787;

The act of May 26, 1790, for the government of the territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, under which, as we have seen, the State of Tennessee was organized;

The act of April 7, 1796, for the establishment of a government in the Mississippi territory;

The act of May 7, 1800, establishing Indiana Territory;

The act of March 26, 1804, for the government of Louisiana, which provided for a legislative council, to be appointed by the President of the United States, and not for an elective Legislature, as did all the rest;

The act of January 11, 1805, for the government of Michigan Territory;

The act of March 2, 1805, for the establishment of the Territory of Orleans; and

The act of February 3, 1809, for the government of Illinois Territory.

And in no one of these ten acts was any restriction placed on the right of suffrage by reason of the color of the citizen. In none of them was the word "white" used to limit the right to suffrage.

The next territorial act was that of June 4, 1812, providing for the government of Missouri Territory. More than twenty-two years had then passed since the adoption of the Constitution; and the men who had achieved our independence and fashioned our institutions in harmony with the fundamental truths they had declared, and who during this long period, more than the average active life of a generation, had resisted the aristocratic and strife-engendering demands of South Carolina, were rapidly passing, indeed most of them had passed, from participation in public affairs. Meanwhile, slavery had been strengthened by the unhappy compromise of the Constitution conceded to South Carolina and Georgia, by which "the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit" was permitted for the period of twenty years. Meanwhile, too, the people of the country, enjoying unmeasured and unanticipated prosperity, forgot that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and that "power is ever stealing from the many to the few;" and proud of their own achievements began to look with contempt upon the ignorant laborers they owned or employed, and their kindred newly imported from the coast of Africa; and began that long and rapid series of concessions to the fell spirit of slavery which made the present war inevitable, if free labor and the doctrine of a fair day's wages for a fair day's work were to be maintained in any part of the country. In the adoption of the territorial bill of 1812, South Carolina and slavery triumphed over freedom and the more powerful North, and the word "white," rejected in 1778 and thenceforth, was now inserted in the clause regulating suffrage in the fundamental law of a Territory.

Successful resistance to that innovation on well-established precedent would have secured freedom to Missouri, and in all probability averted the border wars of Kansas and the grander controversy in which we are engaged, and of which the Kansas feuds were but the sure precursor.

Can any candid man, in the face of this mass of concurrent evidence, assert that the fathers of our Government found in the fact of color cause for the denial of citizenship and the exercise of suffrage to any freeman? But more and if possible more pregnant proof on the point exists: not only did they assert the right of negroes to suffrage by rejecting the proposition of South Carolina in the Congress for framing Articles of Confederation, and protect it by the Constitution of the United States, and confirm it by twelve territorial laws; but, as I shall proceed to show, they, by express treaty stipulation, first with France and again with Spain, guaranteed them "the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States," and the "free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they professed." To show how unqualifiedly this was done under the administration of Mr. Jefferson, I beg leave to read a brief extract from that most interesting and instructive pamphlet, "The Emancipated Slave Face to Face with his Old Master," by J. McKaye, special commissioner from the War Department to the valley of the lower Mississippi, and also a member of the Freedmen's Inquiry Commission:

"The valley of the lower Mississippi, from an early period of its settlement, contained a proportionately large free colored population. In 1803, when the territory of which the State of Louisiana forms a part, was ceded by the French republic to the United States, these free colored men were already quite numerous, and many of them were possessed of considerable property. They were not only as free as any other portion of the population, but in general as well educated and intelligent. Many of them were the children of the early white settlers, and had always enjoyed a certain social as well as civil equality. As to the enjoyment of political rights under the old Spanish and French régimes, neither white nor black settlers ever had much experience; consequently there had never arisen among them much question of these rights, or as to whom they belonged. The French republic, founded on 'liberty, equality, fraternity,' had not yet quite forgotten the import of these words, and hence caused to be inserted in the treaty of cession a solemn stipulation in the words following, to wit:

"Art. 3. The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess."

The Floridas, though less populous than the Louisiana territory, had quite as large a proportionate part of negroes and mulattoes among their population. By the treaty of February 22, 1819, with Spain, she ceded to the United States "all the territories which belong to her, situated to the eastward of the Mississippi, known by the name of East and West Floridas." The sixth article of the treaty is as follows:

"The inhabitants of the territories which his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States by treaty shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the Federal Constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States."

My proposition is that the Government of the United States was instituted to secure the rights of all the citizens of the country, and not for the benefit of men of one race only, and I know not where to look for evidence that would strengthen the conclusiveness of the mass of proof I have thus adduced, embracing as it does the action of the framers of all the State constitutions but one, of the Congress for framing Articles of Confederation, of the Convention for framing the Constitution of the United States, the acts of Congress in unbroken series throughout the active life of a generation, and the solemn obligations assumed by the executive department of the national Government in the exercise of the treaty-making power. If other source of proof there be it can only serve to make assurance doubly sure.

Mr. Speaker, it is safe to assert that in every State, save South Carolina, and possibly Virginia and Delaware—in which two States the question of suffrage was regulated by statute and not by constitutional provision—negroes participated in constituting the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, and voted for members of the State conventions to which the question of its ratification was submitted; and as that Constitution contains no clause which expressly or by implication deprives them of the protecting power and influence of the instrument they participated in creating, I may well say that to secure internal peace by the establishment of political homogeneity, and perpetuate it by the abolition of political classes and castes whose conflicting rights and interests will provoke incessant agitation, and ever and anon, as the oppressed may be inspired by the fundamental principles of our Government, or goaded by wrongs excite armed insurrection, we need adopt no new theory, but accept the principles of our fathers, and administer in good faith to all men the institutions they founded on them.

As a step to this, my amendment proposes, not that the entire mass of people of African descent, whom our laws and customs have degraded and brutalized, shall be immediately clothed with all the rights of citizenship. It proposes only to grant the right of suffrage, inestimable to all men, to those who may be so far fitted by education for its judicious exercise as to be able to read the Constitution and laws of the country, in addition to the brave men, who, in the name of law and liberty, and in the hope of leaving their children heirs to both, have welcomed the baptism of battle in the naval and military service of the United States, and who are embraced by the amendment reported by the committee. This, I admit, will be an entering wedge, by the aid of which, in a brief time, the whole mass improved, enriched, and enlightened by the fast-coming and beneficent providences of God, will be qualified for and permitted to enjoy those rights by which they may protect themselves and aid in giving to all others that near approach to exact justice which we hope to attain from the intelligent exercise of universal suffrage and the submission of all trials of law in which a citizen may be interested to the decision of his peers as jurors.

I am, Mr. Speaker, under but one specific pledge to my constituents other than that which promised to vote away the last dollar from each man's coffer and the lastable-bodied son from his hearthside, if they should be needed for the effectual suppression of the rebellion, and that is, that I will in their behalf consent to no proposed system of reconstruction which shall place the loyal men of the insurrectionary district under the unbridled control of the wicked and heartless traitors who have involved us in this war, and illustrated their barbarity by the fiendish cruelties they have practiced on their loyal neighbors, negro soldiers and unhappy prisoners of war; and to that pledge, God helping me, I mean to prove faithful. The future peace and prosperity of the country demand this much at our hands. The logic of our institutions, the principles of the men who achieved our independence and who framed those institutions, alike impel us to this course, as necessary as it will be wise and just.

Let us meet the question fairly. Do our institutions rest on complexional differences? Can we cement and perpetuate them by surrendering the patriots of the insurgent district, shorn of all political power, into the hands of the traitors whom we propose to propitiate by such a sacrifice of faith and honor? Did God ordain our country for a single race of men? Is there reason why the intelligent, wealthy, loyal man of color shall stand apart, abased, on election day, while his ignorant, intemperate, vicious, and disloyal white neighbor participates in making laws for his government? What is the logic that denies to a son the right to vote with or against his father, because it has pleased Heaven that he should partake more largely of his mother's than of that father's complexion? And is it not known to all of us that well-nigh forty per cent. of the colored people of the South are children of white fathers, who, after we subjugate them, will with professions of loyalty only lip deep, enjoy the right of suffrage in the reconstructed States? Shall he, though black as ebony be his skin, who, by patient industry, obedience to the laws, and unvarying good habits, has accumulated property on which he cheerfully pays taxes, be denied the right of a voice in the government of a State to whose support and welfare he thus contributes, while the idle, reckless, thriftless man of fairer complexion shall vote away his earnings and trifle with his life or interests as a juror? Shall the brave man who has periled life, and mayhap lost limb, who has endured the dangers of the march, the camp, and the bivouac in defense of our Constitution and laws, be denied their protection, while the traitors in the conquest of whom he assisted enjoy those rights, and use them as instruments for his oppression and degradation? Shall he who, in the language of my amendment, may be able to read the Constitution of the United States, and who finds his pleasure in the study of history and political philosophy, whose integrity is undoubted, whose means are ample, be voiceless in the councils of the nation, and read only to learn that the people of free and enlightened America, among whom his lot has been cast, sustain the only Government which punishes a race because God in His providence gave it a complexion which its unhappy members would not have accepted had it been submitted to their choice or volition? And can he who will answer these questions affirmatively believe that Governments are instituted among men to secure their rights, that they derive their powers from the consent of the governed, and that it is the duty of a people, when any Government becomes destructive of their rights, to alter or abolish it, and establish a new Government? Sir, our hope for peace, while we attempt to govern two fifths of the people of one half of our country in violation of these fundamental principles, will be idle as the breeze of summer or the dreams of the opium eater.

In this connection let me call the attention of the House to a fact to which I have already invited that of many members and other distinguished gentlemen. By the census of 1860 it appears that South Carolina had but 291,300 white inhabitants, and 412,408 colored. Among the former we have no reason to know or believe that, since the death of Pettigrew, there is a single loyal man; while the latter, we have no reason to doubt, are all as loyal as Robert Small, the patriot pilot of Charleston harbor. Are we to declare that one white citizen of South Carolina is entitled to more weight in the councils of the nation than two citizens of a northern State; and are the 291,300 to be vested with the absolute government of 703,708? Is the entire loyalty of that State to be confided to the tender mercies of the chagrined and humiliated, but unconverted and devilish traitors of the State that engendered and inaugurated this bloody rebellion? And shall they who have fought for our flag, sheltered our soldiers when flying from loathsome prisons, guided them through hidden paths by night, saving them from starvation by sharing with them their poor and scanty food, and whose unceasing prayer to God has been for our triumph, be handed over to the lash, the iron collar, and the teeth of the blood-hound, to gratify our pride of race and propitiate our malignant foes?

Again, the census shows that Mississippi, in 1860 had but 350,901 white inhabitants, and 437,404 colored. Disloyalty was almost as prevalent among the white men of Mississippi as among those of South Carolina. But who has heard from traveler, correspondent, returning soldier, or other person, that he has found a colored traitor within the limits of that State? And shall we, ignoring our theory that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," say to the majority in these States, "Stand back! time and labor cannot qualify you to take care of yourselves? We spurn you for the service you have rendered our cause, and hand you over to the degradation, the unrequited toil, the slow but sure and cruel extermination which your oppressors in their pride and madness will provide for you?"

And mark you, Mr. Speaker, again, how nearly the races are balanced in Louisiana, Georgia, and Alabama. In Louisiana there are 357,456 whites and 350,546 colored people. Of whites in Georgia there are 591,550, and of colored people there are 465,736. In Alabama the whites number 526,271, while there are of colored 437,930. And in Florida there is the same near approach to equality of numbers, the white population being 77,747 and the colored 62,677. Are these people by our decree to remain dumb and voiceless in freedom? They are no longer slaves. War and the high prerogative of the President, called into exercise by the war, have made them free. Will you inflict upon them all the miseries predicted for the free colored people of Tennessee in the extract which I have read to you? No, rather let us bind them to our Government by enabling them to protect their interests, share its power, and appreciate its beneficence. This we can do, and the alternative is to so degrade them that they will prove an annoyance and an object of distrust to their white neighbors, an element of weakness to the Government, and a constant invitation to diplomatic intrigue and war by the ambitious man who dreams of a Latin empire in America, and who, following the example of the States of Central and South America, will accept the descendant of Africa as a Basque and a citizen of his proposed empire.

And here it may not be amiss to pause for a moment and contemplate some ulterior consequences of our action on this subject. Trained in the school of Democracy, I am a believer in the "manifest destiny" of my country. Having regarded the acquisition by Mr. Jefferson of the Louisiana territory as wise and beneficent, though unwarranted by the Constitution, beholding great advantages in the acquisition of Florida, and having believed that, without war, could we have patiently waited, Texas would have come to us naturally as a State or States of the Union, I am used to dreaming of the just influence the United States are to exercise, from end to end of the American continent. Among the most ephemeral products of our era will be the Franco-Austrian empire in Mexico, if we be true to our own principles in this season of doubt and perplexity. Our infidelity to principles alone can give it perpetuity. Within its limits the question of color is not a political or a social question; it is purely one of taste. There, as in Central and South America, the colored man is a freeman. And we are to determine whether the sympathies of these millions of people within our own borders are to be with the Government whose supremacy they have aided in reestablishing or with the wily and ambitious man who will pledge them citizenship on condition that they aid him in carrying the limits of his Latin empire to the northern boundary of the Gulf States of America. To them the United States or Mexico will be the exemplar nation of the world. Before her ruler laws all men are equal. Let ours be not less broad and just.

The tropical and malarious regions of Central America have, during the prevalence of slavery, seemed to be the natural geographical boundary of our influence in that direction. Tropical regions are not the home of the white man. They were not made for him. God did not adapt him to them. They are prolific in wealth, invite to commercial intercourse, yield many things necessary to the success of our arts and industry, and will one day afford a market for immense masses of our productions. But we cannot occupy them; we cannot develop their resources. Nor can the negro, in the ignorance and degradation to which we have hitherto doomed him. We have at length made him a soldier, and if need be he will carry our arms and our flag triumphantly over that to us pestilential region; and, if we make him a citizen; open to his children the school-house; give him the privilege of the workshop, the studio, the hall of science; admit him to the delights and inspirations of literature, philosophy, poetry—in brief, if we recognize him as a man and open to him the broad fields of American enterprise and culture, he will see that nature has given him the monopoly of the wealth of that region, and will bless the world by making himself the master of it. By this means, and this alone, can we extend our influence over that region, and prepare for the ultimate Americanization of those drained by the Orinoko, the Amazon, and the Parana. As a citizen, nature will prompt the colored man to achieve these grand results. But if we leave the race a disfranchised and disaffected class in our midst, numbering millions, and embracing hundreds of thousands of men who in pursuit of freedom have bared their breasts to the storm of battle, and who are no longer debarred by statute from access to the sources of thought and knowledge, they will, let me reiterate the fact, be a ready and powerful ally to any power that may be disposed to disturb our peace and that will promise them the enjoyment of the rights of men as accorded to every citizen by its Government.

But it may be said, "history vindicates your theory; our fathers did mean that the black man should be a citizen and a voter; to deny him his rights is illogical as you have suggested; it would be better to secure his loyalty to the Government by its even-handed justice, but such an act would exasperate the southern people, and we do not think it wise to do that; his race is inferior; and, in short, we will not do it." Who says his race is inferior? Upon what theater have you permitted him to exhibit or develop his power? Give him an opportunity to exhibit his capacity, and let those who follow you and have before them the results he produces in freedom judge as to his relative position in the scale of human power and worth. To whom and to what do you say the American negro and mulatto are inferior? Was our Government fashioned for the Caucasian alone? Will you, as Theodore Tilton well asked, exchange the negro for the Esquimaux, for the Pacific islander, for the South American tribes? Will you exchange our negroes for so many Mongolians, Ethiopians, American Indians, or Malays? I apprehend that the universal answer to these questions will be in the negative; because, oppress them as we may, we rate the American negroes as next to our own proud race in the scale of humanity. And shall we erect around our civilization, our privileges, and immunities, a more than Chinese wall? Shall America, proud of her democracy, become the most exclusive of all nations of the world? Or shall she carry her faith into her life and become the home of mankind, the empire of freedom, and, by her example, the reformer of the world?

Let us frankly accept Jefferson's test as to the right of suffrage, and give it practical effect. In a letter dated July 12, 1816, in discussing a proposed amendment to the constitution of Virginia, Mr. Jefferson said:

"The true foundation of republican government is the equal right of every citizen in his person and property, and in their management. Try by this as a tally every provision of our constitution and see if it hangs directly on the will of the people. Reduce your Legislature to a convenient number for full but orderly discussion. Let every man who fights or pays exercise his just and equal right in their election."—Jefferson's Works, vol. 7, page 11.

And again, in a letter written April 19, 1824, he said:

"However nature may, by mental or physical disqualifications, have marked infants and the weaker sex for the protection rather than the direction of Government, yet among men who either pay or fight for their country no line of right can be drawn."—Works, vol. 7, page 345.

And again, as if to show how well considered his opinion was, in the Notes on Virginia, speaking of the then constitution of that State, he said:

"This constitution was formed when we were new and inexperienced in the science of government. It was the first, too, that was formed in the whole United States. No wonder, then, that time and trial have discovered very capital defects in it:

"1. The majority of the men in the State who pay and fight for its support are unrepresented in the Legislature, the roll of freeholders entitled to vote, not including generally the half of the militia or of the tax-gatherers."—Works, vol. 8, page 359.

By adopting this sound test, which, be it remembered, was the only one recognized by the fathers, and adhering to it, our practice will harmonize with our theories, and the repugnance between the races will gradually disappear. Wealth and power conceal many deformities, and will make the black man less odious to all than he now seems. Thus will consistent adherence to principle give strength and peace to our country.

But if, on the other hand, we ignore the rights of these four million people and their posterity, the demon of agitation will haunt us in the future fearfully as it has in the past. The appeals of these millions for justice will not go forth in vain; and the liberal, the conscientious, the philanthropic, the religious, now that our Christian church recognizes her long off-cast child philanthropy, will be found in hostile array against what the commercial and planting interests will regard as the conservatism of the day; and though we find that we have buried the slavery question, our peace will be disturbed by the negro question constantly, and fearfully as it has been by the struggle between slavery and free labor. To which party ultimate victory would be vouchsafed in such a controversy I need not ask, as the nation acknowledges that God still lives and is omnipotent.

Again, such action is necessary to prevent the reestablishment of our old tormentor, slavery. It is hoped that the proposed amendment to the Constitution, forever prohibiting slavery, may be adopted. But it has not yet passed this House; and if it had, who can guaranty its adoption by three fourths of the State Legislatures? I hope and believe that that amendment will be adopted; but it is within the range of possibility that it may be defeated. And how, in that event, save by the suffrage of the colored man, by his right to protect himself, his power at the ballot-box, shall we prevent his subjugation, or the bloody war that such an attempt might provoke—the reenactment on the broader theater of our southern States of the terrible tragedies that ensued upon the attempt to again reduce to bondage the freed slaves of St. Domingo?

Let it be borne in mind that States within the Union determine through their organism who shall be citizens and under what condition the people may enjoy their rights, and that, if the proposed amendment to the Constitution fail by want of the approval of a sufficient number of the State Legislatures, and South Carolina, when readmitted should determine to reenslave her freed men, and they should resist by force, although they constitute so largely the majority of her people, it would be the duty of the Government to bring the naval and military power of the United States into action in support of the authority of the State, as it did to suppress the Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island and repel the invasion of Virginia by John Brown and his twenty-two undisciplined volunteers.

But gentlemen may say that we need not fear such an effort as this; that the humanity of the age will prevent it. The humanity of the age has not prevented similar outrages. Neither the humanity of the age, nor the prudence of the people of the South, nor their sense of justice, nor their love of country prevented a bloody war for the purpose of overthrowing democratic institutions and founding an empire, the corner-stone of which should be human slavery. Let us not, therefore, while it is in our power to embody justice in laws and constitutions, be content to rely upon man's abstract sense of justice or his love for his fellow-man. Every gentleman knows that it has been the usage of every slave State to reduce free men, women, and children to bondage. Did not New Jersey, so late as 1797—as appears from the State vs. Waggoner, 1 Halstead's Reports—hold that American Indians might be reduced to and held in slavery? Has it not been lawful in Virginia, as appears by her Revised Code and the Constitution of 1851, to apprehend and sell, by the overseers of the poor, "for the benefit of the LITERARY FUND," any emancipated slave that might remain within the State more than twelve months after his or her right to freedom had accrued? Has not South Carolina sold free colored citizens of Massachusetts into bondage, because she had torn them from the vessels on which they had entered her ports, imprisoned them and brought them, though accused of no criminal offense, under charges for jail fees which she had deprived them of the means of paying? And has not North Carolina, under her act of 1741, been in the habit of dooming to slavery the unoffending offspring of any white woman-servant and a negro, mulatto or Indian. How horrible must have been the crime of the infant born of a white mother and an Indian father that it should thus, by special statutory provision, be punished by life-long, unrequited servitude, and be made the progenitor of a race of slaves. How dark indeed must have been the African blood of the child whose mother was a white woman and whose father an American Indian!

I know not that the books, full as they are of such instances, furnish any more absolute illustration of the power of a State over its people than this. And yet other and grander illustrations of that power on this and cognate questions rush upon my memory. But a few years since, it was gravely proposed by the Legislature of Maryland to expel from the limits of that State some eighty thousand people, because they were of African descent. The act passed both branches of the Legislature and was referred to the people for popular sanction. And the main argument by which the proposition was defeated at the polls was the selfish one that the land of the white citizen would remain untillied if these laborers were driven from their homes. Had it been determined otherwise, the people or the Government of the United States could not have prevented the execution of the infamous decree, but could have been called to enforce it. A similar proposition, at a later date, found favor in Tennessee; but the lingering spirit of her earlier settlers rejected it upon the simple and higher ground of humanity. Yet had such a law been enacted, and had the free people of color resisted it with force, did not we and every man in the North stand pledged to sustain the Government in the use of the naval and military power in carrying it into execution? Dorr's rebellion, and the manner in which the United States Government suppressed it, have a place in the history of our country, and illustrate the working of our system of Government.

But why speak of unsuccessful propositions, about which perverse ingenuity may raise questions? Surely we have not forgotten the act by which the State of Arkansas summarily decreed the banishment of free negroes and mulattoes who had their homes in that State, and the enslavement of all such as might not be able to make their escape within the brief time allowed for the purpose. They numbered many thousands. Some of them had been given freedom by their fathers, whose lingering humanity would not permit them to sell the children of their loins. Others had earned their freedom by honest toil, by acts of patriotism, or by deeds of generous philanthropy, the requital of which had been the bestowal of the poor measure of liberty that the free negro might enjoy within the limits of that State. The act to which I refer is No. 151 of the acts of the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas for the session of 1858-59, and may be found on page 175 of the pamphlet laws of that session. It was approved February 12, 1859, and contains twelve sections. Time will not permit me to cite the whole of this iniquitous statute; but two sections I must give entire. Section first is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Arkansas, That no free negro or mulatto shall be permitted to reside within the limits of this State after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1860."

And the tenth section reads thus:

"Be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for any person hereafter to emancipate any slave in this State."

Could language or rhetoric give force and amplitude to these provisions? The intermediate sections provide for the arrest and sale of any free negro or mulatto over the age of twenty-one years who might be found within the limits of the State after the date indicated in the first section, and the disposition to be made of the funds arising from their sale. As a bribe to the people of the several counties of the State to see the law faithfully executed, the surplus of each sale, after deducting the costs, was to be paid into the county treasury. They provided also for the hiring of those free colored persons who were not twenty-one years of age, and for the sale of such of these hirelings as might be found within the limits of the State thirty days after the expiration of their term of service. When it is remembered that, by a reversal of the immemorial and universal presumption that man is free, it had been provided in this and all other slave States that the presumption that he was a slave arose from the fact that any measure of African blood flowed in a man's veins, and that it was the duty, not only of police and other officers, but of every citizen who found a person of African descent at large to arrest him and demand the evidence of his freedom, and, in default of the production thereof, to cast him into jail, and that for the jail fees thus accruing he might be sold, it will be seen how impossible it was for these poor and illiterate people to make their exit from that State and through those coterminous to it whose laws contained the same barbarous provisions.

The humanity of the act is embodied in the eleventh section, which provides for the support of "children under the age of seven years who have no mothers, and who cannot be put out for their food and clothing," and for "the aged and infirm negroes and mulattoes who may be ascertained to be incapable of leaving the State, or cannot be sold after being apprehended." Less merciful than Herod, the citizens of Arkansas did not slay all these innocent children, but with wise regard to the future welfare of the treasury of each county, having deprived them of the support their natural guardians and fond parents could and would have provided them, and having torn from the aged and infirm who were incapable of leaving the State, and "could not be sold," the stout sons or gentle daughters whose years would have been gladdened by toiling to sustain those weary and aged ones in their declining years, they made it the duty of the county courts to make provision out of the proceeds of the sale of the able-bodied for the support of those who they thus robbed of their natural support and protection, leaving the aged and infirm to travel rapidly toward paupers' graves, and the children to be sold into slavery as cupidity might bring purchasers to the almshouse. Let men no longer speak of the laws of Draco, but say that an American State has, in the infernal inhumanity of her legislation, exceeded in cruelty the despots of all nations and all ages. Had the colored people of Arkansas had the right of suffrage their party influence would have saved us the shame we feel as we contemplate this page of American history.

The possible repetition of such acts as these by the aristocracy of the old States, when they shall again be fairly in the Union, is not matter of speculation. The purpose is already avowed. I have myself heard it said by men, now professedly loyal, that the condition of the negro will be made more horrible as freemen than it has ever been in slavery; and they have said to me, "You know that where the laborers are ignorant and powerless, as these will be, the will of the employer is their supreme law."

Among the witnesses examined by the freedmen's inquiry commission was Colonel George H. Hanks, of the fifteenth regiment Corps d'Afrique, member of the Board of Enrollment, and superintendent of negro labor in the department of the Gulf. Colonel Hanks went to Louisiana as a lieutenant in the twelfth Connecticut volunteers, under General Butler, and was appointed superintendent of the contrabands under General Sherman. His testimony illustrates the fitness of the colored people for freedom, and proves the determination of their old masters that they shall never, by their consent, enjoy it. Thus he says:

"The negroes came in scarred, wounded, and some with iron collars round their necks. I set them at work on abandoned plantations, and on the fortifications. At one time we had six thousand five hundred of them; there was not the slightest difficulty with them. They are more willing to work, and more patient than any set of human beings I ever saw. It is true there is a general dislike to return to their old masters; and those who have remained at home are suspicious of foul play, and feel it to be necessary to run away to test their freedom. This year the dislike has very much lessened; they begin to feel themselves more secure, and do not hesitate to return for wages. The negroes willingly accept the condition of labor for their own maintenance, and the musket for their freedom. I knew a family of five who were freed by the voluntary enlistment of one of the boys. He entered the ranks for the avowed purpose of freeing his family. His name was Moore; he was owned by the Messrs. Leeds, iron founders; they resided within one of the parishes excepted in the proclamation of emancipation. He was the first man to fall at Pascagoula. Upon starting he said to his family 'I know I shall fall, but you will be free.'"

"A negro soldier demanded his children at my hands. I wanted to test his affection. I said 'they had a good home.' He said, 'Lieutenant, I want to send my children to school; my wife is not allowed to see them; I am in your service; I wear military clothes; I have been in three battles; I was in the assault at Port Hudson; I want my children; they are my flesh and blood.'"

Again:

"The colored people manifest the greatest anxiety to educate their children, and they thoroughly appreciate the benefits of education. I have known a family to go with two meals a day in order to save fifty cents a week to pay an indifferent teacher for their children."

After having spent nearly two years in daily intercourse with the planters in the department of the Gulf, Colonel Hanks, in his sworn testimony, says:

"Although they begin to see that slavery is dead, yet the spirit of slavery still lives among them. Many of them are even more rampant to enslave the negro than ever before. They make great endeavors to recover what they call their own negroes. One planter offered me $5,000 to return his negroes. They have even hired men to steal them from my own camp. (The old spirit still prominently to the old crime, which long ago was declared felony by the law of nations, if perpetrated in Africa.)"

"They yield to the idea of freedom only under compulsion. They submit to the terms dictated by the Government because obliged so to do. Mr. V. B. Marmillon, one of the richest and most extensive sugar planters in the whole valley of the Mississippi, took the oath of allegiance, but refused to work his own plantation unless he could have his own negroes returned to him. He had fourteen hundred and fifty acres of cane under cultivation; his whole family of plantation hands left him and came to New Orleans, reporting themselves to me. Among them could be found every species of mechanic and artisan. I called them up and informed them that the Government had taken possession of old master's crop, and that they were needed to take it off, and would be paid for their labor. All consented to return; but next morning when the time came for their departure, not one would go. One of them said, 'I will go anywhere else to work, but you may shoot me before I will return to the old plantation.' I afterwards ascertained that Marmillon, whom they called 'Old Cotton Beard,' had boasted in the presence of two colored girls, house servants, how he would serve them when he once more had them in his power. These girls had walked more than thirty miles in the night to bring this information to their friends."

Colonel Hanks adds:

"It is undoubtedly true that this year a change for the better seems to be taking place. In some parishes the letting of plantations to northern men has a powerful effect. The disposition of the planters, however, toward their old slaves, when they consent to hire them, is by no means friendly. I told a planter recently that it was the express order of General Banks that the negroes should be educated. He replied that 'no one should teach his negroes.'"

And he further declares it as his deliberate judgment that—

"If civil government be established here and military rule withdrawn, there is the greatest danger that the negro would become subject to some form of serfdom."

Mr. Commissioner McKaye, in his invaluable pamphlet, to which I have already referred, confirms the general correctness of the views of Colonel Hanks, and says they were concurred in by many other intelligent persons familiar with the subject, and that his own personal observation fully confirms them. He says:

"In a stretch of three hundred miles up and down the Mississippi, but one creole planter was found (there may, of course, have been others with whom I did not come in contact) who heartily and unreservedly adopted the idea of free labor, and honestly carried it out upon his plantation. And although he declared that, in itself, it was successful much beyond his expectation, yet, he said, 'my life and that of my family are rendered very unhappy by the opposition and contumacy of my neighbors.'

"The simple truth is, that the virus of slavery, the lust of ownership, in the hearts of these old masters, is as virulent and active to-day as it ever was. Many of them admit that the old form of slavery is for the present broken up. They do not hesitate even to express the opinion that the experiment of secession is a failure; but they scoff at the idea of freedom for the negro, and repeat the old argument of his incapacity to take care of himself, or to entertain any higher motive for exertion than that of the whip. They await with impatience the withdrawal of the military authorities, and the reestablishment of the civil power of the State, to be controlled and used as hitherto for the maintenance of what to them doubtless appears the paramount object of all civil authority, of the State itself, some form of the slave system.

"With slight modification, the language used recently by Judge Humphrey in a speech delivered at a Union meeting at Huntsville, Alabama, seems most aptly to express the hopes and purposes of a large proportion of the old masters in the valley of the Mississippi who have consented to qualify their loyalty to the Union by taking the oath prescribed by the President's proclamation of amnesty. After advising that Alabama should at once return to the Union by simply rescinding the ordinance of secession, and after expressing the opinion that the old institution of slavery was gone, Judge Humphrey says, 'I believe, in case of a return to the Union, we would receive political cooperation, so as to secure the management of that labor by those who were slaves. There is really no difference, in my opinion, whether we hold them as absolute slaves or obtain their labor by some other method. Of course we prefer the old method. But that question is not now before us.'"

To the same effect was the testimony of the late Brigadier General James S. Wadsworth, whose official tour through the valley of the Mississippi gave him ample means of arriving at an intelligent judgment:

"There is one thing that must be taken into account, and that is, that there will exist a very strong disposition among the masters to control these people and keep them as a subordinate and subjected class. Undoubtedly they intend to do that. I think the tendency to establish a system of serfdom is the great danger to be guarded against. I talked with a planter in the La Fourche district, near Tibadenville; he said he was not in favor of secession; he avowed his hope and expectation that slavery would be restored there in some form. I said, 'If we went away and left these people now do you suppose you could reduce them again to slavery?' He laughed to scorn the idea that they could not. 'What?' said I, 'these men who have had arms in their hands?' 'Yes,' he said; 'we should take the arms away from them, of course.'"

While we confront these facts, let me, Mr. Speaker, ask of you and the House whether we shall best consult our country's welfare by giving to the laboring people of the South the ballot by which they may protect themselves, and inspiring them with the hopes and disciplining them by the duties of citizenship, or by predetermining that ours shall be a military Government, and that the first-born son of every northern household shall be liable to pass his life in the Army, maintained to protect the aristocratic South against the maddened and degraded laborers whom she oppresses. It is we who are to decide this question; we who are to determine who shall select delegates to the conventions that are to frame the future constitutions of the insurgent States; we who are to say whether the constitutions which they will submit to us when asking readmission are republican in form, as required by the terms of the Constitution of the United States; and if we fail here, to our timidity, arrogance, prejudice, or pride of color will be justly attributable the conversion of our peaceful country into a military Power, and our democracy into an aristocracy. "We cannot escape history."

This is not mere idle fancy. Let us for a moment suppose, not what is alone within the range of possibility, but what is within the scope of probability; nay, what is almost certain to happen—that the two hundred and ninety-one thousand pardoned rebels of South Carolina should demand from their Legislature an act reducing to apprenticeship, serfdom, or other form of slavery, the four hundred and twelve thousand colored people of the State, or that they deny them all political rights, tax them without their consent, legislate, not for their welfare, but for their degradation and oppression. Composing this unrepresented mass would be those who have passed through General Saxton's schools and learned to read, those who by toil have earned the means to purchase at sales for taxes, or under the confiscation laws, a home and land; and others scarred and war-worn in the military or naval service of the country, who would hurry to and fro, rallying their friends to resist the outrage, and maintain their right to life, liberty, and property. Here would be the beginning of civil war; war in which we who believe in the doctrine of man's rights, that Governments are instituted to protect those rights, that they rest on the consent of the governed, and should be overthrown when they infringe those rights, would bid the insurgents God-speed. Ah! this we might do as men, as individuals; but as citizens of the United States what would be our duty and how must our power be exercised? The minority, though vested with political power, fearing the superior force of the majority, would, in the name of the State, appeal to us; and, repugnant as the duty might be, we would owe it to the sacred compromises of the Constitution to yield our pride, our conscience, our fidelity to God and man, and become again the protectors of slavery or the pliant instruments for reducing the majority of the people of the State into subjection to the arrogant aristocracy of South Carolina. In God's name let us, while we can, avert such a possibility. Let us conquer our prejudices. Let us prove that we are worthy of the heritage bequeathed us by our revolutionary sires. Let us show the world that, inheriting the spirit of our forefathers, we regard liberty as a right so universal and a blessing so grand that, while we are ready to surrender our all rather than yield it, we will guaranty it at whatever cost to the poorest child that breathes the air of our country.

But we owe a provision of this kind to another class of citizens than that of which I have been speaking. There are other loyal men than these in the South. Andrew Johnson, Horace Maynard, William H. Wisener, sr., John W. Bowen, W. G. Brownlow, though not alone in their loyalty, represent but a minority of the white people of Tennessee; and Thomas J. Durant, and Benjamin F. Flanders, and Rufus Waples, and Alfred Jervis have had thousands of adherents and coworkers among the whites of Louisiana; but they, too, are but a minority of the white people of that State. And as our armies go on conquering, we may learn that even on some hillside in South Carolina there have been men whose loyalty to the Union has never yielded. How shall these protect themselves in the reconstructed State? What millennial influence will induce the envenomed spirit of the majority of the people by whom they will be surrounded to treat them with loving-kindness or human justice? Who will go with them to the polls in their respective districts? Where will they find an unprejudiced judge and an impartial jury to vindicate their innocence when falsely accused or maintain their right to character and property? We must remember that it is the power and not the spirit of the rebellion we are conquering. Time alone shall conquer this. The grave, long years hence, will close over those who to the last day of their life would, were it in their power, overthrow the Government or revenge their supposed wrongs upon those who aided in sustaining it. The truly loyal white men of the insurrectionary districts need the sympathy and political support of all the loyal people among whom they dwell, and unless we give it to them we place them as abjectly at the feet of those who are now in arms against us as we do the negro whom their oppressors so despise. I cannot conceive how the American Congress could write a page of history that would so disgrace it in the eyes of all posterity as by consenting to close this war by surrendering to the unbridled lust and power of the conquered traitors of the South, those who, through blood, terror, and anguish, have been our friends, true to our principles and our welfare. To purchase peace by such heartless meanness and so gigantic a barter of principle would be unparalleled in baseness in the history of mankind.

This is felt in the South. The black man already rejoices in the fact that, if we are guilty of so great a crime as this, he will not be alone in his suffering; it will not be his prayers or his curses only that will penetrate the ear of an avenging God against those who had thus been false to all His teachings and every principle they professed. I find in the New Orleans Tribune of December 15, 1864, which paper, I may remark, is the organ of the proscribed race in Louisiana, and is owned and edited and printed daily in the French and English language by persons of that race, an admirable article in response to the question, "Is there any justice for the black?" which was drawn forth by the acquittal of one Michael Gleason, who had been tried for murder.

The crime was established beyond all peradventure. It was abundantly proven that the victim, Mittie Stephens, a colored boy, had been quietly sitting on the guards of the boat, watching the rod with which he was fishing, that other boys sat near him, when the defendant came behind him, leaned over, and deliberately pushed him into the water, and folding his arms on his breast stood and saw the boy rise thrice to the surface and then sink forever; that a colored woman exclaimed, "That is not right," and the defendant answered, "I would do the same to you;" and thus neither rescuing the child nor permitting others to do it, coolly and deliberately committed murder. There was no dispute as to any of the facts of the case. The New Orleans Era, noticing the case, says that it establishes the theory that "a man may, whenever he has no other way of amusing himself, throw a negro boy overboard from a steamboat, prevent any of his friends from rescuing the drowning struggler, stand quietly looking on while he goes to the bottom to rise no more, and be considered 'not guilty' of murder or any other crime;" and adds, having evidently hoped for better things under freedom than it had been used to in the days of slavery, "This is almost as enlightened a verdict as we were accustomed to in the palmy days of thuggery."

The colored editor of the Tribune avails himself of the case to point a moral, and well says:

"The trial by jury is considered as the safe-guard of innocence. It has been found that a man indicted for a criminal offense cannot be impartially tried and convicted, unless by his own peers. But an ex parte jury is the worst of all judicial institutions.

"The security afforded by the composition of a jury has to be of a twofold character. The jurymen have to represent the community at large in all its classes and varieties of composition. The duty of a jury is as well to vindicate innocence and punish crime as to protect the man unduly arraigned before the Court. Justice has to strike the culprit and avenge the blood of the innocent, as well as to defend the accused party against undue prejudices. Why have we no representatives in the jury? Are our lives, honor, and liberties to be left in the hands of men who are laboring under the most stubborn and narrow prejudice? Is there any protection or justice for us at their hands? It is in vain that, in the present instance, the press have so strongly supported the right. The wrong has been committed, and we are notified that there is no redress for us.

"But for every Union man in the city the last verdict is a warning. In the event—as impossible as it may appear—that rebel rule should temporarily be established here, we can foresee the fate of the friends of the Union. Then, there will be no more justice, no more protection for them than for the hated negro. It will be lawful to pierce them in the streets, drown them, kill them; and no jury will be found to convict the murderers. Let the Union men understand the case, and look to a complete reform in our laws relating to the formation of the jury."

The fate predicted to the real friends of the Union will be meted to them by the pardoned rebels, who will if we permit it rule them in the future as assuredly as it would if their military power should again possess the city.

Still comes the question, are these more than two fifths of the people of the insurrectionary district fit for citizenship? Let me reply by a question or two. Is the question of fitness put to the foreigner by the judge who administers the oath, the taking of which invests him with all the power of a native-born citizen and all its promises save one, that of the Presidency? Is the white native of our soil who, at the close of a reckless youth, the victim, perhaps, of early poverty and the degradation of parents, is unable to read his native tongue, when first he comes to the polls to deposit his ballot interrogated as to his fitness? Is it only to the wise, the learned, the powerful that we accord the right of suffrage? Are there not within the knowledge of each one of us scores of the children of this proscribed race who, in the conduct of their daily affairs, in the acquisition of property, in the tenderness and good judgment with which they rear their families, in the generosity with which they contribute to their church and the fidelity with which they obey her high behests, prove themselves infinitely better fitted for citizenship than the denizens of the swamp, Mackerelville, and other such reeking localities, who swelled the majority in the city of New York at the last election to thirty-seven thousand? And shall no culture, no patriotism, no wisdom, no tax-paying power, secure to the native-born American that which at the end of five years we, with so much advantage to our country, fling as a boon to every foreigner who may escape from the poverty and oppression and wrong of the Old World, to find a happier home and a more promising future in this? The question is not whether each man is fitted for the most judicious performance of the functions of citizenship, but whether the State is not safer when she binds all her children to her by protecting the rights of all and confiding her affairs to the arbitrament of their common judgment.

But colored people have shown themselves abundantly capable of self-government. Under oppressions exceeding in infinite degree those suffered by the oppressed people of Ireland—ay, by the subjects of the Czar of Russia—they have shown themselves capable of caring for themselves and others. Buying the poor privilege of providing for themselves by paying to their owners hundreds of dollars per annum, thousands of them have maintained homes and kept their families together, and reared their children to such an age that the lordly master, wanting cash for current purposes, has plucked the graceful daughter from her home to sell her to a life of debauchery, or the son, whose developing muscles promised support in age to his parents, to sell him to a life of unrequited toil. Snatched from these horrors a few thousands, some ten or twelve, have been sent during the last forty years to the western coast of Africa. There, under the auspices of American benevolence, they founded a republic, and with almost American greed for land have extended the jurisdiction of the little colony till the republic of Liberia, as I learn from the National Almanac, now embraces twenty-three thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine square miles. And the people have assimilated from among the heathens among whom they were settled men, women, and children, until their flag protects and their jurisdiction regulates four hundred and twenty-two thousand, most of whom, taught in the schools of the colony, find their enduring hopes in the old King James Bible, which they are able to read. But for our jealous contempt of the race, the flag of that African republic, so extensive has her commerce already become, would be familiar in all our leading ports. Our arrogance has hitherto excluded it; and by reason of our arrogance we pay tribute to our haughty commercial rival and treacherous friend Great Britain, by purchasing at second-hand from her the tropical products which the republicans of Liberia would gladly exchange directly with us for those of our more temperate region.

Fitted by culture and experience they may not be; but let us regard the characteristics of our civilization and see whether the future should, by reason of this fact, be made liable to such momentous consequences as would be involved in error on this point. The abundant proof is before us of their eagerness and ability to acquire information. We are equally able to provide them with the means of culture; and happily, the good people of the North, carrying the frame of the school-house and the church in the rear of each of our advancing armies, have shown themselves prompt to provide them with the means of instruction—to give to each and every one of them the keys to all knowledge in the mastery of the English language, the art of writing, and the elementary rules of arithmetic.

Though the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] insists that history is but repeating itself, I tell him that ours is a new age, and ask him to be kind enough to let me know who invented Hoe's "last fast printing-press" in the age in which it first existed, and by whose steam-engine it was propelled, and whether he edited the Express that fell in myriad thousands from its revolving forms? The limits of what former America did the magnetic telegraph traverse, making man, even the humblest, well-nigh omnipresent within its limits? In what antique age and country, broad as ours, was distance reduced as it is, by the locomotive engine in this? From among the hidden treasures of what buried city, or from the printed pages of what lost nation, did John Ericsson steal the subtle thoughts with which he has blessed the world and which we credit to him as inventions? In what era, will the gentleman tell me, did a nation convert by the stroke of a pen and the act of occupancy its landless and destitute people into independent farmers and pillars of the State by a homestead law such as that by which we offer estates to the emigrant and the freedman? If history be but repeating herself, will the gentleman point me to the original of the American Missionary Society, and show me from experience what influence its labors are to have upon those whom we have hitherto doomed to the darkness of ignorance? Whence did the founders of the American and other Tract Societies borrow the idea of their great enterprise? From what age or what clime comes our common school system? And what chapter of human history did they reenact who founded the American Sunday School Union? Will the gentleman draw from his historic stores a sketch of the influence that institution alone is to have in developing and training the intellect and regulating the life of the freedmen and the "poor white trash," now that rebellion has opened the way to the teacher, the daily journal, and the printed volume to their firesides? In what ample depository did its ancient prototype conceal the stereotype plates for more than a thousand books that it so cheaply published, imparting many of them in the simplest sentences, and others in those of Bunyan, Milton, Heber, Cowper—the poets, preachers, philosophers, historians of all Christian countries—the thought and knowledge time has garnered?

No, Mr. Speaker, history is not repeating itself. We are unfolding a new page in national life. The past has gone forever. There is no abiding present; it flies while we name it; and, as it flies, it is our duty to provide for the thick-coming future; and with such agencies as I have thus rapidly alluded to, we need not fear that even the existing generation of freedmen will not prove themselves abundantly able to take care of themselves and maintain the power and dignity of the States of which we shall make them citizens.

We are to shape the future. We cannot escape the duty. And "conciliation, compromise, and concession" are not the methods we are to use. These, alas! have been abundantly tried, and their result has been agitation, strife, war, and desolation. No man has the right to compromise justice; it is immutable; and He whose law it is never fails to avenge its compromise or violation. Ours is not the work of construction, it is that of reconstruction; not that of creation, but of regeneration; and, as I have shown, the principle of the life we are to shape glares on us, lighting our pathway, from every page of history written by our revolutionary fathers. Would we see the issue of "compromise, concession, and conciliation?" Sir, we behold it in the blazing home, the charred roof-tree, the desolate hearthside, the surging tide of fratricidal war, and the green mounds beneath which sleep half a million of the bravest and best loved of our men.

South Carolina, representing slavery, demanded the insertion of the word "white" in the fundamental articles of our Government. Our fathers resisted the demand; and, as I have suggested, had their sons continued to do so, slavery had long since been hemmed in as by a wall of fire; its true character would have been known among men, for then would the freedom of discussion not have been assailed, and men been legally punished by fine and imprisonment, and lawlessly by scourging and death, for speaking of its horrors. And by resisting this demand, as I have shown, man was accorded his right in the Territories till 1812. Then our fathers yielded, and without tracing the rapid retrograde career which ensued, we find the results of conceding and compromising principle in the attempt to abandon justice as established by the fathers, and settle a Territory under the conflicting theories of Cass and Douglas, and of Calhoun and Jefferson Davis—the two former striving to establish slavery under phrases full of professed devotion to freedom; the latter proclaiming boldly, through the lips of Robert Toombs, that "Congress has no power to limit, restrain, or in any manner to impair slavery; but, on the contrary, it is bound to protect and maintain it in the States where it exists and wherever its flag floats and its jurisdiction is paramount." (Boston Address, January, 1856.)

We can trace the influence of compromise and concession again in its effects upon the constitution of States. Behold the colored and white voters mingling peaceably at the polls in North Carolina, Maryland, Tennessee, and other slave States, and run the downward career until, at the dictation of South Carolina and slavery, you find States which have become free by constitutional amendment and others which never tolerated slavery yielding to their demand to insert the word "white" in their constitutions, and so creating a proscribed class in their midst; others even denying a dwelling place upon His footstool within their limits to the children of God whose skins were not colored like their own; and finally Arkansas writing a chapter of history which redeems Draco's name from the bad preeminence it had so long borne. Triumphant wrong is ever aggressive, has ever been, will ever be. Look back also upon our churches, practically ignoring for half a century the existence of nearly four million people who were held in contempt of every one of the beatitudes, and compelled to live in violation of every clause of the decalogue, and whose existence made the utterance of the Lord's prayer seem, to foreigners who comprehended the wrongs of slavery, like a hideous mockery as it dropped from American lips.

And these results, be it remembered, did but express the influence which aristocratic and dictatorial South Carolina, whose spirit now possessed the entire South, had, through compromise, concession, and conciliation, produced upon the mind and heart and conscience of the American people. Let me illustrate this by one striking example. While yet Missouri was a Territory—seven years, however, after the South had been made imperious by her triumph in inserting the word "white" in the territorial law for Missouri, and while she was busy fashioning that great State north of the Ohio line into the future home for slavery—the abolition of the institution was being agitated in Maryland as well as in Tennessee. Notwithstanding the recent triumphs of slavery it was still possible for a man to oppose the spread of the institution, point out its atrocities, and favor its abolition, and yet look for preferment and honor at the hands of his fellow-citizens; and when Jacob Gruber, a Methodist clergyman, was indicted by the Frederick county court, of Maryland, on the charge of "attempting to excite insubordination and insurrection among slaves," Roger B. Taney stepped forth to defend him, and in the course of his argument used the following language:

"Mr. Gruber did quote the language of our great act of national independence, and insisted on the principles contained in that venerated instrument. He did rebuke those masters who, in the exercise of power, are deaf to the calls of humanity; and he warned them of the evils they might bring themselves. He did speak with abhorrence of those reptiles who live by trading in human flesh, and enrich themselves by tearing the husband from the wife, the infant from the bosom of the mother; and this I am instructed was the head and front of his offending. Shall I content myself with saying he had a right to say this? There is no law to punish him? So far is he from being the object of punishment in any form of proceedings, that we are prepared to maintain the same principles, and to use, if necessary, the same language here in the temple of justice, and in the presence of those who are the ministers of the law. A hard necessity, indeed, compels us to endure the evils of slavery for a time. It was imposed upon us by another nation while we were yet in a state of colonial vassalage. It cannot be easily or suddenly removed. Yet while it continues, it is a blot on our national character, and every real lover of freedom confidently hopes that it will be effectually, though it must be gradually, wiped away, and earnestly looks for the means by which this necessary object may be attained. And until it shall be accomplished, until the time shall come when we can point without a blush to the language held in the Declaration of Independence, every friend of humanity will seek to lighten the galling chain of slavery, and better to the utmost of his power the wretched condition of the slave. Such was Mr. Gruber's object in that part of his sermon of which I am now speaking. Those who have complained of him and reproached him will not find it easy to answer him, unless complaints, reproaches, and persecution shall be considered an answer."

But under the influence of the doctrine of "conciliation, concession, and compromise," the author of this language soon learned that for an ambitious man these brave and good words were folly and madness. Pure in his personal life, beautiful in the relations that characterized his family and his social circle, his history will never be forgotten; his name will ever head the list of "ermied knaves." Thirty-eight years after the Gruber case, in the chief temple of justice of our country, in the presence of her ministers, of whom he was himself the chief, when speaking of the free colored men of New England and those of their race throughout the country, he declared, in violation of all truth, that—

"The legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument."

"It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion in relation to that unfortunate race which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken."

"They had for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect."

Mr. Speaker, shall we in providing for the reconstruction of the Union, accept and proclaim as our faith the hideous dogma that four millions of our people have "no rights which the white man is bound to respect," or, in the very hour in which our arms are breaking the power of the rebellion, make any concession to the spirit that evoked it? South Carolina may shake her gory locks and bloody hands at us in impotent rage; but let us not quail before her now as we have done for the last half century. Through the lips of northern "Sons of Liberty" and members of the order of "American Knights," she demands that, as a graceful concession, we shall comply to-day with the proposition our forefathers rejected on the 25th of June, 1778, and insert the word "white" in the fundamental law of the land; on the other hand, the shades of our patriot fathers, humanity, the spirit of the age, the welfare of the nation, the hopes of the countless millions who will throng our country through the long ages, implore us to listen to the voice of justice and obey the injunctions of the Master, who has assured us that "inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Let not, I pray you, the South achieve her grandest triumph in the hour of her humiliation. Let not the spirit of a prostrate foe practice on our pride and prejudice, and exult through all time over a lasting victory. Peace is the offspring and handmaid of Justice, and let us in reconstructing the Union erect a temple in which she may abide for ever.

Mr. STILES. Mr. Speaker, I did not desire to interrupt my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] in the delivery of his carefully prepared speech. It would have marred its beauty and power. But if I understand him correctly he stated that prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1838, negroes enjoyed the right of suffrage in the State of Pennsylvania. My question is, whether the constitution or laws of that State gave them such a right; and further, whether they ever did exercise such a right; whether he does not know that by the decision of the highest courts of that State they were not allowed to vote there.

Mr. KELLEY. They were allowed by the constitution to vote, and they did vote; and it required a constitutional amendment—the insertion of the word "white" in the clause regulating suffrage—to deprive them of that right.

Mr. STILES. I desire to ask my colleague further, when and in what portion of the State of Pennsylvania they ever exercised that right.

Mr. KELLEY. Why, I have seen them exercise it frequently at the polls in Philadelphia, and that, too, whether the election officers belonged to one party or the other.

Mr. STILES. That must have been confined to my colleague's own precinct. It was never known in the history of that State.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to say that it was done throughout the State, and was in some instances made the subject of litigation.

Mr. STILES. It was never done except in one county—the county of Bucks—so far as I know and then only in one instance.

I desire further to ask my colleague in this connection, because his speech has tended toward universal equality, whether he is in favor of giving negroes universally the right of suffrage now.

Mr. KELLEY. I am in favor of giving that right, in the words of Jefferson, to "every man who fights or pays." I stand by the doctrine of Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Democratic party, in which I was trained.

Mr. STILES. In the event of the passage of the amendment to the Constitution proposed, is my colleague in favor of equality between the races? And will he regard negroes as equal to the white man?

Mr. KELLEY. I could not possibly regulate the equality of men. I cannot make my colleague so moral or intelligent as a man of darker complexion who is more moral and more intelligent; nor could I degrade my colleague to the level, in morals and intelligence, of the colored man who is less moral or less intelligent than he. My colleague does not, according to his theory, vote by reason of his intelligence, but simply by reason of his color. I might be willing to exclude from the privilege of voting an immoral or a voluntarily ignorant man; but I want no senseless rule that allows a fool or a scoundrel to vote if he be white, and excludes a wise and an honest man if he be black.

Mr. STILES. Mr. Speaker, the remarkable speech just delivered appeals to passion and not to judgment, and is in favor of a principle that in years hence will be regarded as the height of the fanaticism of these days. The right of negroes to become voters, jurors, and in all respects equal with the white man, is the favorite theory of the times and of the party in power. The day will come when the men who avow such principles will be condemned by the popular voice everywhere.

Mr. ELIOT obtained the floor, but yielded for the transaction of the following business:

Mr. COWAN presented the memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying that provision be made for the levying of such duties upon all vessels engaged in foreign commerce from our ports as shall justly distribute the burden of maintaining our light-houses, buoys, and beacons among the parties enjoying their benefits, and shall relieve the public Treasury from their expense; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of the local board of steamboat inspectors of Oswego, New York, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, presented the petition of the Western Associated Press praying for a removal of the duty on foreign printing paper; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FARWELL presented a letter of Captain John A. Webster, jr., commanding the United States steam-cutter Mahoning, in relation to the substitution of whistles for fog bells; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of officers of the twentieth Maine volunteers, praying for an increase of the compensation of military officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. DAVIS presented the petition of William Hutchinson, praying for compensation for service rendered as a spy in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of Nott & Co., praying to be indemnified for the loss of four boxes of specie shipped by them at Hong Kong in the schooner Eteva, and seized and plundered by pirates on the 18th of October, 1857, out of the unappropriated balance of the fund obtained from the Chinese Government under the treaty negotiated at Shanghai, November 8, 1858; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of officers of the fortieth Massachusetts regiment, praying for an increase of the compensation of military officers; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders on the active list of the Navy, praying for a restoration of the pay allowed to their respective grades and ranks prior to the breaking out of the present rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a law to secure a republican form of government and to abolish and forever prohibit slavery in the United States; which was referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the memorial of the Board of Trade of the city of Boston, in which they set forth that it is believed that debts amounting from one hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars are due to parties in the North from individuals in the rebel States, that during the past four years there has been no opportunity to press these claims for settlement in local courts; and that if the bankrupt bill now before Congress shall become a law before these creditors can come in contact with their debtors, and take personal measures to collect their dues, the rights of such creditors will be seriously prejudiced, and that many estates will be closed up in bankruptcy at a loss to all concerned. They accordingly pray Congress to postpone the passage of the bankrupt bill until such time shall have elapsed after the restoration of the revolted States as shall give to northern creditors an opportunity to negotiate with their debtors in those States for the adjustment of their claims. In offering this memorial, sir, I desire to say that while concurring with the memorialists in the desire to protect the interests of northern creditors, I am not sure that it is necessary that we should follow precisely their suggestions. I am not sure that those interests may not be adequately protected without any postponement of the pending bankrupt bill. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to present the memorial of William A. Hammond, late Surgeon General of the United States Army, stating that he has been deprived of his commission as Surgeon General and prohibited from holding office under the Government of the United States by the sentence of a general court-martial under circumstances which he prays Congress to inquire into before confirming the appointment which has been made of his successor. The memorial sets forth, with brevity to be sure, certain proceedings in his case before a court-martial of which he complains, and he alleges justly complains. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I present two remonstrances from citizens residing in Alexandria against memorials recently presented to the Senate for the substitution of military authority in the place of the State government of Virginia. These memorialists earnestly but respectfully insist that to ignore the restored government now would be to produce general and as they fear remediless confusion in their midst, by retarding or preventing the administration of justice and the protection of the rights of persons and property; that the adoption of such a policy would subject loyal and Union-loving citizens to numberless useless and vexatious annoyances, and that it would crush the hopes of thousands of devoted Unionists throughout Virginia, who look to this restored government as the nucleus of a sound, patriotic, and vigorous State organization, under which the masses of the people of the beloved old Commonwealth of Virginia will again rally around the flag of our glorious Union. They say further:

"By all who are thoroughly informed in regard to the secret sentiments of the masses of the people of Virginia, the plan of bringing back the whole of Virginia to the Union by the election of Senators and Delegates to the Legislature of the restored government as fast as the constituent bodies are assured of efficient protection by the Federal Government is regarded as wise and eminently practicable."

"Your memorialists are deeply grieved and mortified by a manifestation on the part of some of the members of your honorable body to ignore the existence of the loyal government of Virginia; to do this will be to reduce the loyal citizens of this Commonwealth to the condition of vassals of a military satrap, and subject men who have freely devoted their lives and fortunes to the cause of their country in the first and darkest hour of the nation's peril, to the mortification of being confounded with the traitors who have disturbed the peace, retarded the prosperity, and aimed a paralytic blow at the very existence of the Union.

"In view of these facts your memorialists respectfully and earnestly pray that Congress will take no action tending to destroy or weaken the restored government of Virginia."

I do not remember, sir, to what committee the memorials to which this remonstrance relates were referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that they were referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. WILLEY. I ask that these may take the same direction; and I also present another memorial of the same character and to the same effect numerously signed by citizens of Loudoun county, Virginia.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Territories.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. BUCKALEW, it was Ordered, That Mary F. B. Zevely have leave to withdraw her petition and papers.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 514) to amend an act to extend the charter of the Alexandria and Washington railroad, passed March 3, 1863, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. R. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 91) in relation to the treaty of 1817, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 15th of December, 1864, a report from the Secretary of State relative to an arrangement between the United States and Great Britain relating to the naval force to be maintained upon the American lakes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a petition of real estate agents in Albany, New York, praying that there be refunded to them a proportionate part of the tax paid by them as commercial brokers under the internal revenue act of 1862, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jane G. Swissheim, praying that provision may be made for the employment of women as corresponding, recording, and copying clerks in the Departments, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, there being no law to prevent their employment; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 121) granting additional compensation to the employees of the two Houses of Congress; reported a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, and the report was concurred in.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of Catharine S. B. Spear, praying for an appropriation to establish a house for dependent and friendless children, to be designated a House of Refuge for the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of State:

To the Senate of the United States:

The Secretary of State, to whom has been communicated a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, in the words following: "Resolved, That the Secretary of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General, be each directed to inform the Senate what amount was paid or allowed in his Department for attorneys or counsel fees of every kind and description, exclusive of the regular salaries paid to the Attorney General and the respective district attorneys during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, and, so far as practicable, from that period to the 1st of January, 1865, giving a list of the names of the persons employed, the amount paid each, and out of what fund, and the services for which those fees were paid;" has the honor, by permission and under the orders of the President, to submit a full statement in answer thereto.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As I presume answers will soon be received from the other Departments to that resolution, and it would be desirable to have them all printed together, I move that this communication lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the resolution (S. R. No. 91) appointing Richard Delafield to be a regent of the Smithsonian Institution, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage; and I ask that it be put on its passage at once, as it is desirable to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of General Totten.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 399) amendatory of the act of August 1, 1854, in relation to George Morell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 400) to regulate the management of captured and abandoned property in the rebel States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 96) in relation to the treatment of prisoners of war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 401) to amend the judicial system of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In introducing this bill I desire to say that I introduce it with the view of bringing the subject before the Senate and the country, but without being understood as committed to the particular bill. Some legislation is needed in regard to the judicial system of the United States. The amount of business accumulating in the Supreme Court amounts almost to a denial of justice, and some legislation is necessary, and will become more necessary as the business accumulates in that court, to relieve it. This bill is designed to change the judicial system to a very great extent by abolishing the district courts and substituting a circuit court, having the jurisdiction of the present district and circuit courts, and also having an intermediate court of appeal in each judicial circuit of the United States. As I said, I do not consider myself as committed to the bill by its introduction. It has been drawn by another. It is an important subject; and I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That three thousand copies of the Navy Register for 1864 be printed for the use of the Senate.

MARYLAND COLORED REGIMENTS.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to send to the Senate the originals or copies of the rolls of such of the regiments as have been raised in the State of Maryland in the present year, which were composed, in whole or in part, of those who were at the time of their enlistment, or draft, slaves.

DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to the Senate the expense of all kinds for maintaining the jail in the District of Columbia for the years 1863 and 1864, with the number of prisoners supported.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT CORRUPTIONS.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate No. 34 be amended by adding thereto these words: A committee for the investigation of the corruptions of the Government in all its departments and offices, to consist of five members.

I propose to let this resolution lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It lies over under the rule, being equivalent to notice on this day.

JACOB WEBER.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 203, for the relief of Jacob Weber.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs that there be paid to private Jacob Weber, of the fourth regiment of Ohio volunteer infantry, the sum of $913 33, to reimburse him for money advanced by him to pay Scott Allen, A. Hyatt, Henry Olden, A. W. Cook, Lewis Shiridollar, and James Garland, who were employed as teamsters for that regiment between the 1st of August, 1861, and the 1st of July, 1862, and received the price of their employment from him, who advanced it, on the quartermaster's certificates, to those employés, with the assurance of the quartermaster and the commander of the regiment that the amount so advanced would very soon thereafter be repaid and refunded to him by the Government, through the quartermaster.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSMISSION OF PERIODICALS BY MAIL.

Mr. COLLAMER. There are a couple of bills on the Calendar in relation to the Post Office Department, to which, at this stage of the session, I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate. I move, if it be necessary, to dispense with all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 623.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864. It proposes to amend the fourth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864, so as to insert in the proviso in that section, after the word "newspapers," the words "periodicals, magazines, and exchanges;" so that it will read:

Provided, That this section shall not be held to extend to the transmission by mail of newspapers, periodicals, magazines, and exchanges from a known office of publication to bona fide subscribers, not exceeding one copy to each subscriber from any one office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT CLERKSHIPS.

Mr. COLLAMER. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 389.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 389) relating to clerkships in the Post Office Department. The bill proposes to amend the third section of an act of Congress making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1854, approved March 3, 1853, so as to authorize the appointment of a chief clerk in the offices of each of the three Assistant Postmasters General, at a salary of $2,000 per annum each.

The second section proposes to authorize the Postmaster General, in lieu of the temporary clerks now employed in the Post Office Department and paid out of the appropriation for postage stamps and stamped envelopes and the proceeds of sales of waste paper, to appoint two clerks of class three, two clerks of class two, and five clerks of class one.

The third section appropriates the sum of $18,000 to pay the clerks provided for in the two preceding sections.

The fourth section appropriates the sum of $6,000 for the payment of such temporary clerks as the Postmaster General may, from time to time, deem necessary.

The fifth section provides that unclaimed money in dead letters for which no owners can be found, and also all money derived from sales of waste paper or other public property in post offices or the Post Office Department, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, under the direction of the Postmaster General, for the service of the Post Office Department; and any postmaster or clerk in a post office, or any other clerk, officer, or agent of the Post Office Department, having temporary custody of such money, and failing to deposit it as herein provided, is to be deemed to be guilty of felony, and be subject to a fine not exceeding double the sum so retained by such clerk or other agents, or imprisonment not exceeding three years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House (H. R. No. 96) providing for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854, between the United States and Great Britain.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 163) for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) providing for the termination of the reciprocity treaty of the 5th of June, 1854, between the United States and Great Britain.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1865, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, of Pennsylvania, Mr. GEORGE E. PENDLETON, of Ohio, and Mr. EDWIN H. WEBSTER, of Maryland, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending 30th of June, 1865; and

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. BUCKALEW.

ISAAC R. DILLER.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 94, for the relief of Isaac R. Diller.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Isaac R. Diller, late consul at Bremen, the sum of $3,655.55, in full for the expenses incurred by him for extra clerk hire in his office, and for moneys advanced to destitute American citizens during the interval between the 1st of August, 1857, and the 20th of September, 1861.

The Committee on Claims reported the bill with an amendment to strike out in lines six and seven the words "six hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty-five cents;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Isaac R. Diller, late consul at Bremen, the sum of $3,000, &c.

Mr. HALE. Is there a report in that case? If there is I should like to hear it.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the reading of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon it.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate rejected this bill once I think.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There does not seem to be any report accompanying the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the reading of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the same claim. It is among the papers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There does not seem to be any report here.

Mr. DAVIS. I sent it up with the papers the other day. I will ask that the bill be informally laid aside until the report can be found.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That course will be pursued if there be no objection.

INVENTORY OF ARTICLES IN ARSENALS.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up Senate joint resolution No. 90.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) to authorize and direct an inventory of articles in the arsenals of the United States, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia with an amendment to strike out all of the original resolution after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to cause, as soon as may be after the passage of this resolution, an inventory to be made of all the articles pertaining to the quartermaster's department now in each and all of the arsenals of the United States.

And insert in lieu thereof:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to cause a strict inspection to be made of the quartermaster's department as soon as practicable after the passage of this resolution, and a comparison to be made between the reports of the officers in charge of the quartermasters' depots at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Louisville, and the articles actually on hand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I think it would be well to amend the resolution by making it incumbent on the Secretary of the Navy to cause a like inventory to be taken of all the property in the possession of the several naval storekeepers; and I will mention in this connection that I was informed by a gentleman who had been employed by the Navy Department to investigate some of these transactions that it has not been the custom when a new naval storekeeper was appointed for him to give any receipt to the one who went out or to take any account at all. I move to amend the resolution by adding a section that the Secretary of the Navy be in like manner directed to take an inventory of all the property in the possession of the several naval storekeepers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that there is any objection to that amendment, though I would prefer to have it by itself. This is a simple proposition to take an account of stock in the quartermaster's department at the various depots at New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Louisville. It certainly can do no harm, and we cannot be too careful what we are about.

Mr. HALE. I have reduced the amendment to writing, and offer it in this form:

And be it further resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy, in like manner, be directed to take an inventory of all the property of the United States in possession of the several naval storekeepers of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read, "A joint resolution to authorize and direct an inventory of articles in the quartermasters' depots of the United States, and in the offices of the naval storekeepers of the United States."

QUOTAS OF THE STATES.

Mr. WILSON. I now move to take up a resolution introduced the other day by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. RIDDLE] and reported yesterday by the Military Committee with an amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. RIDDLE on the 13th instant, calling for a statement of the number of soldiers and sailors furnished by the several loyal States under the President's call of July 18, 1864.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia was to strike out all of the resolution after the word "resolved," and to insert in lieu thereof:

That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate what number of soldiers and sailors, stating each separately, the several States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, have furnished the Army and Navy under all the calls heretofore made, setting forth the number demanded and the number furnished under each call.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to add, "and the time for which the same were enlisted."

Mr. GRIMES. I move to postpone the further consideration of the resolution until two weeks from to-day. My purpose in making the motion is to obtain if possible an answer to an inquiry addressed to the Secretary of War a few days ago by the Senate, attempting to elicit from him some information as to the principle and manner in which naval credits were allowed. It will be observed, on reading this resolution, that it calls on the Secretary of War to state the number of naval recruits, as well as soldiers, that have been credited upon the military quotas of the different States. I think the fact will be developed by the return that will be sent to the Senate from the Secretary of War to the other call to which I have alluded, that these naval credits have been very unjustly distributed. I understand it to be a fact that it was decided at the War Department, by the officer who had charge of that subject, that the credits should be allowed to the location where the person was recruited, unless some other locality should intervene and show that those credits ought to belong to that other locality. For example, a receiving-ship is stationed in the harbor of New York or Boston, and it is the only place where in either of the States of New York or Massachusetts enlistments can be made. There may be ten thousand men recruited in Boston and fifteen thousand in the city of New York, and under the interpretation that was given to the law by the officers in the War Department, all those men would be credited to the locality where that receiving-ship was, the ten thousand to Boston and the fifteen thousand to New York, though they might have come from the outlying townships. It thus threw the burden of proof on those outlying townships where the men actually resided to show that those individuals did reside there, and were not citizens of the place where the enlistments were made. They were from interior States also, for, as is known to everybody who is familiar with the sailors of the country, very many of them were from such States as Vermont and New Hampshire, who went in their youth to the sea and have followed that as a profession. When they come back from a cruise they are landed in Boston, and in the course of a few weeks they are recruited into the Navy of the United States at Boston, not giving the place of their residence, and they are not enrolled on the enlistment rolls of Massachusetts or of Boston. They are returned to the Navy Department here as having been born in Vermont, but the fact that they were born there is not taken as any criterion by the War Department that they should be credited to Vermont, but they are credited to the place where they enlist. This is all unfair; it is exceedingly unjust. There have been thirty thousand men, I undertake to say, credited to particular localities, who were not citizens of those localities, who were not entered upon the enlistment roll of the districts to which they have been credited, and who ought not therefore to have been credited to those localities.

As an example, we have a navy-yard at Kittery. It is sometimes called the Kittery yard, and sometimes called the Portsmouth yard. The yard itself is on the Maine side of the Piscataqua river; the town where the people live and where nearly all the business is done is in New Hampshire; and therefore, under this interpretation, the men recruited at that naval rendezvous are credited to Maine. If any of them belong to any of the townships of New Hampshire, they cannot be credited under this rule established by the War Department, as I understand the rule, to those townships, unless the selectmen or the parties in the different townships of New Hampshire who have that subject in charge go to the provost marshals and to the War Department and show that those specific credits ought to be allowed to them. That is not fair. The burden of proof ought not to have been thrown upon these localities in the country, but should have rested upon the large cities where the credits are allowed.

In order to have a thorough understanding of this subject, and that there shall be no document published by the authority of the Senate in relation to these Army and Navy recruits that is not truthful, that will not convey the exactly correct impression to the country in regard to where they came from and where they ought to be credited, I want this resolution postponed for a couple of weeks so that we may in the mean time get an answer from the Secretary of War to the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not oppose the postponement suggested by the Senator from Iowa. I have no desire to have a report made here which does not show the precise and exact facts. If any improper rule has been adopted at the War Department, if it can be corrected, I hope we shall correct it. In passing the act allowing the different localities credits for the sailors furnished to the Navy, our object was to do justice to all localities, sections, and States. If, in the administration of that act, anything has been done which is not right, I hope it will be corrected, if it can be corrected. I suppose that in raising these troops injustice is done to localities and will continue to be done.

I do not know that there is any special haste for getting this information, and therefore I shall not oppose the postponement. The Senator from Delaware introduced the proposition, confining it simply to one call. It was thought by the committee that it was best to have the information as to all the calls, and then we should have all the facts before us; and the amendment was made for that purpose. I do not think the Senator from Delaware will lose anything by having the matter go over for a couple of weeks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to postpone the further consideration of this resolution for two weeks.

The motion was agreed to.

DEPOT AND FERRY RAILWAY COMPANY.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the bill (H. R. No. 186) to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railway Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The route of the proposed railway is from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company's depot on New Jersey avenue in Washington, District of Columbia, through C street to Sixth street, along Sixth street to Missouri avenue, along Missouri avenue to Four-and-a-half street, along Four-and-a-half street to N street, along N street to the Potomac river or Sixth street, and also along Four-and-a-half street to P street, and along P street to the river.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was in section one, lines twenty and twenty-one, to strike out the words "to be built under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey," and in lieu of them to insert, "the outer or channel line of said wharf to be subject to the approval of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "thereon," in line four of section nine, to insert "at least once in every fifteen minutes between six o'clock, a. m., and ten o'clock, p. m., of each day, and," so as to make the clause read:

That said company shall place first-class cars on said railroad, with all the modern improvements for the convenience of passengers, and shall run cars thereon at least once in every fifteen minutes between six o'clock, a. m., and ten o'clock, p. m., each day, and upon the arrival of the regular steamboats plying between Sixth street wharf and Alexandria, and upon the arrival of passenger trains upon the Baltimore road, and oftener, as public convenience may require.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer an amendment, to come in at the end of section twenty-one:

Provided, That no person shall be excluded from any car on account of color.

Mr. SAULSBURY. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say a single word in regard to this, simply as to the position of the Senate upon this class of provisions. This general provision applies to one of the roads, the last road chartered, the F street road, so called; it is specifically a portion of their charter; it does not apply to the road on the avenue; but as the sense of the Senate has seemed to be to subject all the roads to this general provision, as that has seemed to be the general judgment of the Senate, I, of course, have no objection to the same rule being applied to this bill, and therefore I make no objection to the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 24, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Collamer, Connors, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, and Sausbury—6.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Cowan, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out in section one the following words from line nineteen to line twenty-four:

With the right to construct a wharf into said river the width of said P street, to be built under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and so as not to interfere with navigation of the Potomac river; and the use and maintenance of said wharf shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the city of Washington.

The mayor of the city informed me at the close of the last session that this was conferring on the proposed corporation a very valuable property privilege, giving them a wharf privilege equivalent to one hundred feet wide, extending out into the Potomac river a good way and impairing the value of the adjoining property, and was worth, he said, a very large sum of money. I will scarcely venture to quote the sum, because it may have been an exaggeration. The right is to be conferred upon this company without expense, without cost to them, without benefit either to the Government or to the city. In the city of New York such a wharf privilege would be worth half a million dollars, and I have no doubt that it is worth a very large sum here. Such a privilege as that, unless there is some good reason for conferring it, it seems to me ought to be withheld. It is an injury to the adjoining proprietors, the property holders having a right to the wharf privileges on the north and south side of P street; but this would confer the exclusive privilege of this company to the whole of all P street so that no one could land at the foot of P street without their consent, as it was represented to me. They can build up the whole space of P street running into the river, and the privilege is in its nature exclusive.

That was the statement made to me by the mayor of the city, who is a very respectable gentleman, and who is looking for the interests of the city; and it struck me that the privilege ought not to be granted. The right of the railroad company to construct their buildings, &c., on their own land is properly given; I hope the whole city will be covered with street railroads; but when you propose to give them the property of the Government or the property of the city, and to convert the streets of the city into exclusive privileges for building wharves and landings, a very different question arises. This corporation, when they build their road, may purchase the property on either side of P street, and erect the necessary buildings, and may run them out just as any other individual would be able to do; but to give them the right to construct their buildings on the street, it seems to me, is conferring on them property privileges of great value; and it ought not to be done, certainly against the wishes of the city authorities. If the Senate should think this privilege indispensable, my impression is that the city authorities ought to be consulted in the construction of this improvement, and that the mode of doing it at least ought to be left to them. I know nothing about the question except from the statement made to me by the mayor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The words which the Senator from Ohio moves to strike out will be read as the clause has been amended.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

With the right to construct a wharf into said river the width of said P street, the outer or channel line of said wharf to be subject to the approval of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, so as not to interfere with the navigation of the Potomac river; and the use and maintenance of said wharf shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the city of Washington.

Mr. MORRILL. This objection raised by the Senator from Ohio is not new to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was raised at the last session; that is, it was suggested by the mayor of the city, who I believe assumed to represent the public interests then, that it would be a public inconvenience; and therefore the committee examined the question. It is not, in the judgment of the committee, at all liable to the charge suggested by the Senator from Ohio. It will be seen that it confers no property right whatever; it is simply a permission to extend the wharf into the Potomac river. It is the ordinary privilege granted to a citizen who desires to connect a business with the commerce of a river; and I would remind the Senator that it is identical with the privilege granted to the ferry company, called, I believe, the Potomac Ferry Company, now running between this city and Alexandria.

Mr. SHERMAN. But this is a privilege to make a wharf at the foot of the street.

Mr. MORRILL. My friend surely will not undertake to raise a distinction between landing at the foot of a street and landing somewhere else. A wharf that is not accessible to the street is no wharf at all. The power and privilege granted here is identical with the privilege granted to the Potomac Ferry Company, as I recollect the name, a year or two ago; and it is, when summed up, a right simply to build a wharf; and it is the ordinary right which cities confer on persons who desire to do business in connection with the general commerce of the country. It is precisely this case. That it may interfere with other lots or with other wharves so far as to get up a competition with other transactions, I do not doubt; but I have yet to learn, from anything that I know of the history of the case, that it unjustly interferes with anybody's rights, either with the adjoining landholders or with the rights we have heretofore granted to any other company. I say, then, that it is simply a grant of the ordinary privilege of a right to extend a wharf into a river to be in connection with the facilities of commerce, always premising, of course, that the party who undertakes to exercise that right either owns the land or must purchase the land of the owner. It conveys him no right to take land whatever; but assuming that he has the right to build the wharf, that he owns the land or can procure it, the Government gives him the privilege of doing what he otherwise might not. That is all there is of it. I conceive that there is really no well-founded objection to this provision, and I very much hope that the bill will be passed as it was reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no difference between the honorable Senator from Maine and myself as to what is desired, but there is a very great difference between us on the legal construction of this language. He says that Congress granted to the Potomac Ferry Company the right to build such a wharf. I am very sure that is not so; there is no right granted certainly to any company to build any wharf on the public streets of Washington. Such a right would be of immense value; in the city of New York it would be worth millions; you could scarcely estimate such a privilege. The right conferred by this language—it is very carefully worded—is the right to build an exclusive wharf at the foot of one of the streets of Washington. The Senator says he desires only to confer on this corporation the right to build a wharf on their own land. If that right only was conferred, I certainly should have no objection; but he will see, if he reads it carefully, that the language not only gives them the right to construct a wharf and to erect buildings upon it, but it gives them the exclusive right, because it authorizes them to take the whole width of the street; it is a wharf privilege to build a wharf, and it is not required to be on their land; it is required to be in the street.

Mr. MORRILL. That is not so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Here is the question. If they were limited to their own property, I should have not the slightest objection; but the language is, "with the right to construct a wharf into said river the width of said P street." I certainly want to give to these corporators the same privileges we have granted to others, no more and no less; and if you confined this right to build a wharf to their own land I should have no objection, because that would be giving the privilege you have given to others. The other company, I believe, have a wharf at the foot of Sixth street, though I am not sure of that. The complaint made by the mayor is that here you authorize this corporation to build it in the street, occupying the whole width of the street, granting an exclusive property privilege of that which belongs either to the city or to the Government of the United States; I do not exactly know which is the owner of the street, but I believe the Government is. If you give these corporators the right to construct a wharf into the river the width of P street on their own land I should have no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Nobody owns the land there.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Government owns the land. Why not require these parties to purchase land convenient and contiguous; or if you give them the land of the Government, the streets of the Government, and authorize them to exercise this exclusive privilege for the width of P street, why not make them pay an assessment of its value? I would not give them a special privilege, but would put them on the same footing precisely with other companies who have privileges in the same vicinity.

Mr. MORRILL. I think I was correct in saying that we do not interfere with the street, and do not propose to authorize this company to build a wharf in the street, or on the street, or touching the street in any way under heaven except at the shore of the river. We authorize these parties to commence at a given point and run down a given street; we then authorize them to run down P street to the Potomac river. That is the end of the road, and that is the end of the land; that is where the land meets the water; that is where travel ends and commerce begins; that is where the railroad stops and the navigation commences. Now, what is proposed at that point? Just at that point, we say, you may run a wharf into the river, not on the street nor touching the street, nor interfering with the street, nor in connection with the street in any possible way under heaven except to land on it. Does that affect anybody's rights? Has the adjoining landholder any right to that? Has he any jurisdiction over it? Does not his jurisdiction end when he gets down to the maritime jurisdiction? I should like to know what Mayor Wallach has to do when he gets down to low-water mark on the Potomac river. If he is coming in here to interfere with these bills I want to understand the extent of his jurisdiction; I want him to establish a maritime jurisdiction, if he has it; or else to let him understand that when we undertake to say that citizens may build a wharf into the river it does not interfere with his jurisdiction. It is the sheerest piece of impertinence imaginable for Mayor Wallach to suppose that he has anything to do with this bill; it is altogether below his jurisdiction or above it.

I repeat, there is no privilege granted here except what is granted ordinarily when you authorize a party to go below the land into the water, and that is all this section proposes. It is that when these parties have carried their railroad down to the river, they may go into the river with a view of meeting the navigation. That is all there is of it. They must land somewhere. It is precisely the privilege which was conferred on the ferry company as I understand, and which is conferred whenever a party is authorized to go from the land into the water, either the sea or a navigable river, with the view of joining navigation and travel together.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator still does not meet the question. He is mistaken in supposing that the right of property ends when it touches the water. Representing the State of Maine with its valuable riparian rights, he must know that the right of the proprietor extends further out than the water; indeed, it extends to the center of the river, subject only, however, to the rights of navigation. A private party owning land adjoining P street may, without any act of Congress, build a wharf there if he does not interfere with the navigation of the Potomac. It is not necessary to legislate to confer the right on a private owner to build a wharf out into the Potomac, subject only to the limitation that he shall not interfere with the navigation of the river. Any adjoining proprietor can do it. You propose to authorize this company to build their railroad on the streets belonging to the United States to the Potomac river; and then what more? You give them the right to build wharves out into the river on the land of the United States. The right of ownership does not cease when the water is touched. It extends to the center of the river, subject only to the rights of navigation; and the rights of the United States as the owner of the street extends to the center of the river, subject only to the superior rights of navigation. You propose to confer upon this corporation the right to exclusively use the width of P street until they touch the point where navigation would be interfered with.

Mr. FARWELL. I should like to ask the Senator a question, with his permission.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to answering.

Mr. FARWELL. Does the Senator understand that the United States, or the city of Washington, by laying out a street, get a fee to the land and a fee to the riparian rights that the owner of the street would have?

Mr. SHERMAN. The United States, I presume, stands in the ownership of these streets precisely like any other proprietor. An adjoining proprietor of the land along the Potomac owns the ground in front of him, subject only to the superior right of the public to navigate the river. That is the ordinary riparian right. The United States, in owning the streets of the city, have precisely that riparian right. The right to construct a wharf in front of P street is a property right. If the Senate will limit the bill so as to allow this company to build a wharf on private property which they may be compelled to purchase like other property, there will be no objection to allowing them to build a wharf on their own land. The only objection is to giving them the exclusive privilege of building a wharf on lands belonging to the public, and thus giving them a discrimination or a benefit not conferred on other corporations.

It seems to me my friend from Maine ought not to criticize the action of Mayor Wallach in this matter. It is his duty to see to this matter. The city of Washington, as the representative of the citizens here, have the right to this wharfage in front of P street. They may find it necessary to build a city wharf. But if this right is conferred upon this corporation, as a matter of course it is in its nature exclusive, and no one else can build a wharf there, because they have it to the full width of P street. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator's bill, but I think he can frame an amendment to it that will accomplish the object of both of us.

Mr. GRIMES. If it is in order, I move to insert in the twenty-second line after the word "river," the words "or of the use of the street abutting upon said river;" so that the clause will read:

And so as not to interfere with the navigation of the Potomac river or of the use of the street abutting upon said river.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that. Mr. JOHNSON. There can be no objection to that, I presume.

Mr. GRIMES. With this amendment I am prepared to vote for this bill. I know something of its history during the last session of Congress. It is true that the mayor of the city opposed its passage through the Senate, but it is also true that almost everybody, I think, on the streets adjacent to the proposed road petitioned Congress most strenuously that the bill might be passed as it stands before us; so that if there is any fair representation of the public sentiment before this body it seems to me to be in favor of the passage of the bill, rather than against it, although the official head of the city did protest against it.

If any one will go down to P street and see what facilities the city, who profess to own all these riparian rights, have furnished for the commerce of this city, I think he will agree with me that it is time Congress should interfere and allow private corporations to build some sort of wharves in order to promote the commerce of this city. Because something of this character has not hitherto been done nearly all the commerce of this city has been carried on with the northern ports of the Republic, and with the southern, too, before the commencement of this rebellion, from and through Georgetown; and to-day the packet lines that run between the Potomac river from this vicinity to New York and Boston and Philadelphia make all their landings at Georgetown. Why? Because the city government has not availed itself of its privilege to establish wharves and furnish the proper commercial facilities for the transaction of that business, or because Congress has not seen fit to grant to private individuals precisely the same rights which the Senator from Maine proposes to confer upon this corporation to enable them to build wharves in the future.

It seems to me that there is nothing clearer than that the best interests of the city require that if the city itself will not build wharves we should confer that authority upon somebody else who will furnish commercial facilities. As to the rivalry between these competing lines, I am in favor of giving them all the privilege of building wharves, so that the one does not interfere with the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask my friend from Iowa, before he gets through his remarks, is there any law in the city of Washington or any act of Congress that prevents any individual from building a wharf on his own land?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not understand that anybody owns this land.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean the land of a private individual abutting on the Potomac.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] can probably say whether there has been any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on that subject; whether the person who owns land adjacent to the Potomac owns into the stream or not; but if the construction that has been given by Judge McLean, and by some other eminent jurists, to a case somewhat similar to this prevails, then it is not true that individuals who own the real estate adjacent to and abreast of a street own into the river. I believe there was a case of that kind somewhat similar to this decided in the city of Detroit. The Senator from Maryland can inform the Senate on that subject, for I do not profess to be a lawyer, and he is an eminent one; but I do not think that any individuals own into the river under the construction of the judicial tribunals. I believe that all that property belongs to the United States where the United States was first the original proprietor and conveyed the lot.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moves to amend the bill by striking out a certain clause which has been read. The Senator from Iowa moves to amend that clause, by way of perfecting it before the vote is taken on striking out. The question will first be taken on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to insert after the word "river" the words "or of the use of the street abutting upon said river."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Ohio, or any other Senator, entertains any doubt that Congress can grant the privilege proposed to be granted by the words which he suggests shall be stricken out; but he tells us that those words will confer a very valuable property upon this company. He objects to it upon the ground that it is too valuable a property to be transferred at all by the Government to the company unless they pay for it.

In the first place, it is necessary to see what is the meaning of the words proposed to be stricken out. The bill authorizes this company to make a railroad from a certain point until it gets to Four-and-a-half street, and then to run north to the Potomac river or to Sixth street, with the privilege of continuing the said roads along Four-and-a-half street to P street, and along P street to the Potomac river. I do not understand the Senator from Ohio to object to that. Under that authority the road may be constructed and is to be constructed to the river. After getting the road to the river, a measure which the bill supposes will be beneficial to the public, what should next be done? Ought they not to be able in some way or other to get all the trade that comes up the river or down the river or across the river to their railroad? They run down to the river for the very purpose of getting such trade, either traffic in passengers or traffic in merchandise. The very purpose of the bill, therefore, is to get in some way that business. How is it to be done unless somebody makes a wharf at which the passenger can land who comes either up or down or across the river, or on which property which seeks its transportation upon the railroad can be landed? My friend from Ohio suggests that it is a privilege. Certainly it is a privilege; but it is not a privilege that we ought to grant if we think—and the bill goes upon that presumption, and to a certain extent that presumption is admitted by a correct presumption—that the improvement will be a valuable one.

That being the object of the bill—the public benefit—what is the additional privilege which is proposed to be stricken out? It is not the right to run their railroad to the river, and cross it if it be necessary to cross it, or running along P street until they come to the terminus of P street on the river, but it is to build into the river a wharf; and what is proposed to be given, as my friend from Ohio supposes, as exclusive property to this corporation is the wharf which is to be built in the river. Whose property is the bed of the river? It is not the property of the city of Washington. It never was their property since the Constitution of the United States was adopted. It never was the property of the individual owners who had held the land, of which P street constitutes a part, by patents from the original owner.

The doctrine referred to by my friend from Ohio, that each riparian proprietor is authorized to go to the thread of the stream, is applicable to streams not navigable. The moment you come to a navigable stream it comes within the operation of the Constitution of the United States which gives to Congress the exclusive right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States. It is subject exclusively to the control of Congress; and nobody, therefore, whether individual proprietor or corporation proprietor, (for the corporation of Washington is precisely in the condition of an individual proprietor,) has a right to build in the river without the authority of Congress, to whom the whole navigation of the river is intrusted. They are to decide what, if anything is proposed to be done, will interfere with that navigation. In all the States where the cities have improved upon navigable streams, no one has been permitted to build into the navigable stream without the consent of the Legislature. The mistake, therefore, into which I think my friend from Ohio has fallen is in confounding unnavigable with navigable streams. While the one is private property and the bed of the stream belongs exclusively to the riparian proprietors in equal moiety, each having the right to go to the thread of the stream, it is not true in relation to a navigable stream; for no individual proprietor who owns land upon a navigable stream, since the Constitution of the United States was adopted, has a right to go into the river at all without the consent of the sovereign, wherever that sovereignty may be.

In order to make the improvement a valuable one, if we are to have a place at which passengers are to land who may want to go upon this railroad, and where freight is to be deposited for the purpose of being transported upon this railroad, we must have some place at which they are to land, and on which the freight is to be deposited. You only want to put that upon the stream. If you put it upon the street, you stop up that highway, and unless you mean to say to this company, "You shall not carry on the business you are chartered to carry on," you would give to them necessarily the privilege of blocking up P street as far as the passengers who may be connected with the transportation upon their railroad and the freight that they may want to carry are concerned. They may pile their barrels, pile their produce of every description, pile their lumber so as entirely to obstruct the passage up and down P street. That we do not want; but we want some place where the passengers and the freight may be landed. Passengers must land somewhere before they can get into the cars, or they must step out into the water; and those who have freight to send, if they have not a place on which to deposit it, must land it in the water. That we do not want. This bill proposes to do what is done in all the cities. I speak knowingly as far as Baltimore is concerned. There they are permitted to build their wharves, subject to the regulations which the city may impose, either directly or through the particular municipal corporation. They are permitted to build their wharves out into the water from the existing termination of the street, and you give them the right to charge wharfage. That is all this bill does.

There is no danger of any abuse, because the bill provides that that wharf is not to be built so as to interfere with the navigation of the Potomac river; and that it will not be so built we have the security furnished in the provision that it shall be built under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, and that the use and maintenance of the wharf shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the city of Washington, like all other wharves. Many of the streets that now reach down to the river have in front of them wharves. Do you not go upon a wharf when you get into the steamboat that goes to Alexandria, and when you come from Alexandria? You step upon a wharf built upon the front of a street, built from the original termination of the street. There is not one of the streets now which at the time you put these wharves there terminated where it was originally laid out. It follows the river, and you do not take in part of the street for the purpose of the wharf. You take the water, the land covered by the water, and upon that land you build your wharf. It seems to me therefore that the bill would be without the means of attaining the very end we want, if you do not give them the right to build a wharf at the termination of the route which you authorize them to take, and that termination is at the extreme end of P street.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am sorry that the Senator from Iowa is not in his seat. I desire to suggest to him that his amendment certainly cannot be necessary. If it were necessary, I should vote for it. Clearly a wharf ought not to be constructed at the end of this street which would interfere with the use of the street; but this proposed wharf cannot do so. The Senate can see at a glance that a wharf cannot interfere with the use of the street. A wharf is a structure built upon the water. If it is built upon the land it is a storehouse. The word used in this bill excludes the possibility of interference with the use of the street. I think, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa is unnecessary.

I certainly agree with the Senator from Maryland that the city of Washington does not own the land underneath the waters of the Potomac river; and it is very clear that the proprietors along the shore do not own to the center of the stream. I think the argument of the Senator from Ohio was based upon that idea. That has been decided over and over again, as I understand, in this District. It has been decided by the General Land Office in all of its decisions; because if the riparian proprietor's right extends to the center of the stream, that carries with it the islands in the stream, and he would become the owner of the islands opposite to his property. The General Land Office, with the approval of the Departments of the Government, has disposed of these islands as being the property of the Government. It is very clear from this fact that the privilege of constructing this wharf cannot interfere with any property rights of the city or of the riparian proprietors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the clause proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to strike out the clause which has been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Just one word in reply to the Senator from Maryland. He says that this will be a benefit to the public. Let me tell him that when this wharf is constructed, if any vessel belonging to any citizen of the United States should come to that wharf at the foot of a street in the city of Washington, it would not be allowed to land; and if you grant five such privileges as this, you will prevent any citizen of the United States from landing at a wharf in Washington without paying tribute to a private corporation. These are the facts; and the ingenious arguments of the honorable Senator cannot prevent it.

It is true that in a navigable stream the rights of the riparian owner are not so extensive as on streams that are not navigable. We are all familiar with that; but the right of wharfage always inures to the owner of the land, whether the stream is navigable or not. For the purposes of this argument there is no difference at all between a navigable stream and one not navigable. I am told that the wharfage of this city is limited; that it is all between Four-and-a-half street and, probably, Twelfth street; that there are only four or five streets jutting into the river where the privilege of the public is worth anything. The adjoining proprietors on either side of a street have the right to build a wharf. The question is, whether you will give to a private corporation the exclusive privilege of a wharf occupying the whole of the space of one of your public streets, when you have conferred that right on no other corporation, and when perhaps it is not to be conferred on any other corporation. Any individual, the owner of the adjoining lands, may build wharves, or this company may go and buy of any adjoining proprietor the right of wharfage. I have no objection to extend to them if necessary the right to build a wharf. The only question is whether you will extend to them the right to build a wharf on property belonging to the United States without any consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend from Ohio is mistaken. All those wharves are entitled to charge wharfage, subject to the regulations of the city. The city may, under their charter, as far as the existing wharves are concerned, prescribe the rate of wharfage, and the manner in which the wharfage is to be collected. This bill provides in the part proposed to be stricken out that the wharf, when built, shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the city of Washington. The city of Washington will take care that vessels that can come up the river shall come up. I speak knowingly on this subject, because it is a subject that I have argued half a dozen times. They have a right to come up. All that the city does, and what it is authorized to do, is to regulate the rates of wharfage, the manner in which vessels shall come from time to time, and how long they shall stay. That is the case here. This wharf is to be subject to all the regulations that the city of Washington may impose. If the Senator has any doubts about the effect of those general words let him make them more specific.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we agree so nearly, why not give the exclusive right to this company to build a wharf there on private property to be purchased by them? Why not give expressly to the corporate authorities of the city of Washington the right to fix the rate of tolls? If that is done I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. JOHNSON. As to buying private property, there is no private property there. They want a wharfage at the end of that street.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Harris, Sherman, Sprague, and Ten Eyck—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Saulsbury, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit another amendment, to insert in the clause I proposed to strike out, after the word "wharf," in the twenty-fifth line, the words "and the rates of wharfage;" so that the clause will read:

And the use and maintenance of said wharf and the rates of wharfage shall be subject to the municipal regulations of the city of Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein the doors were reopened.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 583, with a view of leaving it as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 583) to amend the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 17, 1865.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CAPTURE OF FORT FISHER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have just received a dispatch from the Secretary of the Navy announcing the capture of Fort Fisher, and I send it to the Clerk that it may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Fort Monroe, January 17, 1865.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy:

The Atlantic is just in from Wilmington. Fort Fisher and works on Federal Point are in our possession. The assault was made by the army and sailors on Sunday afternoon, and by eleven p. m. the works were ours. Losses heavy. Lieutenants S. V. Preston and B. H. Porter, of the Navy, are killed. Our captures were seventy-two guns and about two thousand five hundred prisoners. Generals Whiting and Lamb (rebel) are prisoners and wounded. The Vanderbilt is on her way North with dispatches. Two fifteen-inch guns were burst on the monitors.

E. T. NICHOLS, Commander.

[Great applause.]

Mr. SLOAN. I ask unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be, and hereby are, instructed to report a bill amending the act to provide internal revenue, &c., so that the revenues produced by said act shall be increased at least thirty-three and one third per cent.

Mr. STEVENS. If the resolution be modified so as to make it one of inquiry, and not one of instruction, I will not object to it; otherwise I shall have to do so.

Mr. SLOAN. I ask the gentleman to let the resolution come before the House, and let us have a vote on it as it is.

Mr. STEVENS. I object. It is not usual to positively direct what committees shall do.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas it is believed and alleged by many persons that the troubles in which the United States are involved with various Indian tribes are the result of an unwise Indian policy and of fraudulent dealing with said Indians by the whites; and whereas an investigation of the facts may enable the Government to adopt a better policy and also to correct any abuses that may exist: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed, whose duty it shall be to investigate as far as they may deem necessary all dealings and transactions of the Government through its agents or officers with said Indians, and that said committee be authorized to send for persons and papers.

BOUNTIES FOR VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President to offer bounties for volunteers to an amount in his opinion sufficient to secure the requisite number of volunteers, such amount, however, not to exceed the sum of $600 for each volunteer; and also into the expediency, in connection with the offer of such bounties, of prohibiting all bounties of States, counties, municipal corporations, and individuals; and further, to suspend all proceedings by way of draft under the recent call until it shall have been demonstrated by actual experiment to the President that the requisite number of volunteers cannot be procured by the offer of bounties.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

The resolution was then adopted.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MINNESOTA.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making a grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad from St. Cloud to the line of the Lake Superior and Mississippi railroad in said State; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Resolved further, That he state, as near as may be, the amount of said fund, and what further sum will probably be necessary to meet the requisitions of said law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to put it in the ordinary form, that the Secretary of War be directed, &c.

Mr. GRIDER. I agree to that. The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the internal revenue act as to make every person, other than one holding a license as a lawyer or claim agent, who shall draw deeds, bonds, mortgages, wills, writs, or other legal papers for others, or whose business it is to examine titles to real estate, to be held to be a conveyancer within the meaning of said act. Also, to provide a minimum percentage or rate of compensation for deputy collectors under said act. Mr. HOLMAN. I presume this bill does not contain any appropriations not authorized by law, but I desire to reserve the question of order.

Mr. STEVENS. Let it be understood that on all appropriation bills this question of order is reserved.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will be satisfactory.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. SPALDING. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 692) to guaranty to certain States whose governments have been usurped or overthrown a republican form of government, reported from the select committee on the rebellious States, on which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELIOT. I regret that I have not been able to support the bill, with the amendment, as reported from the select committee. If I had been able to give it my support I should not have felt called upon to detain the House at this time. Although I came to the examination of this bill prejudiced in its behalf, partly because of the interest which my friend at the head of the committee [Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland] has taken in the subject, and partly because at the last session, under the circumstances in which we were placed, I found myself with my friends upon this side of the House supporting a bill containing many provisions substantially similar to some in the bill now before the House, yet upon a careful examination of the principles of the bill, and of its specific provisions, I find myself not able to give it my support.

It will be remembered that at the last session no discussion was had upon the particular provisions of the bill then passed. There were strong reasons, as it was believed, for action at that time. Those reasons do not exist now in full, and there is time enough, if any bill shall be passed, to make it more perfect and more practicable than the amended bill as now offered by the committee seems to me to be. I desire, then, frankly to state to the House the reasons which will control my action.

I have offered an amendment to the bill as a substitute for it, and I have done so because I desired to avoid the charge that might otherwise be made of hindering legislation without attempting, at any rate, its improvement.

The first section of this bill—for I propose, without preface, to come to a direct examination of it—is in its terms peremptory; there are eleven States declared in rebellion, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee, Louisiana, Florida, Arkansas, and Texas, and by the first section of the bill the President is called upon to appoint for each of these States a provisional governor, whose pay and emoluments shall not exceed those of a brigadier general.

There is no time, I submit to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY], allowed to the President for discretion, but he is called upon by the terms of the bill to make his appointments when the bill becomes a law. It may be said that this authority vested in the President would not be exercised until the time arrived when, within his discretion, it would be prudent; but that is not what the bill says. The day after this bill becomes a law the President has a right, and, for aught I see, would be called upon to exert the power to appoint these provisional governors for the States. My friend from Ohio will concede, as every gentleman upon the floor of the House must agree, that so far as all these States are concerned, excepting, it may be, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Arkansas, such appointments would be useless; they would be not only expensive, but of no effect, excepting, indeed, that the persons appointed to office could have a right to draw the pay which this bill contemplates; I say excepting so far as Louisiana, Arkansas, and Tennessee are concerned. The fifteenth section of this bill to a certain extent recognizes the governments which have been established in Louisiana and Arkansas; but the bill calls for the appointment none the less within those States of provisional governors, and, as I shall undertake to show to the House, if the bill becomes a law, notwithstanding what has been done in Louisiana, and in Arkansas, and in Tennessee, by the operation of this bill, the machinery of it is to be applied to each of those States.

The second section of the bill imposes upon the provisional governors to be appointed duties which they cannot perform, and other duties, I respectfully submit, which we ought not to compel them to perform. Of course they cannot perform any of the duties of governors until the military power of the United States has vindicated itself within the rebellious States; but when that has been done, the second section of this bill provides that the provisional governors shall see that this act and the laws of the United States and the laws of the State in force when the State government was overthrown by the rebellion, shall be faithfully executed.

Now, I want to know whether this House is disposed, after deliberation, to confer upon the provisional governor of either of these States the power to see that the laws which were in force in those States in 1860 shall be faithfully executed, with no knowledge on the part of the House of the character or the import of those laws.

My friend from Ohio cannot tell us, I think, what the laws of the State of Mississippi, or Arkansas, or Tennessee, or Louisiana, or South Carolina are which he, in this bill, calls upon the provisional governors to see executed. Why should we demand the enforcement of the specific laws in these States regulating the collection of debts, the private and personal transactions of the inhabitants; concerning arrests; concerning the attachment and sale of property; concerning the jurisdiction of justices of the peace, the summoning of jurors, and the trial of causes; concerning crimes and their punishment by death or otherwise; the internal, minute, police regulations of those States where complexion appoints or reduces the punishment; concerning the establishment of courts, the election or appointment of judges; concerning the publication of books, punishing the circulation of books or writings advocating human rights; requiring the removal of free persons of color from the States; prohibiting free persons of color from engaging in business within the States; punishing by the lash free persons of color upon suspicion of false testimony and before conviction; prohibiting the employment of free persons of color who have recently come within those States, and authorizing the compulsory apprenticeship of free colored minors? There must be laws governing the internal administration of State affairs. But should we without knowledge undertake to compel the execution of laws without regard to their necessity or character or justice? We should not, I think, assume such responsibility.

There is a statute in one of these States requiring the authorities to cause to be apprenticed every free colored minor between the ages of seven and twenty-one. My friend from Ohio will hardly desire that such a law as that should be, by his vote, enforced, or that the provisional governor of that State should be called upon to see to its faithful execution. So also in regard to the law requiring the imprisonment of free colored sailors in southern ports. Yet all these provisions, and very many others contained on the statute-books of those States, and enforced in 1860, we are called upon by this bill to compel the provisional governors, to be appointed by the President, to see that they be faithfully executed.

I know that the bill says that the laws for the trial and punishment of white persons shall extend to all persons, but the converse of that is not contained in the bill; and there are, on the statute-books of the southern States, offenses which when committed by white men are punished in one way, and when committed by colored men are punished in another way. The punishment differs according to the color. There is no provision in this bill to permit colored persons to be witnesses on the stand; and although the laws for the trial of whites may extend to the negro, yet under the laws which the provisional governor is called upon to execute, negro witnesses are excluded from courts.

The third section of the bill contains provisions which, as it seems to me, ought not to be enforced. It provides that, until the recognition of a State government, the provisional governor shall cause to be assessed and levied and collected, for the year 1865, the taxes provided by law to be levied during the fiscal year next preceding the overthrow of the State government. That is to say, it requires the assessment for 1865 of the taxes provided by the laws of those States for 1860; and not only for 1865, but for every year thereafter. Of course, if these taxes assessed in 1860 were paid, it would not be contended by the committee that they ought to be paid again. I suppose that the object of the law is to require that the same amount of taxes, for the same purposes, shall be assessed in and for 1865, and for every year thereafter, that had been assessed in 1860. That is a remarkable proposition. Why should Congress undertake to say now that the amount of taxes levied and assessed in those States in 1860 shall be levied in 1865, 1866, and 1867, and until the State government shall be hereafter recognized—an arbitrary amount of taxation, fixed by Congress without any knowledge of the purposes for which they might be wanted, without any knowledge whether the amount is twice too large or not half enough? Suppose it should turn out that in 1860 the amount of taxation in any one State were, if you please, $500,000—in which amount are included taxes for the administration of the State government, and taxes for all the purposes of county affairs, towns, parishes, highways, &c.—that aggregate amount would, by the terms of this bill, be levied for these different years, which may be twice as much as is wanted for the purposes of the provisional government; what is to become of the surplus? The whole amount of the taxes is to be paid to the governor to be expended by him, and any surplus is to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of such State, to be paid by and by on an appropriation by Congress after the State shall have been again admitted into the Union. That is to say, Congress undertakes to impose arbitrarily an amount of taxation; if it is too much, the surplus is to be returned, not to the people who have been made to pay it, but to the Treasury of the United States, for the ultimate benefit of the State.

It will be observed, also, that all the machinery for the collection of these taxes is adopted from the State laws. The property may be sold; the compulsory processes of law may be applied; titles may be changed; real estate may pass from one owner to another; and all these taxes are imposed without representation, without any parties being here to enlighten us; against the consent, without the knowledge of the parties concerned or the parties to be affected.

The fourth section, Mr. Speaker, is one which, so far as it goes, I find no fault with. It provides—

That all persons held to involuntary servitude or labor in the States or parts of States in which such persons have been declared free by any proclamation of the President, are hereby emancipated and discharged therefrom, and they and their posterity shall be forever free. And if any such persons or their posterity shall be restrained of liberty under pretense of any claim to such service or labor, the courts of the United States shall, on habeas corpus, discharge them.

The fifth section I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to, because if it should come before him again, it seems to me that in one of its provisions it should be amended. It provides—

That if any person declared free by this act, or any law of the United States, or any proclamation of the President, be restrained of liberty with intent to be held in or reduced to involuntary servitude or labor, the person convicted before a court of competent jurisdiction of such act shall be punished by fine of not less than $1,500 and be imprisoned not less than five nor more than twenty years.

How large a fine may the court impose? It must not be less than $1,500; it may be $1,500,000. Now, I do not mean to say that that is an offense which is not black enough to justify the imposition of a fine that shall absorb the property of the man convicted.

Mr. ASHLEY. I copied that from the punishment inflicted for a violation of the fugitive slave law. I thought that if we had stood that so long it was but simple justice that it should be inflicted back on the enemy.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not doubt that my friend can find good reason for it. I simply suggest that, as a matter of legislation, it is better to fix a maximum punishment. Let the penalty be put at $1,500,000, if my friend please, but let it be fixed. And I suggest that, as a principle of penal legislation, it is always better to fix the maximum punishment, leaving the minimum to the discretion of the court.

But the sixth section is open to another criticism of a different kind. It provides that every person who shall hereafter hold certain offices in the rebel government is "hereby declared not to be a citizen of the United States." Well, sir, that is applying the punishment before the offense is committed. See how it will operate. A private individual, carrying on his affairs, a lawyer, if you please, in Mississippi, is not affected as to his status by the provisions of this bill. He is a citizen just as much after its passage as before. But a month after its passage he takes one of the offices specified in this section. Then, according to the section, he is declared now not a citizen. I suppose that the intention of the committee was to provide that the holding of these offices shall be an act which shall deprive the offender of his citizenship. But, further than that, we declare him not to be a citizen. Can he, then, be indicted for treason? I suppose that if we declare that a person is not now a citizen who shall by and by commit an offense, then when that offense comes to be prosecuted this bill will be his defense, if that prosecution should be for treason. A person cannot commit treason if he is not a citizen. I suggest that, for it seems to me a matter of some importance, that by and by, when the time shall come, we may have it within our power to bring to the bar of public justice, under indictment for treason, the leading traitors now in arms. I know it is said there is a qualified citizenship determined by residence when one has sought the protection of Government. But if Congress declares a man not to be a citizen it is very doubtful whether in our own country he could be punished as a traitor.

The seventh section, Mr. Speaker, is one which simply recognizes the government of Louisiana. I mean the seventh section of the amended bill, not of the substitute. I ought, perhaps, here to say that, by arrangement with the committee, the bill which was reported on the 9th of January as an amendment in the nature of a substitute is considered to be the text to be acted upon and altered by the House.

But I was saying, sir, that the seventh section, as it was contained in the other bill, is simply a recognition of Louisiana. I do not object to that, although the constitution of Louisiana is not entirely what I should like, as I shall have occasion presently to show. But that seventh section is now found in the bill which is under discussion as the fifteenth section; and if the gentlemen of the House will turn to the fifteenth section they will find that which originally was reported as the seventh. In the fifteenth section, not only the government of Louisiana, but the government of Arkansas is recognized. Now, it may be all well enough that the government of Arkansas should be recognized, and that the constitution adopted by the citizens of Arkansas in convention in January, 1864, at Little Rock, should be accepted. I understand that my friend from Missouri, [Mr. Blow,] from the committee, will state to the House reasons why that ought to be done. All that I have to say about it now is that we have yet had no reasons presented why Arkansas at this moment should be received as a State.

But the fifteenth section does not admit either of those States. It does not recognize either of those governments. The seventh section did; the fifteenth section only does it qualifiedly. It only recognizes the governments, provided the same or other conventions duly assembled shall first have incorporated into their constitutions certain provisions which are contained in this bill, and the marshal of the United States shall have returned to the President the enrollment directed by the eighth section, which is the seventh section in the substitute, to be made and returned to the provisional governor. That of course postpones all action for another year. But more than that, it makes it necessary to apply the machinery of this bill to the State of Louisiana and the State of Arkansas, just as if no action had been taken within those States by the citizens of them. I am inclined to think that was not the intention of my friend; but if he will look at the thirteenth line of the fifteenth section he will find that, before any recognition is given, the marshal must return to the President the enrollment directed by the seventh section to be made and returned by the governor. The "same" conventions that adopted the constitutions cannot act, for they have been dissolved. Other conventions cannot be "duly assembled" under this bill until an enrollment has been made of the citizens named in the bill and a convention of delegates elected pursuant to its provisions.

Now, sir, we will examine that seventh section presently; and I think it will be found before a full enrollment can be made and that action can be taken, it will be needful to have the provisional governor.

And that brings me to consider that section of the bill, which is—

That so soon as the military resistance to the United States shall have been suppressed in any State, and the people thereof shall have sufficiently returned to their obedience to the Constitution and the laws of the United States, the provisional governor shall direct the marshal of the United States, as speedily as may be, to name a sufficient number of deputies, and to enroll all white male citizens of the United States resident in the State in their respective counties, and to request each one to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and in his enrollment to designate those who take and those who refuse to take that oath, which rolls shall be forthwith returned to the provisional governor; and if the persons taking that oath shall, together with the citizens of the United States from such State in the military or naval service of the United States, amount to a majority of the persons enrolled in the State, he shall, by proclamation, invite the loyal people of the State to elect delegates to a convention charged to declare the will of the people of the State relative to the reestablishment of a State government, subject to and in conformity with the Constitution of the United States.

Why, sir, that is an arithmetical impossibility. The majority of persons enrolled in a State presupposes more than one half of these men enrolled. Suppose you will have of the enrolled white men one hundred thousand, and the majority of that is more than fifty thousand. Suppose that forty thousand take the oath, that will leave sixty thousand who have not taken the oath. If you had eleven thousand colored soldiers, or sailors not enrolled you have fifty-one thousand, but you do not have a majority of the persons enrolled in the State. You have a number which is greater than one half of the number of persons enrolled, but you do not have one half of those persons. I suppose that the gentleman will say that the manifest intention of the bill is that a convention shall be called when a number is found, partly of the enrolled white men who have taken the oath, and partly of the colored soldiers who have not been enrolled, which is greater than one half of the number of enrolled men. Without stopping to show whether my criticism just now made was correct, let us assume the construction which the committee will give.

Now, sir, you will have in the case I have just stated forty thousand enrolled white men who have taken the oath, and you will have eleven thousand colored soldiers or sailors who are not enrolled, which with the forty thousand make fifty-one thousand, which constitutes a greater number than one half of the number of enrolled men. Take one step further. These colored soldiers and sailors are not made voters by this bill unless they are then in service. They are then to be counted in determining whether the convention shall be called. But suppose between the time of calling the convention and the time of electing the delegates these colored soldiers and sailors leave the service, there is nothing in this bill which gives them any rights, except so far as they are in the military or naval service. In the case supposed by me, at the time of the election of delegates if they are out of the military or naval service they will have no rights; and I think that will be more apparent when we come to consider the next section. The privilege of being counted only to determine whether a convention shall be called is given to them not because of their complexion but because of their condition in the service.

The next section provides that—

The convention shall consist of as many members as both Houses of the last constitutional State Legislature, apportioned by the provisional governor among the counties, parishes, or districts of the State, in proportion to the population enrolled by the marshal, in compliance with the provisions of this act, or in the military or naval service of the United States, as aforesaid. The provisional governor shall, by proclamation, declare the number of delegates to be elected by each county, parish, or election district; name a day of election, not less than thirty days thereafter; designate the places of voting in each county, parish, or district, conforming, as nearly as may be convenient, to the places used in the State elections next preceding the rebellion; appoint one or more commissioners to hold the election at each place of voting, and provide an adequate force to keep the peace during the election.

Now, I call the attention of the committee to this section for the purpose of inquiring how that apportionment can be made and how the proportion is to be ascertained. The colored soldiers and sailors are not enrolled, they are not registered, they are not credited to any county or parish, they are aggregated. Suppose one county stands five thousand white men, that proportion is not fixed on that population. Suppose that there are twenty thousand colored soldiers or sailors in the service, what is to be done with them? How many of them are to be added to that five thousand of enrolled white men in that county? There is no way to determine how many belong there, and I submit, according to the provisions of the bill, it would not be practicable to distribute the men who are in the military or naval service, among the different counties and districts in the State, so as to determine the proportion designated by this section.

If I have made myself understood by the committee I will pass on to the consideration of the next section.

Mr. ASHLEY. The gentleman will notice that the persons in the military and naval service are required to be enrolled.

Mr. ELIOT. I do not find in the bill any provision for enrolling those persons in the military or naval service. I will pause a moment whenever my friend will show me the provision. I think he will find it is the condition of being in the service that authorizes them to be counted and afterward to vote.

Then the ninth section goes on to say how the delegates shall be elected. We will now see what action is to be taken by the colored soldiers and sailors then in the service:

The delegates shall be elected by the loyal male citizens aforesaid of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, and resident in the county, parish, or district in which they shall offer to vote, or in the military or naval service of the United States, and who shall take and subscribe the oath of allegiance to the United States in the form contained in the act of Congress of July 2, 1862.

Are these delegates to be elected on a general ticket? In Louisiana there were in the convention ninety-two delegates. In Missouri, the other day, when that glorious action was taken on the emancipation question, there were sixty-four votes. Suppose there are fifty delegates in any of these States to be chosen, are they to be elected upon a general ticket? Manifestly not, as I think; but by districts. If, then, they are to be elected by districts, I want to inquire in what district the absent colored soldiers are to vote? I have stated that they were not enrolled as belonging to any district. They have no legal, local habitation, or name. They may have belonged to men owning plantations in more than one district. Where shall they vote? The bill does not designate. For what district shall they vote? They vote for district "A" or district "B." They must themselves determine that question at the time. When the proper moment comes, for aught I see, they must themselves designate the district in which they choose to have their votes counted.

My friend [Mr. ASHLEY] says that is the way they do in Ohio with their soldiers. That is a very different thing, because the soldiers in Ohio are known to have homes, and known to belong to certain districts. That cannot be said of these parties who are now to be called upon to exercise the right to vote, because they are in the service of their country. They must designate the place, without any means of checking them, and without any means of ascertaining whether that designation of place be correct or incorrect.

The delegates shall be elected by the loyal male citizens aforesaid.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to that word "aforesaid," for the purpose of asking a question with reference to it.

The loyal male citizens aforesaid of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years, and resident in the county, parish, or district, * * * or in the military or naval service, &c.

That refers to those same persons who were designated before in a previous clause as the persons to be counted in order to determine whether a convention should be called. I think that must be the intention of the bill. Now, sir, suppose the colored soldiers and sailors who were in the service at that time shall, before the time arrives for voting for delegates, have left the service, and suppose their places to be filled by other colored soldiers and sailors; which of those two classes shall vote? Shall it be the colored soldiers and sailors who are found in the service of the Government at the time they vote for delegates? They are not included within the term "aforesaid," because they were not counted in order to determine whether a convention should be called. Those who were counted when they came to vote are not enrolled, and are not in the service. Shall they vote? Certainly it would seem that those who are in the service when the delegates are to be voted for ought to have the right to vote; yet they are not included in the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have not time to go through the further sections of this bill, nor indeed do I think it will be found necessary to do so. Whether the difficulties I have stated are inseparable from any bill upon this subject, I will not undertake to say. But I do say that it would be unsafe for us, in my judgment, to permit a bill containing these provisions to become a law. What is the need of any general bill? We passed one last session, I know, containing provisions, many of them like the provisions of this bill. There appeared to be reason to act then. But can we undertake in one bill to state what shall be applicable in detail in all these rebel States? Why is it not more wise to take the States as they shall present themselves for admission? We may, to be sure, agree upon certain principles. We ought to agree upon certain provisions which must be contained within the constitutions of the States before those States shall be recognized and permitted to act under the Government of the United States. I offered an amendment for this purpose to designate what it seems to me it is desirable that we should say. I will thank the Clerk to read the first section of that amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

That the States declared to be in rebellion against the United States, and within which the authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States has been overthrown, shall not be permitted to resume their political relations with the Government of the United States until, by action of the loyal citizens within such States respectively, a State constitution shall be ordained and established, republican in form, forever prohibiting involuntary servitude within such State, and guaranteeing to all persons freedom and equality of rights before the law.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, that section simply undertakes to set forth certain constitutional requirements—that the State of Mississippi, for instance, shall not be admitted to act as one of the States of the Union until a State constitution shall be ordained and established, republican in form, forever prohibiting involuntary servitude, and granting to all persons freedom and equality of rights before the law. Who here is not prepared to say that much? In offering this amendment, I need hardly say that I have acted for no party; that I am representing no interest; that I am only desirous of presenting to the House what it seems to me we ought to state as prerequisites of admission. If the House shall agree with me, I shall be glad, and I believe that the time will come, if it has not now come, when we shall all of us be prepared to stand upon and to defend successfully the doctrine of that amendment. Let them establish their constitution; let it prohibit slavery; let them grant freedom and equality of rights, and we need nothing else. No matter how they have done it, provided that it has been done by the loyal citizens of the State. Arkansas has acted in one way, Louisiana in another, and Tennessee is proceeding in still a different way. No matter, as it seems to me, how a State shall have brought itself before us, so only that it comes with a constitution that we can recognize.

In the second section of my substitute it is provided that the State of Louisiana is permitted to resume its relations with the Government of the United States. Now, that is in its effect just like the seventh section of the bill which the committee reported, and therefore I shall find no objection to that, I think, from my friends upon the committee. I confess that the constitution of Louisiana is not altogether what I like, but there is this provision within it, that the Legislature shall have power to pass a law extending the suffrage to citizens of the United States who, by military service, by taxation to support the Government, or by intellectual fitness are entitled thereto. We have every reason to suppose that the Legislature will speedily take this action. We all know that there are reasons, and strong reasons, why the State of Louisiana ought to be received and admitted again within our Government. There are ninety thousand men and women within that State who were slaves and were excepted from the benefit of the presidential proclamation. The constitution of Louisiana makes them free.

The constitution of Louisiana is admirably drawn. Its first article abolishes slavery forever, and its second article prohibits the Legislature from making laws recognizing the right of property in man. The powers of government are well distributed, and the provisions protecting elections and providing for public education are full and explicit. It is made the duty of the Legislature to provide for the education of all children between six and eighteen years of age, whether white or colored. And while it does not at once, as it ought to do, in my judgment, confer full political rights, it provides that the Legislature shall have power to extend all political rights to all persons who by military service, by taxation to support the government, or by intellectual fitness, may be deemed entitled thereto. From information derived from the highest sources I am satisfied that no time will be lost in taking such legislative action as shall be right.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what reason there is to believe that the Legislature of Louisiana will execute the power intrusted to them by the constitutional convention? I confess that if that fact could be demonstrated to me, I would gladly support the bill. One reason why I hesitate about it is that I think I perceive a determination on the part of the Legislature not to do that thing.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, if I believed that there would be hesitation on the part of the Legislature, I for one would not recommend the bill.

Mr. GANSON. Mr. Speaker, I may suggest to the gentleman that the war may be continued down there till they do submit to it.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I have to say that it has been with difficulty that I have brought myself to this action. There have been statements made here, from responsible authority, that the Legislature of Louisiana is about proceeding. There are influences bearing upon them which, I believe, will not be resisted. Nevertheless I do not pretend to conceal that I should, with a greatly increased zeal, advocate the restoration of Louisiana if the provision was contained within the constitution, as by the first section of the bill which I have offered it is provided that it shall be in the constitution of all the other States. And it is only because I believe that facts exist in connection with Louisiana that ought to entitle her to consideration now, and ought to induce us to act speedily in regard to her restoration, that I have been willing to act for it.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question which troubles me a little? If Louisiana and these other States are in the Union, by what authority do we legislate for their internal police? [Laughter from the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. ELIOT. The question, as I understand my friend is, why, if these States are in the Union, we should legislate for their internal police. If they are in the Union just as Pennsylvania is, we ought not to; but the difficulty is that they are not in the Union in that sense, to that extent, thus fully. They are not out of the Union territorially, and yet rebellion has overthrown their governments for a time, and it is needful that the Congress of the United States should intervene and should legislate.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand the gentleman to say that they are partly in the Union, and partly out. About how much are they in the Union and about how much out? [Laughter on the Democratic side of the House.]

Mr. GANSON. The black part is in.

Mr. ELIOT. The government of Mississippi is not in the Union. It is a rebel government, established by the rebels, by traitors against the Government of the country, within the land and upon territory that is a part of the Union; and the Congress of the United States in that state of things has a right to legislate, because it is a necessity imposed upon it.

Mr. Speaker, there is no work imposed upon us by the people of the nation more full of consequences that reach into the far future than that of bringing back into the Union the States whose governments have been overthrown by traitors in arms against their country. As we discharge that duty rightfully and without fear, grounding our action on principle, or wrongfully, by enactments which compromise with principle, endeavor to evade the great and fundamental doctrines of freedom and equal rights before the law, so shall we be judged as true or as false in the years that are to come. We may not be able to construct at this time a plan by which, and by which alone, all the States in rebellion shall be admitted again to their political rights under our Government; but we can declare, and we ought by solemn enactment to declare, that no rebel State shall be received until it shall come with a free constitution, prohibiting slavery forever within her borders, and containing provisions under which equal rights before the law may be secured.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor. Mr. WILSON. I ask the gentleman from New York to yield to me to make a motion for the postponement of this measure.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I shall do so.

Mr. WILSON. I move to postpone the consideration of this subject for two weeks from tomorrow; and on that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. ASHLEY. I ask the Chair whether the bill, if postponed, will maintain its present position.

The SPEAKER. It will. Being a special order it will be postponed as a special order.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I appeal to the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his motion, and let the bill be disposed of one way or the other.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. A vote to postpone is equivalent to a vote to kill the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, called for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 34, not voting 45; as follows:

So the bill was postponed till Wednesday, February 1.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and proceed to the consideration of the special order, the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be at once read by paragraphs for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the first reading will be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The bill was read through by clauses.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That section four of chapter forty-five of the public acts of the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress relating to cadets "found deficient" is hereby repealed.

I will endeavor to explain this amendment in a very few words. After an effort, persistently continued for many years, the academic board at West Point succeeded at the last session of Congress in incorporating in an appropriation bill the following section:

"That cadets found deficient in any examination shall not be continued at the Military Academy, or be reappointed except upon the recommendation of the academic board."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the term "found deficient" referred simply to deficiency of cadets in their studies, and went to impeach their mental capacity, I should think the above an eminently proper law. No one desires to retain in the Academy for education at the public expense young men of inferior talents. But unfortunately, by the regulations in force at West Point, the "deficiency" of a cadet is founded as much upon petty irregularities of conduct—many of them utterly inconsiderable—as upon his character as a student and his rank and standing in the class-room.

For these trivial offenses the cadets receive demerit marks, and if these happen to reach one hundred in six months in the case of any one cadet he is doomed to dismissal from the Academy, and the provision which I have moved to repeal takes away from him his last appeal to the Secretary of War or the President. To show the character of the offenses for which a cadet may thus be dismissed, I quote from an official document a partial list of them, with the penalty attached:

"Bed not properly folded at 10 and 11 a. m.—one demerit."

"Bed down at inspection—one demerit."

"Curtains not drawn back at 6.45 a. m.—one demerit."

"Name of room-mate not on orderly board at 10 a. m.—two demerits."

"Unauthorized clothes-bag in possession—one demerit."

"Floor out of order near wash-stand—four demerits."

"Odor of tobacco-smoke in room—four demerits."

And a long list of similar grave offenses! The last one quoted is a little remarkable when it is known that tobacco and cigars are purchased by the cadets on the Point with the permission of the authorities of the Academy.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I complain of is that a cadet may stand among the first of his class in attainments, in habits of study, in promise as a soldier, and yet if he gets one hundred demerit marks in six months for such petty offenses as I have quoted, there is no power in the War Department, there is no power in the President, there is no power under heaven that can retain him in the Academy—except the power of the Academic Board, which, by all the presumptions in the case, will not be exercised in his behalf. Let me give an instance that occurred within my own knowledge before this law of 1864 was passed—an instance which illustrates, so far as a simple example may, the beneficence of leaving the power of restoration in the hands of the Secretary of War. In 1861 I happened to be one of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy, and while there a young man was "found deficient" and dismissed, because of one hundred demerit marks he had received in six months for such petty offenses as I have quoted. His "deficiency" had no reference to his scholarship, as he was conceded to be among the brightest and most promising of his class. Interested very deeply in his behalf, I came to Washington and successfully interceded with the Secretary of War, who, on hearing his case, ordered him to be readmitted to the Academy. He subsequently graduated very high in class-rank, and since his entrance upon active service has distinguished himself as an officer of great merit, serving with efficiency and distinction as an ordnance officer on Sheridan's staff in that splendid and victorious campaign in the valley of the Shenandoah. Sir, this is but one instance of many that might be named of cadets "found deficient"—restored to the Academy—graduating with honor and serving with distinction in the Army. I could give some very notable ones did not delicacy forbid my allusion to them by name in this public debate.

Many of the cadets, sir, who have been very precise and decorous in their conduct in matters of petty discipline at the Academy, and manage to pass through smoothly, often graduating with high rank obtained by a very strict attention to "folding of beds by 10 a. m." and "drawing of curtains at precisely 6.45 a. m.," are unfortunately never heard from afterward. Their names do not always figure in the record of our bloody battles, and they have achieved no distinction in this war with all its thousand opportunities, while on the other hand not a few of the graduates of the Academy who at the Point had the "odor of tobacco in their rooms," and whose "floors were out of order near the wash-stand," have blazoned their names high on the roll of fame for conduct as gallant and skill as ever graced the battle-fields of any age or country.

I insist, therefore, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, that we should restore to the Secretary of War and the President the power which the law of last year took away from them. If a case can be made out in favor of any cadet strong enough to warrant his restoration, he should be restored, and the Academic Board thus be reminded that their conclusions are not absolutely infallible, but that, like other men, they are liable to err—to err in the future as they have erred in judgment in the past.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, whether this will reach the object of the gentleman from Maine, I am not quite sure. Before this law was passed at the last session of Congress, there was a rule of the Academy precisely the same in its character. It was held that a member could not renominate a cadet when he was once dropped. It was held that he should be recommended by the Board of the Academy. When the law is repealed, will not that rule remain? If this amendment will, besides repealing the law of the last session, do away with the rule of the Academy to which I have referred, I think I will go for it. Before that rule was adopted, if a cadet were dropped, a member could fill his own vacancy and renominate the same cadet, who could be tried again. When that rule was adopted by the Academy a member could not renominate a cadet who had been dropped, nor could anybody else. I only want to know whether the amendment reaches the whole case.

Mr. BLAINE. It reaches effectively any such case where the Secretary of War or the President may think it right to intervene.

Mr. STEVENS. I should go further and say that a member should have the power to renominate.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted, and that the matter will be restored to what it was prior to the passage of the section at the last session which has been read to the House. The object of that section seems to protect the Academy against any possible supposition that it may be mistaken in its decision in regard to any cadet. I agree with the gentleman from Maine, and I would, as a general rule—of course there are exceptions—turn the graduating classes the other end foremost when I expected to secure efficient soldiers. The fact thus far seems to have been that the heads of the graduating classes at West Point, and so with the Naval Academy at Newport, are men peculiarly well qualified to become principals of female academies or colleges: excellent gentlemen, but with no qualities for field service. The removal of this objection is one step, it seems to me, toward a correction of the evil, and is one step toward correcting what may be the possible mistakes of the faculty of that Academy. It permits an appeal from their decisions, and enables young men of spirit and metal, mischievous sometimes, to have things mala prohibita but not malo per se prevented from denying them the privileges of the Academy. I hope that the amendment will prevail.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read:

For commutation of subsistence, $4,000.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to strike that out; and I would like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. STEVENS. It is nothing more than to pay for board, and has always been provided in this shape.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, and that we take up the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

Mr. SPALDING. I object, and want a vote taken on laying the bill aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will put the question to the committee.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee next took up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1866, which was made a special order for this day.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with.

Mr. BROOKS. I must object for the present until I can have time to examine the bill.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, but was subsequently interrupted by Mr. BROOKS, who withdrew his objection.

No further objection being made the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the Clerk proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend by inserting on page 4, line sixty-two, the following:

For removing the unsightly high fence or railing which has been erected in the old Hall of Representatives, $200.

It will be recollected that at the last session of this Congress a liberal appropriation was made for the purpose of putting the old Hall of Representatives into a condition for receiving such statutory as should hereafter be furnished by the several States, of eminent deceased citizens. Very properly, in pursuance of that provision of law, there has been a pavement or tile floor put down in that Hall; but for some reason understood by nobody, perhaps, but the architect himself, there has been a passage way, as every one knows, constructed, and shut in by a high bronze fence on either side, which makes the place look much more like a menagerie for shutting up on either hand such wild beasts as might come into the possession of the Government than for any other purpose.

As to the statutory, either in groups or single figures, no one, unless he be a tall man, will have the privilege to look at them from his place in that passage without raising upon his tiptoes. As to shorter persons, and ladies in particular, they cannot reach up to the top of the rail to get a peep at them; and no one will be permitted in any event to approach them in order to inspect and enjoy any works of art.

I would rather see the whole Hall left open, or if there must be a railing, a low, light, graceful railing, a work of art in itself, than that great rude, rough, unsightly structure now there, destroying the whole original object of the appropriation. I do not know whose taste it is, and I do not know that anybody agrees with me in the opinion I have expressed; but it strikes my mind that nothing could have been done which would more disfigure and destroy the effect of that fine hall or room or defeat all the purposes for which Congress chose to set it apart, than just what somebody has done by the work I speak of.

I do not propose anything being done except, first, the clearing out of the way that which has been done. Perhaps other gentlemen may have something to propose in the way of further improvement.

Before I sit down I will say that if it is designed that statutory shall be viewed at all, that object can be accomplished, if an inclosure at all is necessary, either by some light railing which will leave the statutory open to view, or by some sufficient railing, if that is required, around each group, thus leaving the whole Hall open to be walked through, like any other gallery of art in any other country. Now it looks more like a pen, or a menagerie, or anything else, rather than a place for works of art.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume the gentleman from Ohio has accomplished his main purpose by calling attention to the fact of the unsightly iron railing which now exists. I cordially concur with him in all his criticisms in relation to it. At the earliest moment after I saw the commencement of that railing, soon after reaching the capital, before the session of Congress commenced, I waited upon the architect and remonstrated with him as to the style and manner of it. After some consultation he was ready to admit that it was wrong, and that he was willing to put in a very different railing of a very different style; but he said it would be impossible to do it while Congress was in session, with the constant passing to and fro through the hall, without interfering with the workmen; and hence that it would be necessary to delay the work until after the adjournment.

It is very obvious that the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio is just as to the massive character of that work. It is, for all useful purposes nothing more than a fence, not only to keep people away from the statutory that may hereafter be erected there, but to keep away spectators from viewing it. The railing should have been constructed so as to leave an open area in the center, either a circle or a hexagon, so that the spectators might have remained out of the way of those passing to and fro to this Hall, and ought to have been a beautiful structure, light and artistic, instead of being a very common and coarse one.

I trust, however, that under the circumstances, the House will not appropriate anything to remove the railing, for it has at least this useful purpose, that of preventing many frequenters of this building from scratching their names upon the beautiful columns there, as has already been done.

Mr. SLOAN. What was the cost of this railing?

Mr. MORRILL. I believe the cost was some $3,700. [Cries of "Oh! Oh!"]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose that some appropriation may be necessary in order to have this ungainly, unwieldy fence removed immediately. I hope that at all events $100 will be appropriated, and that the fence will be taken out of the way forthwith. In my opinion an ordinary rail fence would be preferable, and would look better, put up by the original "rail-splitter" of Illinois. [Laughter.]

This is really a matter of some importance. Here is a fence within the Capitol of the nation that disfigures that part of the building which has been set apart wherein works of art and all that goes to beautify and adorn the Capitol are to be preserved and admired by those who come here to behold them; they are to be confronted with a fence nine feet high, I think; I may put it a trifle too high, but I think it ought to be removed at once. I think this appropriation ought to be made. I do not believe there is a member of this House who, when he passes through that Hall, does not shudder as if he were entering the walls of some prison rather than a chamber dedicated to works of art. I hope that an appropriation of $100 will be made to remove the fence, and that no appropriation will be made for another fence. I do not think we need to be fenced up in this manner. When the works of art are placed there, let a policeman be stationed there to preserve them from those who might be vandals enough to destroy them; but let us not be debarred from admiring what may be worthy of admiration; let the fence be removed, whether there is any statutory there or not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will modify my amendment so as to make the appropriation $100 instead of $200. I do not shrink, sir, from my purpose and desire to have this fence removed in consequence of anything which has been said by the honorable gentleman who represents the Committee of Ways and Means. I am inclined to believe that perhaps my first proposition, made on the spur of the moment, to appropriate $200 was too liberal, and I therefore prefer to modify the amendment so as to give only $100.

Mr. THAYER. I suggest to the gentleman that he add the words "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. SCHENCK. I accept that modification of my amendment. I would go further if it were possible, and would make the architect, whoever he may be, who designed and put the fence there, himself pay for its removal. I do not understand, however, to whom we are indebted for this work of art, and I would beg the gentleman who represents the Committee of Ways and Means to tell me if he can who was designated to carry out that provision of law.

Mr. MORRILL. I believe that the architect of the Capitol is wholly responsible for the design and for the work.

Mr. SCHENCK. Now, sir, in reply to the gentleman from Vermont I have this objection to make. I am unwilling to leave the matter to the discretion of anybody who was capable of putting it there in the first place. It seems to me that a man who exercised the discretion committed to him by the law of last session by putting up such an erection as that is not fit for anything except to carry out our purpose by taking it down. I am not willing, therefore, having seen such specimens of his discretion and taste, to make the provision any other than absolute, that he shall remove, and remove immediately, what he has put there.

The gentleman from Vermont, says, however, that it is important to keep it there during the session of Congress, in order to protect the pillars of that fine old Hall from being scratched and disfigured. Why, sir, in the two lines immediately preceding the point in the bill where I propose to have this amendment inserted, I find an appropriation of $10,234 for Capitol police. If our Capitol police, to whom we give ten or eleven thousand dollars, are not capable of protecting these pillars from injury by men or boys, it seems to me that we make but a poor appropriation in that direction too. I am willing to have the whole fence removed, and to leave the protection of that Hall and of its surroundings just as they were and had been, somewhat to our disgrace, for a number of years before we made this appropriation last winter for its renovation and better condition. I have no fear, therefore, that our Capitol police, if it be good for anything, will not be able to protect the pillars of the old Hall, even from members of Congress, without the help of that fence.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I propose to say only a few words on this matter. It certainly is not very surprising that we have this debate on this subject here to-day. Nothing must be done at the last session of Congress but to vote an appropriation of money for fitting up that old Hall. We made a very liberal appropriation; and the architect, Mr. Walter, a very distinguished and eminent gentleman in his profession, has gone to work and put up this fence. And I beg leave to differ most emphatically from the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] and my colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL] in regard to it. I admire the taste of it, [laughter]; and I trust that the work having been done, we will not go to spending more money to have the fence taken down. It is a good strong fence. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio could not jump over it. [Laughter.] It leaves a straight way to the Senate, to which some gentleman have not yet been able to arrive. [Laughter.] I trust that the committee will not go to making any further appropriations for this purpose.

There is another plan on foot now. We have had this magnificent Hall constructed—a Hall which, I believe, every gentleman who was condemned to sit in the old Hall was satisfied with; but a proposition is on foot to expend half a million, more or less.

Mr. MORRILL. More.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. More, the gentleman from Vermont says, in order to remodel this Hall. I am opposed to all of this. I think that matters are well enough as they are, and that it is well for us in the present state of affairs not to make any more appropriations in this way.

Mr. MORRILL. While I do not differ from the gentleman from Ohio in his main object, yet I think this is the wrong place to offer the amendment which he has proposed, and if I had not been entirely willing that he should make this exposé I would have raised a point of order on the amendment. But as it is very certain that the architect, whose taste, in some respects at least, we all admire, made a mistake in this matter, which he is ready to correct at the earliest opportunity, I think we should give him a fair opportunity. In reference to removing this fence I will say to the gentleman that the posts on which this railing rests are all of them deeply anchored in the foundation; and if the fence is to be removed it will be necessary that a large share of the tiling be taken up. I trust, therefore, that these repairs will not be required to be made during the session, and that gentlemen will be willing to wait till the close of the session.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I observe in the bill the following item:

For expenses of heating and ventilating apparatus, $16,000.

Now, there is no question that the heating apparatus is very efficient; but I would be glad if the committee would give us some information as to the ventilating apparatus. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. I believe that almost every gentleman has taken occasion to "ventilate" himself during this session; and so far as ventilating the Hall is concerned, I suppose we shall have to wait until the special committee report. They are now receiving evidence on that subject, and I understand will report soon.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Chairman, I observe that the Clerk has just read this clause:

For miscellaneous items, $30,000.

I desire, for my own information, to have this item explained. I do not see the necessity of considering these appropriation bills unless we understand what the appropriations are for. Here is the round sum of $30,000 appropriated—for what? I call upon the members of the Committee of Ways and Means to explain so that we may vote understandingly upon this subject. If it is meant as a contingent fund for any officer of the Senate, let it be so understood. If it is for any specific items, let them be stated, so that we may vote understandingly. Otherwise I shall move to strike it out.

Mr. MORRILL. It has been the practice heretofore to allow each House generally to control its own expenses. These items are just as they have been for years in relation to the Senate, and we have not felt at liberty to change them. I confess that I do not know precisely for what purposes this amount is appropriated to the Senate; but it is nothing more than what has usually been allowed heretofore.

Mr. SPALDING. If it has been usual to allow it, I must submit. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend by striking out this item of $30,000. I am asked by a gentleman on my left why I would have it stricken out. I answer, because I do not know any reason why it should be there. If I should vote $30,000 for miscellaneous items, and should afterwards be unable to tell what was the object of thirty cents of that expenditure, I should occupy, I think, a rather unenviable position before my constituents, before the world, and before the bar of my own conscience.

Now, I think that we have gone far enough in voting appropriations without knowing what they are for. I opposed, last session, the appropriation to fix up the old Hall; and now we learn that $3,700 of that money has been squandered for a "fence." We are now asked to vote $30,000 for "miscellaneous items," and no man on this floor can tell what thirty cents of that appropriation are for. Is money so plentiful in our Treasury that we can afford thus to vote it away? I have yet to learn that fact. But it has been the practice of this House ever since I have been a member of it to vote money without stint or limit, at the same time when we are appealing, not only to our own people, but to Europe for money to carry on this war. How long will it be before we shall exercise a little common sense and prudence in voting away the money which the people are taxed to the utmost limit to raise? Here is an appropriation for $30,000, with no man able to tell us where it is to go! How can I vote for an appropriation of that kind? I think that we have gone about far enough. If we are determined to proceed in this way, it is about time that we should do what Judas did when he had received his thirty pieces of silver. Such outrageous legislation is without any excuse whatever. Gentlemen get up here and ask the members of the Committee of Ways and Means what certain appropriations are for, and they cannot tell. The only information we can get is that such appropriations have been made heretofore! Can usage sanctify so improper a system? No man in his private affairs attempts to do business in this way.

Sir, I speak with some feeling on this subject, because I have again and again and again attempted to raise my voice in opposition to this system of reckless expenditure; but it has been as chaff before the wind. I undertake to say that it is time that the Representatives of the people should look to this matter, and practice in their public capacity the same principles of economy which they follow in their own private business affairs. When we do thus we may expect the people to pay their taxes with some kind of good nature. It is but natural that the people should expect us to give some reasonable statement of the objects of the appropriations which we make, that they should expect us to give an account of our stewardship. If we continue our present reckless system, we can only say to the people, "We do not know what has become of your money. We did not lay it away in a napkin, like another unfaithful steward; but we have squandered it, and have nothing in the world to show for it." I shall oppose it although I may be alone; and I shall oppose all such appropriations. I shall vote for nothing unless I am satisfied there is some utility in it, so that when I go back to my constituents I can be able to answer them intelligibly what I have done in reference to their money. For, sir, it is their money and not ours. It is their money, and we ought not to appropriate $30,000 until we know exactly where it is going. We have not so much money, I take it, that we can throw it away recklessly. No, sir; I say that this House ought not to pass an appropriation until it is satisfied that it is for a good purpose. Let money only be applied to good purposes and then the people will cheerfully bear the burdens of this war. If we go on in this reckless manner we must expect complaints.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, from the gentleman's earnestness one would suppose that a large portion of the revenue collected in the United States was collected in his district. If the gentleman will examine he will find that but a small portion comes out of his own particular people. If the gentleman had made an inquiry in reference to the expenditures in the House of Representatives and had waited until we had progressed that far in the bill, I would have been ready to have replied. He will find that the same amount is appropriated for the House of Representatives, and that is appropriated for the various expenditures for repairs of the Hall, repairs of the furniture, funeral expenses of members, Sergeant-at-Arms, contestants, &c. They are the expenditures which have been alluded to. I presume that that is the character of the amendments of the Senate; but so far as this House is concerned, as I said when I rose at first, we have not felt at liberty to control the expenditures of the Senate, claiming the right on our part to control the expenditures of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I am not prepared, Mr. Chairman, to say that I shall vote to strike out this item, but I am prepared to say that this House receives very little comfort from the Committee of Ways and Means, when any inquiry is made concerning items embraced in appropriation bills. I do not say that it is because they do not desire to give us the information, but I presume it arises from the fact that the committee is not able to give examination to all of the items embraced in the bills which they report. That arises, sir, from the fact that they have too many duties to perform. That committee has absorbed business enough in this House to demand the attention of three or four committees. The appropriations, themselves, aside from all the other business which goes to them, is sufficient for the attention of any one committee of the House.

During the last session I sent a resolution to the Committee on Rules, requesting that committee to inquire into the expediency of creating two additional standing committees in order that the business which now goes to the Committee of Ways and Means might be divided and receive the attention of three committees of this House instead of one. But no report was made at that session. I have renewed that application by a resolution sent to that committee at this session, and I hope that it will be acted upon favorably.

Now, sir, the manner in which these appropriation bills are received from that committee and the manner in which they are disposed of in this House results in this, that the heads of the Departments hold to-day the appropriating power of this Government. What a head of Department recommends is put into an appropriation bill as a matter of course. If the Committee of Ways and Means is asked for information in relation to any item we are told that it has been recommended by such and such officer. Thus the Representatives of the people, who are engaged in appropriating money, receive no information, not, I say again, because the committee have no desire to give information, but because they have not time to devote to the various items in the bill in order to be prepared to give that information.

I make these remarks, sir, more for the purpose of calling to the attention of the House the necessity of reform in this respect than to support the motion to strike out this item. We must have reform or we can never know what these appropriations are for; we can never know whether they are just and proper; and we can never know whether we are appropriating too much money or too little. We should have a committee that should have abundant time to prepare bills so that the members may have full information on the subject.

I hope, therefore, that this measure of reform will receive some attention, not only at the hands of the Committee on Rules but also the attention of the members of the House, for it is one very much needed for the good of the public service.

Mr. KASSON. I do not propose, in the absence of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, to enter into a general defense of the action of that committee. I am unwilling, however, as one humble member of that committee, to allow to go unanswered the suggestion of my friend and colleague from Iowa, in which he said that the heads of Departments are the controlling power in making appropriations.

Mr. WILSON. I made that suggestion chiefly upon the fact, which is apparent to every member of this House, that when an appropriation bill is under consideration and information is asked, the chairman of the committee or the member of the committee having the measure in charge, invariably turns to the estimates furnished by the heads of Departments and says, "Here is the estimate furnished by the Department, and it calls for so much."

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to interrupt the gentleman to say that the estimates are based upon positive law, as are our bills, in which we propose to appropriate precisely what is required of us—that is, the expenses authorized by law.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly the gentleman from Vermont will not pretend to say that the law determines what amount of appropriation shall be made for each particular purpose; what amount of appropriation shall be made for the support of the Army and Navy, for instance. If, sir, the law determines all these facts, what necessity of consuming the time of the House in considering appropriation bills at all?

Mr. KASSON. I will now proceed to say what I rose for the purpose of saying. So far from the habit of the committee being that suggested by my friend and colleague, it is the constant habit of the committee to do two things: one is, that if they deem it necessary to make an examination themselves personally more fully than the head of a Department can do it, the committee go to the Department for that purpose; and secondly, that scarcely a day, certainly I may say not a week, passes, in which, in compliance with the request of the committee, some of the heads of the bureaus are not brought before the committee for the purpose of making the precise explanation which we are charged with inability to make. I beg my friend and colleague to make the charge specific, if he has one, touching the inability or failure to make these examinations. This morning no less than two heads of bureaus have been before the committee for the very purpose of giving the committee information which they desired to have. And now, to come to the precise point before the House, let me say that not only the particular items named by my colleague upon the committee, but the incidental expenses of the committee rooms, the ice that cools our water (I hope nothing which heats the water) and everything of that kind is included in the incidental expenses. A thousand things are included, embracing the expenses of contested-election cases, and the fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms in carrying out the orders of the House. And I will state to the gentleman what perhaps he does not know, that the system touching the auditing of these expenditures is as well established by the auditor and comptroller in charge of the matter as in reference to any other expenditures made by the Government. The accounting officers hold the disbursing officers of the two Houses to the same strict responsibility in the production of vouchers, and in requiring those vouchers to conform to the long-established usages of the Government, as if there was a specific law touching this appropriation. The whole thing is guarded by the usage which has become a law in the accounting Department of the Government.

If either my colleague or any other gentleman of the House can tell me how much these incidental and miscellaneous items will amount to for the next year, I will vote with them to fix them at that sum; but if they cannot it is their duty, I say, as it is mine, to accept the estimates made by the officers of the Senate and House as the probable amount that will be required.

Mr. DRIGGS. At the last session of Congress we made an appropriation of $12,500 to rebuild the President's stables. I would inquire of the gentleman from Iowa if he has any information leading him to know what amount of that appropriation has been expended, for it seems to me, looking at the condition of the walls of those stables after they were burned, eight or ten thousand dollars was all that was required to rebuild them.

We have heard nothing in reference to the manner in which that appropriation has been expended, and I would like to know how the matter stands.

Mr. KASSON. I shall be obliged to refer my friend to the auditor having charge of that portion of the expenditure of the Government, and to the Committee on Expenditures appointed by this House, as that matter does not come within the province of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. KASSON. I yield the floor to my colleague.

Mr. PRICE. I have but a word to say, and I should not have said that word but for a remark or two which fell from the gentleman from Vermont that I think were entirely irrelevant to the question before the committee. It is true that the residents of my district, the men that I represent, do not pay all the taxes to support this Government. If that item of information is of any value to the gentleman from Vermont he now has it. But I want to say that no constituency, in proportion to their means and ability, pay any more of the expenses of this Government than do my constituents. They fight well, they vote well, and they pay well. If you want any better constituency than that, I do not think you can find it even in the mountains of Vermont.

But the gentleman makes another observation: he says that there is a similar appropriation made in this bill for the House. Ay, sir, that is the point. Pass this appropriation for the Senate, an appropriation of $30,000 for what you do not know anything about, and when you come to the similar appropriation for the House, if there is any attempt to resist the appropriation of $30,000 for the House, it will be said, "Oh, you have voted $30,000 for the Senate, and established the precedent, and therefore you must vote $30,000 for the House; because you have done one wrong you must do another."

Now, I never was educated in that school and do not understand that way of doing business. Show me what you want this money for and that it is necessary for the purpose of carrying on the machinery of the Government, and I will vote for every dollar that the Committee of Ways and Means ask, and then I can go home to my constituents and ask them to stand any kind of taxation. But do not ask me here now, or at any other time, or in any other place, to vote one dollar or one cent unless I can be assured by some gentleman who is presumed to know something about it, that the money is absolutely necessary for the purposes of the Government.

In regard to the remark of my colleague who is on the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. Kasson] that there are ten thousand items—that, I think, was his expression—that we cannot know anything about, I ask any gentleman to examine this bill and tell me whether the specifications are not tolerably numerous. There is a specification of almost everything, and of some things that no one would think of unless he read it. Every conceivable item is specified, and then you put in an item of $30,000 for this end of the Capitol and $30,000 for the other, making $60,000 to be expended, and not a man above ground, not a man living or to be born hereafter can tell what it is for. You ask men in their sober senses to vote $60,000 without knowing what sixty cents of it is for. I am utterly astonished, perfectly surprised. I would not be so much surprised but that the same thing is done here time and again. I undertake to say that if gentlemen look through this appropriation bill, they will find other items of a kindred character. I hope the House will not vote anything unless they know what it is for. I ask for tellers on my amendment.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. PRICE and MORRILL were appointed.

The committee divided, and the tellers reported ayes 37, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the bill on page 6, line one hundred and eleven, by inserting after the appropriation for the Congressional Globe the words:

And to pay the publishers for binding the same, $48,800.

The Globe of last session has not been delivered, so far as I can learn, to any member of the House, and I propose that the publishers shall proceed to bind it, so that it may be delivered while gentlemen remain members of Congress. It will save the Government printing office just the amount that this will cost. The work is now bound at the Government printing office, and that establishment is so overburdened that we have not yet got the Globe for last session, and do not know when we will get it. This amendment merely transfers the work; it neither increases nor diminishes the cost, but transfers the work to an establishment that will be able to deliver the Globe to members during this Congress.

Mr. NOBLE. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to amend his amendment so as to limit the time within which the work shall be done. I have had a conversation at the Globe office, wherein I was told that the work could be done there, and that the volumes could be ready for delivery within ninety days from the close of any session of Congress.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not advised on that point. I therefore make no suggestion. I know that it would expedite the delivery of the books very much. I will accept as an amendment any proper and just limitation.

Mr. NOBLE. I had a conversation with the chief clerk at the Globe office, in which he said that they could do the work within that time.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, will the gentleman suggest a proviso?

Mr. NOBLE. I will; "provided the work be done within ninety days from the close of the session."

Mr. KELLEY. I accept the modification.

The question was taken on Mr. KELLEY's amendment, as modified, and it was agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. With a view to obtain information, I move to strike out the words "Capitol Police, $13,920." We have already passed over an item of $10,234 for Capitol police. I should like to know what we want with two appropriations of over $24,000 for Capitol police.

Mr. MALLORY. Because it takes that amount of money to keep them. [Laughter.]

Mr. KERNAN. No one knows it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent, the committee having passed from that portion of the bill.

Objection was made.

Mr. KELLEY. It has been suggested to me that it would be well to modify my amendment in regard to the binding of the Congressional Globe, by inserting the words after the amount, "or so much thereof as may be necessary."

There being no objection, it was so modified.

Mr. PRICE. I should like to know what this item is for:

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Representative and Delegate in the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, who has not already received the same, $23,000.

I want to know whether it is for furnishing complete sets of the Congressional Globe from the commencement of the work.

Mr. MORRILL. I would refer the gentleman from Iowa to the act of last session making a new bargain with the publishers of the Globe, by which the old terms were to be continued, to give a complete set to new members.

Mr. PRICE. I move to strike out the following item:

For horses, carriages, and saddle horses, $9,000.

I make the motion to strike it out in order to know what the item is for. It may be necessary, but I do not know it. I want to know what the necessity is for the use of horses and carriages, and saddle horses. We have city cars which give us the means of getting from one point of the city to another without having to hire carriages and saddle horses.

Mr. MORRILL. These horses and carriages are used for the purpose of carrying mails and books to and from the public printing office. There are one or two horses used for mail boys or pages to carry letters and packages.

The question was taken on Mr. PRICE's amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend by striking out the following: "For miscellaneous items, $30,000." I make the motion for the same reason that I have already given to the committee, and I shall not consume time in reiterating those reasons. We have traveled over one page only of this bill since we passed a similar item of $30,000, and here is another appropriation of $30,000 staring us in the face "for miscellaneous items," which covers all creation and the rest of mankind. [Laughter.] It may be right. I do not know but it is. I want to know whether it is so or not before I vote for it. I see no reason for putting in the sweeping appropriation of $30,000 for miscellaneous items without specifying what they are. Our Government has been in operation long enough for us to know what money is wanted for. It appears to me that there are specifications of items enough without putting in on every page an appropriation of $30,000 for miscellaneous items.

Mr. BROOKS. That is evidently a misprint, and I think that we are much indebted to the gentleman from Iowa for calling attention to it. It is a misprint, I am sure. It never was the intention of the committee to double the amount. This but confirms the fact that the Committee of Ways and Means have so much to do that they have not time to read their own bills.

Mr. MORRILL. It but confirms the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] has not had time to read this bill, although he first announced that he had read it through. If he had read it through he would have discovered that this is an appropriation for the House, whereas the other was an appropriation for the Senate. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is due to myself to say that I was not aware that I was to have charge of this bill till a few moments before it came up; therefore I had no opportunity to inform myself particularly in regard to it. But I believe that all the information which any fair-minded gentleman has a right to demand in relation to this item has been communicated by the committee. Every gentleman of common business understanding must know that, in relation to the expenditures of this House, it is utterly impossible to include in a bill of this kind every particular item. The House has already been informed that the major part of this expenditure is for the purpose of supplying various articles to the House in the way of repairs; that it is to defray the expenses of contestants of elections; that it is to defray the expenditures of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Under these circumstances, the matter having already been discussed, I do not think it worth while to consume further time on the subject.

Mr. PRICE. Now, sir, I insist that a gentleman who is acquainted with business transactions does not find it to be the fact in his own affairs that there must be, as the gentleman from Vermont asserts there must be here, a large amount of "miscellaneous" items that cannot be specified. I think, sir, that there are in this House some gentlemen who have some claims to business capacity outside of the Committee of Ways and Means; and I mean no disrespect to that committee, because when I place them on a level with other gentlemen of this House in reference to business capacity, I have done nothing to their disparagement. Now, will any gentleman in this House tell me that sufficient attention has not been paid in this bill to specification, when even the horses that are to carry pages with letters from the White House to the Capitol, and from the Capitol to the White House, are specified, and when $9,000 has been appropriated for that purpose? Why, then, have we an item here of $30,000 for "miscellaneous expenses" of which no one can give us the specifications? If this Government were just going into operation as an experiment, we might appropriate large items for incidental expenses, but our Government has been in operation more than three quarters of a century, and we ought by this time to be able to tell the exact nature of the appropriations needed to carry on the Government.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2d Session.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 20.

There is another matter to which I wish to call attention. The gentleman from Vermont says that a portion of this money is to pay expenses of contestants of elections; and he emphasizes that statement. Why, sir, if I understand this matter, such expenses are paid out of another fund. I have spoken on this subject with members of the Committee on Elections, and they agree with me in this opinion. Why cover up in a general appropriation of this kind something that those outside (I will not say those in this House, because that would be out of order) would call "stealing?" That is what they do call it, and I am very much afraid that they are in many instances more than half right. I do not mean to be, knowingly, a party to any such transactions. It is said outside of this Capitol that there are done here many things that ought not to be done; and I presume that, even when we have exercised the utmost vigilance, there will still be done some things that ought not to be done. But it is the part of Representatives here not to give opportunity for such proceedings by voting wholesale $60,000 for something which nobody can explain; something which has no foundation except in somebody's imagination. I say that it is the part of wisdom to reject all such appropriations as these till proper specifications are given to us. We have deficiency bills every year; and if there are any items of expenditure which cannot be anticipated, let them be included in such a bill; and if the expenditures have been properly made, we shall be prepared to vote the necessary appropriations. But let us not appropriate $60,000 wholesale, without some specification, without something to show the people of the country, who pay the taxes, where the money goes and for what it is expended.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I beg the gentlemen from Iowa to understand that so far as I am concerned I do not wish to discourage his attempts, or those of any other member, in the effort to save money to the country; and if the gentleman will strike at an item which, in my judgment, demands reduction, he shall not only have my vote but my voice in favor of it.

There is but a single point to which I wish to reply to the gentleman, and that is in reference to the pay of contestants. He seems to undertake to say that I was mistaken. If he will examine he will find that they are paid according to the orders of the House. If the House directs that they shall be paid out of the miscellaneous fund, then they are so paid; and if they are directed to be paid out of the contingent fund, then they are paid out of that fund.

Mr. PRICE. Is this the contingent fund of the House?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; this is not; this is the miscellaneous fund.

Mr. PRICE. Exactly; the further you go the deeper you get. [Laughter.] Why this $30,000, then; for the gentleman has said that the contestants are paid out of the contingent fund of the House? I ask him whether this is the contingent fund of the House, and he says no.

The question recurred on Mr. PRICE's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. PRICE and MORRILL.

The committee was divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to make the appropriation $29,900, and I will explain my reason for the motion. It is to have the opportunity to state to the twenty-six members who voted for my colleague's amendment, and whose opinions are entitled to respect, some figures of the expenditures under this head at the last session of Congress. One item which I stated to the House awhile ago was one of the leading items in this appropriation is in reference to contested-election cases. I have been to the Clerk to obtain the figures, and I find at the last session that $25,000 was expended to defray the expenses connected with contested-election cases.

Mr. PRICE. Does that come out of this miscellaneous appropriation?

Mr. KASSON. I expressly stated that it came out of this appropriation, and is charged under this head. I propose to state only generally what the items are. I will inform my colleague who is arguing in favor of the Christian virtues that cleanliness is provided for under this head of appropriation. [Laughter.] We pay for the washing of towels out of this appropriation. We pay for soap, for ice, and for all of the incidental things which are estimated for at the commencement of the session, and vouchers for which are approved by the Committee of Accounts of this House. That committee has the control of the accounts, and can approve or reject them.

I have deemed it due to the gentlemen who voted for the amendment to state these facts. The principal item is connected with contested-election cases. The Sergeant-at-Arms's expenses are also paid out of this appropriation; and I will state the further fact that this appropriation is not excessive in view of the expenditures at the last session of Congress, and that contested-election cases are to be renewed at the next session, being the first of the next Congress.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to get myself right on this question. I asked distinctly and emphatically the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL] who is on the Committee of Ways and Means, whether this miscellaneous appropriation was the one out of which the expenses of contested-election cases were paid, and he answered me as clearly and distinctly that it was not.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will permit me I will say that I answered him that sometimes they were paid out of one fund and sometimes out of another, according to the order of the House.

Mr. PRICE. I want to know whether I am right. I want to know whether contestants are paid out of the contingent fund. I want an answer from the Committee of Ways and Means. If they are paid out of the contingent fund, what, then, is the necessity for this miscellaneous appropriation of $30,000?

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman will look at the bill he will see that all of these items are embraced under the head of contingent expenses of the House. I find that I was mistaken in supposing there was a separate item put down for contingent expenses, as is the case with all the Departments. The miscellaneous fund is the fund of the House.

Mr. PRICE. I am satisfied with that explanation, but I could not be satisfied with the previous answer.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Representative and Delegate in the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, who has not already received the same, $23,000.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I wish to call attention to these appropriations for the Congressional Globe. I am not disposed to complain as a general thing of appropriations for that purpose, for I believe it is the duty of Congress to keep up the Globe. It will be perceived that these appropriations in this bill amount to $86,800.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and the House received a message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, their Chief Clerk, informing the House that the Senate had insisted upon their amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 620) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, agreed to the committee of conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. BUCKALEW such committee upon the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, an act (H. R. No. 623) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for carrying the mails from the United States to foreign ports, and for other purposes," approved March 25, 1864.

Also, that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 121) granting additional compensation to the employees of the two Houses of Congress.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 389) relative to clerkships in the Post Office Department;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) appointing General Richard Delafield to be a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution; and Joint resolution (S. R. No. 90) to authorize and direct an inventory of articles in the quartermasters' depots of the United States, and in possession of the naval storekeepers of the United States.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. One particular item which I wish to inquire about is this clause in reference to paying the publishers of the Congressional Globe one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand, including the indexes and the laws of the United States, amounting in all to $10,900. Now, the provision for paying $7 50 a column for reporting and publishing the debates is one which was contained in the former law upon this subject; but as I understand it, the matter to which I refer is a new provision incorporated into this bill. I desire information upon that point.

The other item of $23,000 for complete sets to members who have not already received the same is properly here, because that is to carry out a law which we made last session.

Mr. MORRILL. If the gentleman from Illinois will examine the records he will find that at the last session of Congress we changed the law in reference to the arrangement with the publishers of the Congressional Globe, and that this appropriation of one cent for every five pages is in conformity to that law.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that is so the explanation is satisfactory.

But there is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the House and committee. The fact is we have not yet received the Congressional Globe for last session.

Mr. MORRILL. That matter has already been explained by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY], and by an amendment offered by him, the binding of the Globe is transferred from our own public printing house to that of the Congressional Globe. In consequence of the large amount of work on hand, the public printing office has not been able to bind the Congressional Globe. As I said before, the binding has been transferred to the publishers of the Congressional Globe, and I understand they will be able to perform the work within ninety days after the close of each session.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the clause last read, making an appropriation of $373,710 24 for public binding, by striking out the sum of $19,400, that being the amount, I believe, we have elsewhere appropriated for binding the Congressional Globe by the publishers thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The following clause having been read—

For lithographing and engraving for the Senate and House of Representatives, $90,000—

Mr. WILSON said, I move to amend that clause by striking out "$90,000" and inserting "$50,000." By reference to the appropriation bill of last session I find that $50,000 was the amount then appropriated for this object. I desire to know what necessity there is for appropriating this large amount for lithographing and engraving for the Senate and House of Representatives?

Mr. MORRILL. Many of the public documents from the War and Navy Departments contain drawings which require to be lithographed or engraved, and placed upon record in order to illustrate the text of the documents. This expenditure has been very largely increased since the commencement of the war.
